

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

THE QUEEN being seated on the Throne, and the Commons being at the Bar, with their Speaker, HER MAJESTY was pleased to make a most gracious Speech to both Houses of Parliament, as follows:—

VOL. CLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

“ My Lords, and Gentlemen,

It is with great Satisfaction that I again meet you in Parliament, and have recourse to your Assistance and Advice.

My Relations with Foreign Powers continue to be on a friendly and satisfactory Footing.

At the Close of the last Session I informed you, that Overtures had been made to Me, to ascertain whether, if a Conference should be held by the Great Powers of Europe, for the Purpose of settling Arrangements connected with the present State and future Condition of Italy, a Plenipotentiary would be sent by Me to assist at such a Conference. I have since received a formal Invitation from the Emperor of Austria and from the Emperor of the French to send a Plenipotentiary to a Congress, to consist of the Representatives of the Eight Powers who were Parties to the Treaties of Vienna of 1815; the Objects of such Congress being stated to be, to receive Communication of the Treaties concluded at Zurich; and to deliberate, associating with the above-mentioned Powers the Courts of Rome, of Sardinia, and of the Two Sicilies, on the Means best adapted for the Pacification of Italy, and for placing its Prosperity on a solid and durable Basis.

DESIROUS, at all Times, to concur in Proceedings having for their Object the Maintenance of Peace, I accepted the Invitation, but, at the same Time, I made known that in such a Congress I should steadfastly maintain the Principle that no external Force should be employed to impose upon the People of Italy any particular Government or Constitution.

CIRCUMSTANCES have arisen which have led to a Postponement of the Congress, without any Day having been fixed for its Meeting; but whether in Congress or in separate Negotiation, I shall endeavour to obtain for the People of Italy freedom from Foreign Interference by Force of Arms, in their internal Concerns; and I trust that the Affairs of the Italian Peninsula may be peacefully and satisfactorily settled.

PAPERS on this Subject will soon be laid before you.

I AM in communication with the Emperor of the French, with a view to extend the Commercial Intercourse between the Two Countries, and thus to draw still closer the Bonds of friendly Alliance between them.

A DISPUTE having arisen between Spain and Morocco I endeavoured, by friendly Means, to prevent a Rupture; but, I regret to say, without Success.

I WILL direct Papers on this Subject to be laid before you.

MY Plenipotentiary and the Plenipotentiary of The Emperor of the French having, in obedience to their Instructions, proceeded to the Mouth of the Peiho River, in order to repair to Pekin to exchange in that City the Ratifications of the Treaty of Tien-tsin, in pursuance of the Fifty-sixth Article of that Treaty, their further Progress was opposed by Force, and a Conflict took place between the Chinese Forts at the Mouth of the River and the Naval Forces by which the Plenipotentiaries were escorted.

THE allied Forces displayed on this Occasion their usual Bravery; but, after sustaining a severe Loss, were compelled to retire.

I AM preparing, in Concert and Co-operation with the Emperor of the French, an Expedition intended to obtain Redress and a Fulfilment of the Stipulations of the Treaty of Tien-tsin.

It will be gratifying to Me if the prompt Acquiescence of the Emperor of China in the moderate Demands which will be made by the Plenipotentiaries shall obviate the Necessity for the Employment of Force.

I HAVE directed that Papers on this Subject shall be laid before you.

AN unauthorized Proceeding by an Officer of the United States in regard to the Island of San Juan, between Van Couver's Island and the Mainland, might have led to a serious Collision between My Forces and those of the United States. Such Collision, however, has been prevented by the judicious Forbearance of My Naval and Civil Officers on the Spot, and by the equitable and conciliatory provisional Arrangement proposed on this Matter by the Government of the United States.

I TRUST that the Question of Boundary out of which this Affair has arisen may be amicably settled in a Manner conformable with the just Rights of the Two Countries, as defined by the First Article of the Treaty of 1846.

THE last Embers of Disturbance in My East Indian Dominions have been extinguished; My Viceroy has made a peaceful Progress through the Districts which had been the principal Scene of Disorder, and by a judicious Combination of Firmness and Generosity My Authority has been everywhere solidly, and, I trust, permanently established. I have received from My Viceroy the most gratifying Accounts of the Loyalty of My Indian Subjects, and of the good Feeling evinced by the Native Chiefs and the great Landowners of the Country. The Attention of the Government in India has been directed to the development of the internal Resources of the Country; and I am glad to inform you that an Improvement has taken place in its financial Prospects.

I HAVE concluded a Treaty with the Tycoon of Japan, and a Treaty regarding Boundaries with the Republic of Guatemala. I have directed that these Treaties shall be laid before you.

" Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

I HAVE directed the Estimates for the ensuing Year to be laid before you. They have been prepared with a view to place the Military and Naval Services, and the Defences of the Country, upon an efficient Footing.

I AM glad to be able to inform you that the Public Revenue is in a satisfactory Condition.

" My Lords, and Gentlemen,

I HAVE accepted, with Gratification and Pride, the extensive Offers of voluntary Service which I have received from My Subjects. This Manifestation of Public Spirit has added an important Element to our System of National Defence.

MEASURES will be laid before you for amending the Laws which regulate the Representation of the People in Parliament, and for placing that Representation upon a broader and firmer Basis.

I EARNESTLY recommend you to resume your Labours for the Improvement of our Jurisprudence, and particularly in regard to Bankruptcy, the Transfer of Land, the Consolidation of the Statutes, and such a further Fusion of Law and Equity as may be necessary to insure that in every suit the Rights of the Parties may be satisfactorily determined by the Court in which the Suit is commenced.

I AM deeply gratified to observe that the great Interests of the Country are generally in a sound and thriving Condition; that Pauperism and Crime have diminished; and that, throughout the whole of My Empire, both in the United Kingdom and in my Colonies and Possessions beyond Sea, there reigns a Spirit of Loyalty, of Contentment, of Order, and of Obedience to the Law.

WITH heartfelt gratitude to the Almighty Ruler of Nations for these inestimable Blessings, I fervently pray that His beneficent Power may guide your Deliberations for the Advancement and Consolidation of the Welfare and Happiness of My People.

HER MAJESTY then retired.

House adjourned during pleasure.

House resumed.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH.

HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH having been reported by the Lord Chancellor,

EARL FITZWILLIAM, in rising to move that an humble Address be presented by this House in answer to Her Majesty's most gracious Speech, said:—My Lords, it is with diffidence that I rise to address your Lordships for the first time, and the greater is that diffidence when I recollect that although for many years I had the honour of a seat in the other House of Parliament, I remained throughout that time a silent actor in all the scenes to which my duties called me; but I will be brief, and the observations which I make shall be few, and I trust you will not weigh in too nice a balance any expressions which may fall from me on this occasion.

We hear from Her gracious Majesty that it is with gratification She meets her Parliament, that She continues on terms of friendship with all foreign countries; but while there is this general cause for satisfaction, there is, in my estimation, one reason for still greater congratulation. I heard but yesterday that a Commercial Treaty had been signed between the Government of the Emperor of the French and the Government of this country. I for one cannot hear of this Treaty otherwise than with the greatest satisfaction, as it appears to me more calculated to promote the prosperity, peace, and happiness of mankind than anything which could have been proposed, and tended more especially to bind together those two countries whose interests are more immediately at issue.

One circumstance we cannot hear of without regret, namely, that those kindly offices which were tendered by Her Majesty to the Governments of Morocco and Spain have not been accepted. But I will turn from that topic to one which we as Englishmen cannot view without admiration. We cannot witness the noble efforts now being made by the Italian people to win for themselves those liberties which we have so long enjoyed, and so justly prized, without feelings of the deepest sympathy and respect—and having won them, I trust they will use them with the moderation and wisdom which their conduct has given us every reason to expect.

I will now turn to one other point of Her Majesty's Speech which we heard with feelings of the deepest gratitude. We learn that those vast territories over which Her Majesty rules in India are now tranquil—that the miseries and sufferings of their inhabitants have been brought to a close; and I cannot but hope that having been purified by those fiery trials through which they have passed, the people of those countries may become more moral, contented, and happy, than they have ever been.

My Lords, I said I would not detain you long by any observations I might offer, but there is one other point of Her Majesty's Speech to which I must allude, as from it we learn that the state of this country is one of the very greatest prosperity, and we have the happiness of learning that crime is decreasing, and pauperism dying out.

Allow me, my Lords, now to thank you for the kind forbearance with which you have listened to the few observations I have offered to your notice, but before resuming my seat, I have the honour to propose that an humble Address may be presented to Her Majesty, in answer to Her gracious Speech from the Throne.

The following is a copy of the Address agreed to:—

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,

"We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble Thanks to Your Majesty for Your Majesty's most gracious Speech from the Throne.

"We humbly express to Your Majesty our Gratification in learning that Your Majesty's Relations with Foreign Powers continue to be on a friendly and a satisfactory Footing.

"We humbly thank your Majesty for the Information which Your Majesty has given us with regard to the Invitation which Your Majesty has received from The Emperor of Austria and from the Emperor of the French to send a Plenipotentiary to assist at a Conference of the Great Powers of Europe.

"We humbly express our Gratification at learning that Your Majesty has accepted the Invitation, while, at the same Time, making known that in such a Conference Your Majesty would steadfastly maintain the Principle that no external Force should be employed to impose upon the People of Italy any particular Government or Constitution.

"We assure Your Majesty that we humbly concur in the Purpose expressed by Your Majesty, that, whether in Congress or in separate Negotiation, Your Majesty will endeavour to obtain for the People of Italy Freedom from Foreign Interference by Force of Arms in their internal Concerns ; and we trust with Your Majesty that the Affairs of the Italian Peninsula may be peacefully and satisfactorily settled.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for commanding that Papers on this Subject should be laid before us.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us, that Your Majesty is in communication with The Emperor of the French, with a view to extend the Commercial Intercourse between the Two Countries, and thus to draw still closer the Bonds of friendly Alliance between them.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty, that we partake in the Regret expressed by Your Majesty that Your Majesty's Endeavours to prevent a Rupture between Spain and Morocco have been without Success.

"We thank Your Majesty for informing us, that Your Majesty's Plenipotentiary and the Plenipotentiary of The Emperor of The French having, in obedience to their Instructions, proceeded to the Mouth of the Peiho River, in order to repair to Pekin, to exchange in that City the Ratifications of the Treaty of Tien-tsin, in pursuance of the Fifty-sixth Article of that Treaty, their further Progress was opposed by Force, and that a Conflict took place between the Chinese Forts at the Mouth of the River and the Naval Forces by which the Plenipotentiaries were escorted ; and that Your Majesty is preparing, in Concert and Co-operation with The Emperor of the French, an Expedition intended to obtain Redress, and a Fulfilment of the Stipulations of the Treaty of Tien-tsin.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that we shall participate in Your Gratification if the prompt Acquiescence of the Emperor of China in the moderate Demands which will be made by the Plenipotentiaries shall obviate the Necessity for the Employment of Force.

"We thank Your Majesty for directing that Papers on this Subject should be laid before us.

"We assure Your Majesty that we learn with Satisfaction that a Collision which might have occurred between Your Majesty's Forces and those of the United States, arising from an unauthorized Proceeding by an Officer of the United States in regard to the Island of San Juan, has been prevented by the judicious Forbearance of Your Majesty's Naval and Civil Officers on the Spot, and by the equitable and conciliatory provisional Arrangement proposed on this Matter by the Government of the United States; and we trust with Your Majesty that the Question of Boundary out of which this affair has arisen, may be amicably settled in a Manner conformable with the just rights of the Two Countries, as defined by the First Article of the Treaty of 1846.

"We humbly express our heartfelt Thankfulness in learning that the last Embers of Disturbance in Your Majesty's East Indian Dominions have been extinguished ; that Your Majesty's Viceroy has made a peaceful Progress through the Districts which had been the principal Scene of Disorder ; that by a judicious Combination of Firmness and Generosity Your Majesty's Authority has been everywhere solidly established ; and that Your Majesty has received from Your Majesty's Viceroy most gratifying Accounts of the Loyalty of Your Majesty's Indian Subjects, and of the good Feeling evinced by the Native Chiefs, and the great Landowners of the Country.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us, that the Attention of the Government in India has been directed to the Development of the internal Resources of the Country, and that an Improvement has taken place in its financial Prospects.

"We humbly express our Satisfaction that Your Majesty has concluded a Treaty with the Tycoon of Japan, and a Treaty regarding Boundaries with the Republic of Guatemala.

"We humbly thank your Majesty for graciously expressing to us the Feelings with which Your Majesty has accepted the extensive Offers of voluntary Service which Your Majesty has received from Your Subjects.

"We thank Your Majesty for informing us, that Measures will be laid before us for amending the Laws which regulate the Representation of the People in Parliament, and for placing that Representation upon a broader and firmer Basis ; and we assure Your Majesty that we will give our best Consideration to this important Subject.

"We assure Your Majesty that we will give our serious Attention to Your Majesty's Recommendation that we should resume our Labours for the Improvement of our Jurisprudence, and particularly in regard to Bankruptcy, the Transfer of Land, Consolidation of the Statutes, and such a further Fusion of Law and Equity as may be necessary to ensure that in every Suit the Rights of

ment and Consolidation of the Welfare and Happiness of My People.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH.

HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH having been reported by the Lord Chancellor,

EARL FITZWILLIAM, in rising to move that an humble Address be presented by this House in answer to Her Majesty's most gracious Speech, said:—My Lords, it is with diffidence that I rise to address your Lordships for the first time, and the greater is that diffidence when I recollect that although for many years I had the honour of a seat in the other House of Parliament, I remained throughout that time a silent actor in all the scenes to which my duties called me; but I will be brief, and the observations which I make shall be few, and I trust you will not weigh in too nice a balance any expressions which may fall from me on this occasion.

We hear from Her gracious Majesty that it is with gratification She meets her Parliament, that She continues on terms of friendship with all foreign countries; but while there is this general cause for satisfaction, there is, in my estimation, one reason for still greater congratulation. I heard but yesterday that a Commercial Treaty had been signed between the Government of the Emperor of the French and the Government of this country. I for one cannot hear of this Treaty otherwise than with the greatest satisfaction, as it appears to me more calculated to promote the prosperity, peace, and happiness of mankind than anything which could have been proposed, and tended more especially to bind together those two countries whose interests are more immediately at issue.

One circumstance we cannot hear of without regret, namely, that those kindly offices which were tendered by Her Majesty to the Governments of Morocco and Spain have not been accepted. But I will turn from that topic to one which we as Englishmen cannot view without admiration. We cannot witness the noble efforts now being made by the Italian people to win for themselves those liberties which we have so long enjoyed, and so justly prized, without feelings of the deepest sympathy and respect—and having won them, I trust they will use them with the moderation and wisdom which their conduct has given us every reason to expect.

I will now turn to one other point of Her Majesty's Speech which we heard with feelings of the deepest gratitude. We learn that those vast territories over which Her Majesty rules in India are now tranquil—that the miseries and sufferings of their inhabitants have been brought to a close; and I cannot but hope that having been purified by those fiery trials through which they have passed, the people of those countries may become more moral, contented, and happy, than they have ever been.

My Lords, I said I would not detain you long by any observations I might offer, but there is one other point of Her Majesty's Speech to which I must allude, as from it we learn that the state of this country is one of the very greatest prosperity, and we have the happiness of learning that crime is decreasing, and pauperism dying out.

Allow me, my Lords, now to thank you for the kind forbearance with which you have listened to the few observations I have offered to your notice, but before resuming my seat, I have the honour to propose that an humble Address may be presented to Her Majesty, in answer to Her gracious Speech from the Throne.

The following is a copy of the Address agreed to:—

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,

"We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble Thanks to Your Majesty for Your Majesty's most gracious Speech from the Throne.

"We humbly express to Your Majesty our Gratification in learning that Your Majesty's Relations with Foreign Powers continue to be on a friendly and a satisfactory Footing.

"We humbly thank your Majesty for the Information which Your Majesty has given us with regard to the Invitation which Your Majesty has received from The Emperor of Austria and from the Emperor of the French to send a Plenipotentiary to assist at a Conference of the Great Powers of Europe.

"We humbly express our Gratification at learning that Your Majesty has accepted the Invitation, while, at the same Time, making known that in such a Conference Your Majesty would steadfastly maintain the Principle that no external Force should be employed to impose upon the People of Italy any particular Government or Constitution.

"We assure Your Majesty that we humbly concur in the Purpose expressed by Your Majesty, that, whether in Congress or in separate Negotiation, Your Majesty will endeavour to obtain for the People of Italy Freedom from Foreign Interference by Force of Arms in their internal Concerns ; and we trust with Your Majesty that the Affairs of the Italian Peninsula may be peacefully and satisfactorily settled.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for commanding that Papers on this Subject should be laid before us.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us, that Your Majesty is in communication with The Emperor of the French, with a view to extend the Commercial Intercourse between the Two Countries, and thus to draw still closer the Bonds of friendly Alliance between them.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty, that we partake in the Regret expressed by Your Majesty that Your Majesty's Endeavours to prevent a Rupture between Spain and Morocco have been without Success.

"We thank Your Majesty for informing us, that Your Majesty's Plenipotentiary and the Plenipotentiary of The Emperor of The French having, in obedience to their Instructions, proceeded to the Mouth of the Peiho River, in order to repair to Pekin, to exchange in that City the Ratifications of the Treaty of Tien-tsin, in pursuance of the Fifty-sixth Article of that Treaty, their further Progress was opposed by Force, and, that a Conflict took place between the Chinese Forts at the Mouth of the River and the Naval Forces by which the Plenipotentiaries were escorted ; and that Your Majesty is preparing, in Concert and Co-operation with The Emperor of the French, an Expedition intended to obtain Redress, and a Fulfilment of the Stipulations of the Treaty of Tien-tsin.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that we shall participate in Your Gratification if the prompt Acquiescence of the Emperor of China in the moderate Demands which will be made by the Plenipotentiaries shall obviate the Necessity for the Employment of Force.

"We thank Your Majesty for directing that Papers on this Subject should be laid before us.

"We assure Your Majesty that we learn with Satisfaction that a Collision which might have occurred between Your Majesty's Forces and those of the United States, arising from an unauthorized Proceeding by an Officer of the United States in regard to the Island of San Juan, has been prevented by the judicious Forbearance of Your Majesty's Naval and Civil Officers on the Spot, and by the equitable and conciliatory provisional Arrangement proposed on this Matter by the Government of the United States; and we trust with Your Majesty that the Question of Boundary out of which this affair has arisen, may be amicably settled in a Manner conformable with the just rights of the Two Countries, as defined by the First Article of the Treaty of 1846.

"We humbly express our heartfelt Thankfulness in learning that the last Embers of Disturbance in Your Majesty's East Indian Dominions have been extinguished ; that Your Majesty's Viceroy has made a peaceful Progress through the Districts which had been the principal Scene of Disorder ; that by a judicious Combination of Firmness and Generosity Your Majesty's Authority has been everywhere solidly established ; and that Your Majesty has received from Your Majesty's Viceroy most gratifying Accounts of the Loyalty of Your Majesty's Indian Subjects, and of the good Feeling evinced by the Native Chiefs, and the great Landowners of the Country.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us, that the Attention of the Government in India has been directed to the Development of the internal Resources of the Country, and that an Improvement has taken place in its financial Prospects.

"We humbly express our Satisfaction that Your Majesty has concluded a Treaty with the Tycoon of Japan, and a Treaty regarding Boundaries with the Republic of Guatemala.

"We humbly thank your Majesty for graciously expressing to us the Feelings with which Your Majesty has accepted the extensive Offers of voluntary Service which Your Majesty has received from Your Subjects.

"We thank Your Majesty for informing us, that Measures will be laid before us for amending the Laws which regulate the Representation of the People in Parliament, and for placing that Representation upon a broader and firmer Basis ; and we assure Your Majesty that we will give our best Consideration to this important Subject.

"We assure Your Majesty that we will give our serious Attention to Your Majesty's Recommendation that we should resume our Labours for the Improvement of our Jurisprudence, and particularly in regard to Bankruptcy, the Transfer of Land, Consolidation of the Statutes, and such a further Fusion of Law and Equity as may be necessary to ensure that in every Suit the Rights of the Partics may be satisfactorily determined by the Court in which the Suit is commenced.

"We humbly express our Gratification in learning that the great Interests of the Country are generally in a sound and thriving Condition ; that Pauperism and Crime have diminished ; and that, throughout the whole of Your Majesty's Empire, both in the United Kingdom and in Your Majesty's Colonies and Possessions beyond Sea, there reigns a Spirit of Loyalty, of Contentment, of Order, and of Obedience to the Law.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that in common with Your Majesty we fervently pray that the beneficent Power of the Almighty Ruler of Nations may guide our Deliberations for the Advancement and Consolidation of the Welfare and Happiness of Your Majesty's People.

LORD TRURO said, he knew when slender abilities and inexperience appealed to their Lordships' consideration, that appeal was not in vain. He did so then. They had just heard in the words of Her Majesty's Speech that She came to her Parliament with feelings of unmixed satisfaction. It might well be so, announcing as the Sovereign had that day done from the Throne, the good-will of all nations towards this country, pledging Her Ministers to the introduction of measures of high national concern, and gladdening the hearts of Her people with the prospect of an expanded commerce. And when their Lordships were informed that the revenue was never in a sounder condition, that manufactures were never more prosperous, that crime had decreased, and pauperism was less burthensome, they had had laid before them the just grounds for the Royal satisfaction that had been expressed. He congratulated their Lordships when he reflected on the recent Continental strife, at the assurances that while this country had held aloof from political complications, while she had steadfastly adhered to the policy she had avowed and the principles she had promulgated, she had yet, by a spirit of forbearance and conciliation, maintained with all the Powers of Europe the most friendly and amicable relations. That upon the cessation of the Italian war this country was invited to enter a Congress, to receive communications in regard to the Treaty of Zurich, and to consider the future condition of Italy. This acknowledgment of the necessity for her advice in the resettlement of that country was only to be expected. It was due to her rank and natural influence in Continental affairs, and he rejoiced to learn from the Throne that her compliance was unaccompanied by the smallest departure from the principles of non-armed interference, which England had, by her public men, distinctly avowed, and by the organs of public opinion made known to Europe. He congratulated the country upon the prospect, at last, of mutual reductions of tariff between England and France—that pledge of mutual prosperity, that guarantee of friendly relations, that special security for the prolonged peace of the world. It could not but be agreeable to the country to indulge the hope that under the guidance and sagacity of the Emperor of the French, a course of enlightened commercial policy was about to be substituted for a warlike and aggressive attitude. But if this country had been free from apprehension of war on the Continent, she had not been without grave alarm in the Far West, where the unbounded activity and restlessness of our excellent cousins had, for a moment, raised serious fears in the people of this country. But, however uncontrollable might be some of the spirits of the United States, and unauthorized and unjustifiable their acts and outrages, it was only due to the Government of that great republic to acknowledge the promptitude of their suppression, and their willingness to enter into a frank reinvestigation of treaty engagements. From this satisfactory picture of our Foreign relations, he invited their Lordships to turn to a scene which but lately had been but a gloomy illustration of chequered fortune—where but two years since an empire was in flames, and all that is horrible of war and massacre was ruthlessly perpetrated. It was not too much to say that India had been reconquered amidst scenes of bravery, devotion, and heroism not surpassed by the deeds of old days, when that vast country was first subjugated. Greatly was it to be deplored that they could not be recorded by the same historian, but the House and the country had but lately grieved the genius that had enshrined the deeds of Clive in terms of unsurpassed eloquence and beauty. Their Lordships had, indeed, to deplore a good and a great man ; a brilliant example, an experienced councillor, a nation's instructor. Whatever doubts might be entertained of the policy and propriety of our recent dealings with China, he conceived there could be but one opinion of the treacherous duplicity of the blow lately dealt to Her Majesty's forces in the Chinese waters—a blow for which the people of this country would never be satisfied without voluntary reparation, or forcible redress. He would turn for a moment to a measure of domestic legislation which had been promised to them—the Reform Bill—a measure, the necessity for which had been admitted by all parties. A measure with which all had severally dealt, which had been submitted for acceptance but to meet with rejection, and which now came, it was to be hoped, for the last time before the country for the approbation of their Lordships. It appeared to be conceded on all hands that no extensive changes are demanded; a great extension of the franchise was nowhere required; but the necessity for a moderate measure of reform was, in his opinion, imperative. The country looked forward to such a measure with deep interest if not with anxiety; and it would expect from the great Conservative party that disinterested patriotism in its support which its provisions would, he believed, be found to deserve. And it was because he recognized in the words of the Royal Speech, the determination of Ministers to deal with the questions of the day without postponement or evasion that he invited their Lordships to adopt the Address which he had then the honour to second.

EARL GREY: It appears to me that, with one exception, there is no part of the Address to which any of your Lordships are likely to object; on the contrary, that the greater part of it, as of the Speech of which it is the echo, must have been heard by your Lordships with very high satisfaction. It must be a source of pleasure to us to learn that Her Majesty is able to congratulate us on the peaceful state of our relations with foreign States. We must also rejoice that Her Majesty is able to congratulate us upon the generally prosperous condition of her people, and upon the well-being of the great mass of our fellow-countrymen, as shown by the diminution of pauperism and the state of the revenue and of trade; upon the loyalty and good order so generally prevalent throughout Her dominions; upon the fact that the last embers of rebellion have been extinguished in India; and upon the circumstance that the dispute with the United States respecting the island of San Juan is likely to be settled amicably. Above all, we must have heard with great satisfaction—because upon that point some of us might have entertained misgivings which are thus removed—the paragraphs relating to Italian affairs and to the assemblage of the proposed Congress. I, for one, at least heartily thank Her Majesty's Ministers for having advised Her to inform us that She is determined to maintain the principle that no external force shall be employed to impose upon the people of Italy any particular Government or Constitution. I rejoice to find that the British Government is to be no party to any scheme for cutting and carving the territory of Italy according to the real or supposed interest of other Powers or of foreign Princes, but will maintain the principle that it is the right of the Italians themselves to settle to what form of Government they shall submit. I trust that, taking their stand upon this plain principle of justice, Her Majesty's Government may succeed in conducting these affairs to a satisfactory conclusion, and that we may have the happiness of seeing established in Italy a powerful, independent, and free State. That I am certain is the conclusion which is most desirable for the Italians themselves, and which is also best calculated to promote the general welfare of Europe and that of this country. One paragraph of the Speech relating to a topic of foreign policy I have not, I confess, heard with so much satisfaction. I allude to the passage in which Her Majesty informs us that She is "in communication with the Emperor of the French with a view to extend the commercial intercourse between the two countries, and thus to draw still closer the bonds of friendly alliance between them." No man can desire more earnestly than myself that every obstacle to freer commercial intercourse between England and France should be removed, and a more intimate relation established. It is greatly to be regretted that two great nations so well calculated to promote each other's welfare should have so little commercial intercourse; that by artificial restrictions mutual trade, which might be so beneficial to both, should be so interrupted, and that a commerce which might be so great should be restricted within such narrow limits. But, my Lords, although I am most anxious to see an increase of commercial intercourse between the two countries, yet, if this passage in the Royal Speech is meant to announce to us, as we are led to believe, that a treaty is to be entered into by which France and England shall mutually stipulate to lower their duties upon each other's productions,—if this is what is really intended I must declare my conviction that it will be an unfortunate step backward in our financial and commercial policy. To commercial treaties, within their proper limits, I see no objection; but those limits are very narrow. Beyond providing that each nation shall treat the other with as much favour as it extends to any other nation, and a few ordinary stipulations of that kind, I know of nothing which can properly be introduced into a commercial treaty. When you enter into stipulations as to the duties which each is to levy on the productions of the other, you make a very great mistake indeed. I cannot forget that at the conclusion of the great revolutionary war it was the opinion of almost every statesman of note in all countries, that it would be a common benefit to the civilized world if all nations would remove the obstructions which arbitrary legislation opposed to their commercial intercourse with each other. Unfortunately, with that opinion there prevailed this other—that in the removal of commercial restrictions the gain rested with the nation whose produce was admitted into the dominions of another, and that the maintenance of high import duties was beneficial to a people, provided that their exports were not unduly taxed by their neighbours. Entering upon diplomatic intercourse with that notion, the various countries of Europe, for more than a quarter of a century, went on trying, with much fruitless expenditure of labour and ingenuity, to remove the restrictions which they had mutually imposed upon each other's trade. The spirit in which these negotiations were carried on was that which is so well described in Mr. Canning's well-known rhyming despatch:—

"Is giving too little, and asking too much."

That was the spirit in which each nation received the proposals of its rival. All thought that too much was asked with respect to their admission of the produce of other countries, and that too little was conceded with respect to the admission of their own by other nations, and the consequence was that they were all disposed to act upon the principle laid down by Mr. Canning at the end of his despatch:—

"Nous frapperons Falck with twenty per cent."

These negotiations continued, as I have said, for nearly a quarter of a century, and at the end of that time left the commercial intercourse of Europe more fettered, if possible, than it was before. At length, my Lords, this country adopted a wiser policy. It came to the conclusion that it was contrary to common sense that we should punish ourselves because other nations refused to admit our productions to their markets; that the wiser course for us would be to regulate our own duties according to our commercial and financial interests, and to leave other nations to follow our example, or not, as they pleased, being convinced that if we opened our ports to foreign produce, it would, in some way or other, be paid for, and the general prosperity of the country would be increased. This policy was adopted at first with some degree of timidity, but afterwards with greater boldness, and was at length carried into complete effect by the repeal of the old Navigation Laws in 1849. We know that this great experiment has been attended with a success which has exceeded even the most sanguine expectations of its supporters. We have seen trade, manufactures, and every branch of the industry of the country improve with unexampled rapidity. We have seen ten millions of duties repealed, while the revenue derived from the Customs has not diminished. We have seen the welfare and general comfort of the people marvellously increase; and, lastly, we have seen other nations gradually begin, though with slow and hesitating steps, to follow our example. Those who are conversant with the commercial tariffs of Europe are aware that almost all nations have made some considerable improvement in their systems, and this, too, be it remembered, since we ceased to make their concessions preliminary to the improvement of our own legislation, or the participation by them in the freedom of our commerce. Unhappily, France is not among those nations who have been willing to make concessions in its tariff. The tariff of France is to this day highly restrictive; but, though I most earnestly desire that its tariff should be amended, I contend that is a step backward—a departure from the wise and sound policy which we have for several years pursued, if in the commercial treaty with France there are any stipulations binding us to reduce the duties upon any commodities of French produce in consideration of similar reductions in the duties upon British productions introduced into France. If there are any duties upon articles of French produce which, consistently with our financial exigencies, we can afford to reduce, let them be reduced at once, and without making similar concessions on the part of the French Government a condition preliminary to such reductions. I am persuaded that this, as it is the most generous, is by far the best and wisest policy. Let any duties of that kind, which you can afford to reduce, be diminished, and with the least possible delay ; but, on the other hand, at the present moment, when the financial exigencies of the country, if I am rightly informed, are likely to prove not a little onerous and not a little difficult to meet, I utterly protest against any reduction of duties upon French produce, which is not expedient and prudent with reference to our own financial condition, with the view of obtaining relaxations of the commercial tariff of France. If France likes to maintain a restrictive tariff, she, and not we, will be the principal sufferer, and I am convinced that though she may for a time defer the adoption of a wiser policy, it is utterly impossible that she should long continue to do so. She cannot do so without seeing herself outstripped in the race of improvement by every nation in Europe, and finding herself left far behind in comparative prosperity by those countries which are wise enough to adopt a system of commercial freedom. Knowing, as I do, the intelligence of the French people, I am persuaded it is impossible that they can long witness the effects of their present system without discovering the prudence and the wisdom of changing it. I am aware it has been said that, though our general policy is opposed to commercial treaties, still it is expedient to depart from it in the case of France, because in that country there is so strong a feeling in favour of Protection that even the great power of the Emperor is unable to carry into effect an improvement of its commercial system unless the people can be reconciled to it by gaining some immediate advantage in return. My Lords, that reasoning seems to me to be based on an entire mistake. I firmly believe that in France, under the present or any other form of Government, public opinion will in the end prevail in regard to legislation of this kind ; and I am convinced that public opinion is far less likely to be enlisted in favour of a sound commercial system if it is put to the people that they are to consent to the introduction of certain foreign goods, and to the admission of competition in respect to certain articles, not for the sake of the advantages which they will derive from this greater freedom of import, but in order to purchase an easier entrance for their own produce into another country. This is nothing less than the old principle which formerly prevailed amongst States come back again, and it will be represented, and very truly represented to France, that what she can gain by any changes which we may make in our financial policy will be so trifling compared with the effect of any real reform in the French tariff as to be totally inadequate to compensate her for her concessions. This is the light in which the matter will be put before the French people if the inducement you hold out to them for agreeing to the reduction of their import duties on coal, iron, cotton twist, or any other English commodities, is to be the hope that we shall take their silks or their wine more freely ; instead of an expectation of the direct benefit which their commerce will receive from the removal of their own restrictions. And a very simple calculation, which the manufacturers of France are quite able to make, will suffice to show them how very small an equivalent they will, on this view of the question, obtain for what they are asked to give up. I believe, therefore, that by making this a matter of stipulation you will increase those jealousies which are the real obstacle to a permanent and effectual improvement. But, my Lords, though I could not permit this opportunity of noticing a question which occupies so prominent a place in the Speech to pass, I am happy to acknowledge that the passage which relates to it is so guardedly expressed and so carefully avoids committing the House to any opinion beforehand, that I have no difficulty whatever in concurring in the Address as it stands. But there is another portion of the Speech with respect to which I regret to say I cannot adopt the same course. In the paragraph which refers to the late calamity in China, and to the measures which Her Majesty's Ministers have taken in consequence, there is undoubtedly manifested a very laudable desire on the part of the Government to avoid to pledge the House prematurely to any opinion on some most important points involved in the transaction. They do not take the tone adopted by my noble Friend who seconded the Address, and ask us to express any opinion as to the conduct of the Chinese, or as to their having been guilty of any treachery of which we have a right to complain. They have no doubt studiously, and very properly, excluded any expression of that nature. But there is one respect in which it appears to me that the passage does commit the House to an admission which it ought not to make. We are asked to thank Her Majesty for having informed us of what has happened, and of the preparations which are making for the sending out of an expedition to China. My Lords, by so thanking Her Majesty for giving the information, but at the same time taking no notice of the delay which has occurred in bringing this subject under the consideration of Parliament, the House does clearly admit that it has no right to complain of that delay. I, for one, cannot consent to make such an admission, even by inference, because I believe that by acknowledging that Her Majesty's Government are not to blame for having failed to bring this question at an earlier period under the notice of Parliament the House would surrender one of its most important rights and privileges. To the Crown it undoubtedly belongs by the constitution to conduct the relations of this country with foreign Powers. The Crown also possesses the high prerogative of declaring war and making peace. But this high authority is most cautiously guarded by this rule,—that Her Majesty's servants are to be held strictly responsible for the manner in which it is exercised; and further, that whenever the situation of the country is such that it is necessary to arm with a view to probable, or even possible hostilities, it is the duty of the advisers of the Crown to make this known to Parliament, and to call on Parliament to provide for the expense to be thus incurred. My Lords, it is not requisite that war should be declared in order to create an occasion when such a communication ought to be made to the Legislature. It is sufficient if the state of things is such that a necessity arises for making naval and military preparations. I am convinced there are none of your Lordships who will dispute that I am laying down correctly what has hitherto been regarded as the law and practice of Parliament. I might quote many examples to show how rigidly this rule has been adhered to, but I shall trouble your Lordships with only two; and in doing so I hope I shall not be taking up too much of your time. These precedents, showing how in former times great Ministers have acted in these cases, will be valuable as a guide to your Lordships' judgment in the present instance. In the year 1790 some British vessels were seized by the Spaniards on the north-west coast of America. An application was made by our Government for redress. That application was not attended to. On the contrary, Spain replied by putting forward claims that were held to be inadmissible; and a fresh application was ordered to be made by the English Ambassador at Madrid. At the same time, on the 5th of May, a Message from the Crown was brought down to both Houses of Parliament, in which, after reciting at greater length than I have done the facts I have just stated, His Majesty made use of the following words:—

"And, under these circumstances, His Majesty, having also received information that considerable armaments are carrying on in the ports of Spain, has judged it to be indispensably necessary to give orders for making such preparations as may put it in His Majesty's power to act with vigour and effect in support of the honour of his Crown and the interests of his people. And His Majesty recommends it to his faithful Commons, on whose zeal and public spirit he has the most perfect reliance, to enable him to take such measures and to make such augmentations of his forces as may be eventually necessary for this purpose."

This Message was brought down by Mr. Pitt before the Crown proceeded to increase the naval or military force of the country in the case of the Nootka Sound dispute. The Address in answer to the Royal Message was unanimously agreed to on the following day by both Houses; and subsequently the House of Commons gave a vote of credit of £1,000,000 to meet the expenses of the proposed armament. I need not tell your Lordships that, in consequence of the determined attitude of this country, the difference relative to Nootka Sound passed off without a war. There is another case. At the beginning of December, 1826, the Princess Regent of Portugal applied to England under the treaties between Portugal and this country for assistance to defend her dominions against an apprehended aggression on the part of Spain. The British Government determined that this appeal was one which should be responded to. Accordingly, on the 11th of December, 1826, a Message from the Crown was brought down to both Houses. On the following day, the 12th of December, Mr. Canning, in moving the Address in answer to the Message, informed the House of Commons that the decision of the Cabinet had been come to only on the Saturday preceding; that the pleasure of the Crown was taken on the Sunday, and on the Monday the Message was sent down to the House of Commons. Such, my Lords, was the course adopted on those two occasions. Contrast it with what happened in the present instance. The Gazette

16th of September last contained the despatches of the English Admiral giving an account of the repulse sustained by our force in China. I have no means of knowing how soon after that the decision of the Government was come to, but we know from the usual sources of information—the newspapers—that at a very early period afterwards preparations were commenced. My Lords, it is now more than four months since this intelligence was received, and during at least three of those months our ports and arsenals have resounded with the din of preparation. Measures have been taken, as we all know from the public sources of information, for despatching artillery, gunboats and stores to China. I do not know whether any troops have been ordered to proceed to China direct from this country, but troops have certainly been ordered to proceed thither from India, and preparations have been made for a large force, we are told not less than 10,000 men, in addition to our naval forces. Therefore a very large expense must already have been incurred, and I only ask your Lordships to contrast the course which had just been taken—all these measures being taken during three months without communication with Parliament till this moment—with what I have described as having been done on the occasions to which I have alluded by Mr. Pitt and Mr. Canning. They thought it their duty before they did anything else at once to ask Parliament to support the Crown in the measures they proposed to adopt. Is that, my Lords, to be the rule in future? If it is not, I say it is necessary that we should take some notice of the delay that has taken place. If we admit that a Minister may without blame for so long a period as I have mentioned continue warlike preparations without seeking the aid and sanction of Parliament to his measures, I say we admit that a principle which our greatest statesmen and most distinguished writers have always held an essential element in our constitution, is no longer binding upon our statesmen. The power of the Crown to enter on war is admitted, but it has always been held that it was only safe that this great power should be intrusted to the Executive Government of the day, because they were not at liberty to take even one step towards invol-

as they imposed upon the country the expense of an armament, to obtain the sanction of Parliament for that expense; and because in making such an appeal to Parliament, the whole question of the policy and justice of the war was necessarily brought under the consideration of the great council of the nation, which had it in its power to check at the very beginning any steps which it might think inexpedient, or calculated to involve the country in an unjust or impolitic war. But what becomes of this security? What becomes of this guard against abuse if a Minister is to be allowed for such a time as I have described to carry on warlike preparations, keeping Parliament ignorant of them? It may, perhaps, be said that in the instances I have quoted, Parliament was sitting at the time, and therefore it was natural that Government should make a communication to it as soon as circumstances arose which, in their own opinion, made it expedient for the country to arm. My Lords, I can really scarcely believe that anybody will pretend that the mere accident of Parliament being sitting at the time should make the slightest difference. If it is proper to make a communication to Parliament, it is proper also to call Parliament together for the purpose of receiving that communication, and neither our convenience, nor the convenience of the members of the other House of Parliament, ought for a moment to be put into competition with the importance of maintaining a great constitutional principle; and, as it is in the power of the Government at any time, with very short delay, to call Parliament together, if it was their duty while Parliament was sitting to make such a communication, it was equally their duty to call Parliament together for the purpose of receiving it. There is another argument which, perhaps, may be used. I may be told that the large and liberal grants made by Parliament in last Session for our naval and military service rendered it unnecessary to make a further communication to Parliament, as the Government in their preparations have not exceeded those grants. My Lords, I trust we shall not have this argument brought forward, which would partake very much of the character of a quibble. It is, no doubt, true that Parliament made very large and liberal grants in the last Session for the naval and military grants were not more vide for the demands
a Parliament thought ought not to make. We are asked to thank Her Majesty for having informed us of what has happened, and of the preparations which are making for the sending out of an expedition to China. My Lords, by so thanking Her Majesty for giving the information, but at the same time taking no notice of the delay which has occurred in bringing this subject under the consideration of Parliament, the House does clearly admit that it has no right to complain of that delay. I, for one, cannot consent to make such an admission, even by inference, because I believe that by acknowledging that Her Majesty's Government are not to blame for having failed to bring this question at an earlier period under the notice of Parliament the House would surrender one of its most important rights and privileges. To the Crown it undoubtedly belongs by the constitution to conduct the relations of this country with foreign Powers. The Crown also possesses the high prerogative of declaring war and making peace. But this high authority is most cautiously guarded by this rule,—that Her Majesty's servants are to be held strictly responsible for the manner in which it is exercised ; and further, that whenever the situation of the country is such that it is necessary to arm with a view to probable, or even possible hostilities, it is the duty of the advisers of the Crown to make this known to Parliament, and to call on Parliament to provide for the expense to be thus incurred. My Lords, it is not requisite that war should be declared in order to create an occasion when such a communication ought to be made to the Legislature. It is sufficient if the state of things is such that a necessity arises for making naval and military preparations. I am convinced there are none of your Lordships who will dispute that I am laying down correctly what has hitherto been regarded as the law and practice of Parliament. I might quote many examples to show how rigidly this rule has been adhered to, but I shall trouble your Lordships with only two ; and in doing so I hope I shall not be taking up too much of your time. These precedents, showing how in former times great Ministers have acted in these cases, will be valuable as a guide to your Lordships' judgment in the present instance. In the year 1790 some British vessels were seized by the Spaniards on the north-west coast of America. An application was made by our Government for redress. That application was not attended to. On the contrary, Spain replied by putting forward claims that were held to be inadmissible ; and a fresh application was ordered to be made by the English Ambassador at Madrid. At the same time, on the 5th of May, a Message from the Crown was brought down to both Houses of Parliament, in which, after reciting at greater length than I have done the facts I have just stated, His Majesty made use of the following words :—

“ And, under these circumstances, His Majesty, having also received information that considerable armaments are carrying on in the ports of Spain, has judged it to be indispensably necessary to give orders for making such preparations as may put it in His Majesty's power to act with vigour and effect in support of the honour of his Crown and the interests of his people. And His Majesty recommends it to his faithful Commons, on whose zeal and public spirit he has the most perfect reliance, to enable him to take such measures and to make such augmentations of his forces as may be eventually necessary for this purpose.”

This Message was brought down by Mr. Pitt before the Crown proceeded to increase the naval or military force of the country in the case of the Nootka Sound dispute. The Address in answer to the Royal Message was unanimously agreed to on the following day by both Houses ; and subsequently the House of Commons gave a vote of credit of £1,000,000 to meet the expenses of the proposed armament. I need not tell your Lordships that, in consequence of the determined attitude of this country, the difference relative to Nootka Sound passed off without a war. There is another case. At the beginning of December, 1826, the Princess Regent of Portugal applied to England under the treaties between Portugal and this country for assistance to defend her dominions against an apprehended aggression on the part of Spain. The British Government determined that this appeal was one which should be responded to. Accordingly, on the 11th of December, 1826, a Message from the Crown was brought down to both Houses. On the following day, the 12th of December, Mr. Canning, in moving the Address in answer to the Message, informed the House of Commons that the decision of the Cabinet had been come to only on the Saturday preceding ; that the pleasure of the Crown was taken on the Sunday, and on the Monday the Message was sent down to the House of Commons. Such, my Lords, was the course adopted on those two occasions. Contrast it with what happened in the present instance. The Gazette of the

Gravesend, he would be entitled to remove those obstructions by force and to fire upon the troops defending them, because they happened to be manned only by a body of the Kent Militia; whether our now preferring a demand for redress for this affair, backed by the despatch of a large military and naval force to that country in a manner which will probably lead to war, is calculated to promote, in any one respect, the interests of England; and whether any conclusion to which such a contest may be brought can be conducive to our real benefit. We shall have further to consider, my Lords, whether any treaty which we may succeed in extorting from China, or any amount of degradation which we may impose upon her Government, is likely to place us in a better position in her regard, or whether we have any security that such a treaty would be acted upon one hour beyond the time at which the force by which it was wrung from the Chinese people may happen to be withdrawn;—we must consider whether our great trade with China—a trade which, directly and indirectly, contributes more to our prosperity than that which we carry on with any other nation of the world, with the single exception of the United States—a trade which is of such enormous importance both to our home and to our Indian revenue,—is likely to be promoted by burning the cities and slaughtering the inhabitants of that vast empire; whether they are likely to become better customers to us, and to be enabled to purchase more of our manufactures, and to give us in return more of those articles that China produces, by our spreading fire and devastation through their land;—whether it is wise and prudent that we should enter upon a contest from which, once it is commenced, there may be no retreat, save by pulling down the ancient and already tottering fabric of the Chinese Empire, and thus leaving that extensive empire and vast population a prey to anarchy and disorder. These, my Lords, are grave and momentous questions, which it will be our duty to consider with a deliberation commensurate to their importance. They open, however, too extensive a field to be adequately discussed on an occasion like the present. I now advert to the fact that such questions will arise simply as affording to my mind conclusive proof of the impropriety of the delay which has occurred on the part of Her Majesty's Government in bringing this subject under the consideration of the Legislature. It will be our duty to deal with these great questions in the course of this Session, but we cannot now do so with the same effect as we might have done three months ago. It is possible that Parliament may disapprove the policy which Her Majesty's Government have pursued in this matter; but if it should, it may now find it too late to correct many of the errors of that policy. Their orders have gone out to the other side of the world. Those orders may be (and I much fear they are) of such a character as to bring on the war for which their preparations have been made, so that this calamity which might some time ago have been avoided, if the judgment of Parliament had been appealed to in due course, may now be inevitable. We are at the present moment, for instance, far more deeply committed to France, who is to act as our ally in this contest, than we were at no very distant day. It is more difficult now than it was some few months since to make any propositions of a conciliatory kind to the Chinese Government with a chance of their leading to an amicable arrangement between the two countries. The very preparations for war which both we and the Chinese have made, according to recent accounts, diminish the chances of such a policy being attended with success. I have now, my Lords, I think, made out my case. It is, then, I repeat, contrary to the established rules and practice of Parliament that any Government should presume to take upon itself, without the sanction of the Legislature, to make preparations, as has been done in this instance, for what may turn out to be a frightfully disastrous contest. No merely theoretical, but a practical and substantial injury has, I contend, been done to the country by so great a departure from previous precedent and the established law of the constitution. If, therefore, we agree to the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne in the form in which it now stands, thanking Her Majesty for the information which she has communicated to us upon this important subject, without saying one word as to the time at which that communication happens to have been made, we by clear implication admit that the point is one with respect to which we have no fault to find. It is, therefore, my object, in framing the Amendment which I am now about to submit to your Lordships' consideration, to take notice of the irregularity of which I complain in terms the most temperate which I am able to devise. I may add, that if any noble Lord should suggest to me terms still milder, by which the views which I entertain upon this subject could be expressed, I shall be most happy to act upon the suggestion. My sole object in proposing this Amendment at all is to prevent the pernicious proceeding to which I advert from being drawn into a precedent. Bear in mind, my Lords, that the law of Parliament is to a great degree an unwritten law—that it rests on custom and usage. Every bad precedent which you set up in opposition to it therefore tends to break down a wholesome constitutional check. I am of opinion that this House was greatly to blame in omitting to notice the irregularity of which the Government was guilty with reference to the war with Persia. We see in what has since taken place the consequences of the course which was then pursued. If we now pass over with similar neglect a similar irregularity, we shall have gone far to establish a rule which may supersede the old law of Parliament; so that in future any man can hardly complain with justice of a Minister who during the Parliamentary recess should take measures and pledge the country to a policy, owing to which we may find ourselves, when the Legislature assembled, hopelessly involved in a great European war. These, my Lords, are the considerations upon which I venture to submit to your notice the Amendment which I am about to propose, and which, I trust, your Lordships will sanction. To the words in the Address thanking Her Majesty for the information which She has been graciously pleased to communicate to us with respect to the conflict at the mouth of the Peiho, and the measures which She proposes to take in co-operation with the Emperor of the French to obtain redress for what there took place, and to secure the fulfilment of the treaty of Tein-tsin, I beg to add words by way of Amendment:—

Amendment proposed, to insert—

“After the Words ‘Stipulations of the Treaty of Tien-tsin,’ “but humbly to express to Her Majesty our Regret that when the Preparations for the intended Expedition were commenced, Her Majesty's Servants did not advise Her Majesty to communicate to Parliament without Delay the Measures which had been decided upon, in order that Parliament might have an Opportunity of forming a Judgment on their Propriety, and that its previous Sanction might be obtained for the Expense they might occasion.”

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: I greatly regret, my Lords, that the noble Earl who has just spoken has found it to be inconsistent with his duty to allow the Address of your Lordships' House to proceed to Her Majesty without having proposed his Amendment. The practice—the very wholesome practice, in my opinion—has of late grown up in the proceedings of the Legislature, of never moving an Amendment to the Address of the Sovereign in answer to the Royal Message at the commencement of the Session, unless some great political objects were in view and likely to be attained, or unless some assertion were made in that Address to which the Opposition found it impossible to assent. Now, the practice to which I allude has, I believe, prevailed in recent times mainly because it has been the custom of ministers, no matter to what party they may belong, to abstain from introducing into the Speech of the Sovereign, so far as it may lie in their power, any topic or phrase which might be likely to produce discord in the deliberations of the Legislature on the first evening of the Session. And, indeed, my noble Friend, the mover of the Amendment himself, expressly stated in the course of his speech that he is perfectly aware that Her Majesty's Government, in framing the Royal Speech, have studiously avoided the employment of any such expressions as were very fairly used by the noble Lord who seconded the Address in commenting on the proceedings which have taken place in China. As, however, my noble Friend has felt himself called upon to move this Amendment, it becomes my duty, on the part of the Government, to make some observations, not only upon the Amendment itself, but upon the arguments by which it has been supported. But before I proceed to do so, I hope the House will allow me to say a few words in reference to another topic of the Royal Speech upon which the noble Earl has commented unfavourably—I mean the treaty of commerce with France. I am sure your Lordships will not expect that any Member of the Government should at this moment, when the treaty was only signed yesterday, and there has been no opportunity of laying it before the House, enter into any discussion of its details or attempt a hypothetical defence of the transaction itself. But I at once concur in my noble Friend's observations as to the impolicy of commercial treaties generally. I readily admit a commercial treaty, as the term was understood in years gone by, to be at variance with the soundest principles of free trade, and that nothing but peculiar circumstances can justify on our part, in these days, recurrence to treaties of that nature. I am, however, firmly convinced that when this treaty is laid before Parliament, and when your Lordships come to consider the circumstances under which it has been proposed by one country and accepted by the other, you will concur in the opinion held by Her Majesty's Government, that circumstances have rendered the proceeding a justifiable one, to which you can give your approval. Without entering into details, I will only put it to the House and my noble Friend whether a treaty of commerce, if it be not absolutely contradictory to the principles of free trade, may not be justifiable as a means of cementing the union of two great countries like England and France; whether there can be any stronger or more reliable bond of union than an extension of the commerce between those countries, which, considering their enormous wealth, has been hitherto of a restricted nature. We may make bargains or engagements with Emperors and Kings, and Presidents, but they may be broken by those potentates or their successors, but an extension of commerce, on the other hand, forms a binding engagement between the people of two countries, and I believe, in proportion to its extension, will eventually make war between them less likely, I might almost say impossible. I am unwilling to trouble your Lordships now further upon this point, but the Amendment proposed by my noble friend requires me to notice some of his arguments. He started from an assumption that it was the established rule and practice to lay before Parliament an announcement of the intention of the Sovereign to enter into hostilities with a foreign nation. I am surprised that my noble Friend should have framed his proposition upon so broad a basis, for I believe writers upon international law have greatly differed upon the subject whether it is necessary to proclaim war under all circumstances, and if it be not, it can hardly be maintained that it is absolutely required to lay the intentions of the Sovereign before Parliament. But surely my noble Friend does not forget that, notwithstanding the example of 1790 and 1826, to which he has referred, the rule which he regards as an established rule has been repeatedly departed from during the last thirty years. My noble Friend shakes his head, but I believe I am not wrong in saying that, although what he describes may have been the general rule in cases of hostilities with European nations, yet there are few, if any, instances where it has been adhered to in cases of hostilities with eastern nations. The noble Earl must admit moreover, that it has not even been the universal rule with regard to European instances, for he cannot have forgotten the cases of Portugal in 1831, and of Greece at a subsequent period, not to mention other instances of smaller or greater importance. My noble Friend has said that he hopes the Government will not attempt to set up as their defence the fact that Parliament was not sitting, nor the argument that they had sufficient funds resulting from the Votes of Parliament for other purposes to enable them to carry on hostilities. As to the last-mentioned ground of defence, I certainly shall not have recourse to it. I am perfectly aware that, under whatever circumstances the revenue may be raised, Parliament only intended it to meet such contingencies as were contemplated at the time when the Estimates were framed. But the other ground—that Parliament was not sitting at the time—I consider to be an important and legitimate defence of the conduct of the Government. In the two cases which have been quoted by my noble Friend, in 1790 and 1826, it happens that both occurred while Parliament was sitting. Surely there is a great difference between the Sovereign communicating to Parliament, during the Session, the state of affairs with regard to foreign countries and his summoning Parliament together specially to consult it upon an event which might never occur. However, it is not necessary to rely upon that circumstance for a defence in the present instance, for my noble Friend has based his argument upon the supposition that we are about to commence war with a nation with whom we were previously at peace. I say that is not the case here. We are not commencing new hostilities with China; we have never been at peace with China for the last two years, and at the very moment when the transactions at the Peiho occurred we had possession, and still retain, one of the most important towns of the Chinese Empire. Surely that cannot be called a state of peace? A treaty, no doubt, was negotiated by my noble Friend near me (the Earl of Elgin), which Mr. Bruce was proceeding to Peking to ratify, but it could not be a treaty of peace until it was ratified, and until that ratification took place we were not at peace with China. However, I shall not dwell upon this point at present, for my noble Friend himself has told us that there must be many other occasions when the subject of this Chinese war must be fully considered ; but he has mentioned some of his objections to that war which I will slightly notice. My noble Friend says we had no right to attempt to pass up the Peiho, and that we should have taken some other route than that which we considered to be the highway to the capital. Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to enter into that question whenever it shall come fairly before Parliament, and I will only say now, that we had every right to consider that river to be the proper highway to Peking, if not the only highway. In proof of this statement I may observe that in the Russian treaty, agreed to in May last, there is a clause—the second—giving the Russians a right to proceed to the capital of China either by their usual overland route or by this very route of the Peiho, or by any other route. I believe, without any attempt at special pleading, it might be shown that under the “favoured nation” clause of the treaty of 1843 we might insist upon this route, but I do not wish to urge it now, and only mention the last treaty with Russia to establish the fact that there was a deliberate determination on the part of the Emperor of China or his Government or people to treat the English nation differently from the Russians, and to exclude us from a route which was allowed to the latter nation as the proper route to the capital by treaty only a month before. My noble Friend also indulged in some general phrases with regard to the horrors of war. Now, I respect him for the feelings which he entertains on all occasions upon this subject, although I think that he sometimes allows them to carry him too far. But will my noble Friend maintain for one instant, that if the honour of the country is involved we ought to consider whether we may, to a certain extent, be endangering our commerce, and whether by carrying on hostilities with China we may not injure, even to a considerable extent, the tea trade ? Those are no doubt important considerations in themselves, but when the country has been outraged by attacks upon its forces, in which 400 or 500 Englishmen were struck down, I cannot think that my noble Friend, having, as I know he has, the honour of his country at heart, would urge that then, being smitten on the one cheek, we should turn the other to be smitten also. If then, my Lords, it can be shown that we are bound to prepare this fleet and army, for the purpose of vindicating the national honour and of obtaining reparation for the injuries inflicted upon us, providing it can be obtained in no other way, I think that on a future occasion, when this subject comes to be discussed, I may claim the vote of my noble Friend himself, in common with the rest of your Lordships. That we were bound to take such a course, to uphold our honour as a nation, I firmly believe ; but I will not enter upon the question now, and am only sorry that my noble Friend has forced me to say so much. Her Majesty has announced that papers will be laid before Parliament, and when those are forthcoming we shall be enabled to understand and to discuss this subject much more clearly. As to the point which forms the basis of my noble Friend's Amendment—that the Ministry have committed an act of disloyalty to the Parliament of Great Britain by not laying before them their intentions respecting China—I repeat that this is not an established rule, though it may be a convenient one ; and, even if it were an established rule, I maintain that in the instance before us it has not been violated, because we have not been at peace with China, and had nothing, therefore, to communicate. All we could have informed Parliament of was that the treaty with China had not been ratified, and that the war was therefore continuing. But were we to call Parliament together in order to make such an announcement ? I rose simply to answer the observations of my noble Friend, and I trust, therefore, I shall be excused if I do not enter now into the other topics of Her Majesty's Speech. I cannot help thinking, in conclusion, that your Lordships will not agree with my noble Friend on the issue he has raised, and will not support his Amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY, who was imperfectly heard, said, he, for one, agreed in the principle which had been laid down by his noble Friend (Earl Grey). In his opinion it would have accorded better with Parliamentary usage, and would have been more to the public advantage, if the Government had called Parliament together and acquainted it with their intentions when the new rupture with China took place. He would not, however, enter into any details on the question before their Lordships, as a more convenient opportunity of discussing it would arise ; at the same time he might observe he could not agree with the noble Duke that no Amendment was to be moved upon the Address unless some great party question presented itself.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he had added, "or in case the Ministry of the day had inserted words in the Royal Speech with which it was impossible for the Opposition to agree."

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, seeing that no great unity of feeling could exist in the Cabinet as to the war with China, he thought the country had a right to information as to the course which was being taken. With respect to the treaty of commerce, it was certainly desirable that the discussion on that matter should be postponed for some more fitting occasion; but it had been rather forced upon them by the encomiums of the noble seconder of the Address. The treaty was described as a precursor of friendship and of peace between the two nations, and as a positive barrier to any future war. He was sorry to say he had lately read an address from the master manufacturers of France to the French Emperor, in which they hardly seemed to take the same view. "You have reduced us," they concluded, "to this alternative,—either we must submit to ruin, or must tear the treaty by cannon-balls." That certainly did not look as though the treaty would insure permanent concord between France and England. Only that morning he had received, from one on whose authority he thoroughly relied, a letter which by no means foreshadowed the halcyon age of peace and commerce now spoken of. Armaments of all kinds, his informant said, were now being pressed on in France with the utmost vigour. Naval armaments were continued as though war was expected next week. Munitions of war were being prepared, steel plating for ships was ordered all over the country, vessels were being built, guns proved, and the French dockyards rang with work night and day. Such preparations formed rather a curious concomitant of universal peace, and he could not forget that those who spoke of tearing the treaty with cannon-ball complained of the surprise practised on them by our illustrious neighbour, saying there had been a positive engagement that these changes should not be made without previous inquiry, and that the treaty with England had been hurried on as the means of breaking faith with them. Was this likely to promote good feeling between the two countries? Then, too, there was a strange kind of reciprocity in the treaty, for whereas England was to give at once all the advantages which were asked for, France delayed her concessions until a period extremely remote. He recollected that in 1848 he was very anxious that there should be a practical proof of the good feeling which existed between England and France; and he told M. Lamartine, who had made a great free-trade speech at Marseilles, that the best means of establishing a good understanding between the two countries was to enter freely into a consideration of their tariffs with a view to a relaxation of them; but the hopes which he entertained on that subject were unhappily not fulfilled. M. Lamartine told him that the more popular was the form of the French Government, the more difficulty would there be on this question. He confessed, therefore, considering the disposition of the people of France, that he did not anticipate such a halcyon summer in 1861 as had been predicted; and he was disposed to think it was rather dangerous to have fixed the precise day after which the proposed changes were to take place. He now came to another part of the Royal Speech, but he did not intend to move any Amendment upon it, although he entertained some objection to the phrases it contained: the part he referred to was the following:—

"Desirous at all times to concur in proceedings having for their object the maintenance of peace, I accepted the invitation, but, at the same time, I made known that, in such a Congress, I should steadfastly maintain the principle that no external force should be employed to impose upon the people of Italy any particular Government or Constitution."

He quite agreed that these were not the times when this country should sanction any such proceeding, however unjust might often be the means by which the settled order of things had been upset; but he objected to the phrase put into Her Majesty's mouth respecting any particular government being imposed "upon the people of Italy." Who, he asked, were the people of Italy? [Ironical cheers from the Ministerial side.] He knew Italy as well as his noble Friends opposite, and felt as sincere an interest in that country, and therefore he thought that the ironical cheers of his noble Friends on the other side were hardly justified; but in reference to the people not yielding to external force, who, he again asked, were the people of Italy? Italy consisted of various States, with various dialects, governed by different Govern-

with China. However, I shall not dwell upon this point at present, for my noble Friend himself has told us that there must be many other occasions when the subject of this Chinese war must be fully considered ; but he has mentioned some of his objections to that war which I will slightly notice. My noble Friend says we had no right to attempt to pass up the Peiho, and that we should have taken some other route than that which we considered to be the highway to the capital. He would not, however, enter into any details on the question before their Lordships, as a more convenient opportunity of discussing it would arise ; at the same time well applied, might be praiseworthy and reasonable, but they have been willingly deceived in their application at the pleasure of a tyrannical majority. From whom have the British Government received their information as to the present condition of Tuscany? From honest men? Certainly not; they have always refused to listen to them, and the newspapers have refused to publish facts, though guaranteed by persons worthy of faith. They have confined their information to that which is published in the papers here, which is always at variance with the truth. They have received intelligence from the English Chargé d'Affaires at Florence."

The English Chargé d'Affaires spoken of had, he (the Marquess of Normanby) was informed, attended the reception of M. Buoncompagni. Now, he perfectly remembered that, in 1848, a distinct expression of opinion had been conveyed to him, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, that so long as there was no settled government in a country, no representative of England, acting unofficially, ought to take part in any public demonstration, and upon those recognized rules he had acted during the whole of the French Revolution until, in August 1848, he was regularly accredited to General Cavaignac as head of the Executive Government, appointed by the National Assembly. The letter proceeded to state:—

"The great majority of loyal citizens have hitherto been cowed and silenced by imprisonment, by domiciliary visits, thousands of which have taken place, while a band of paid agitators, commanded by a certain Delf, daily threatens the well-disposed. The majority of loyal men comprises at least three-fourths of the population, but they have never yet been able to make their wishes public, because this armed portion of the dregs of the people menace with death any manifestation from those who are entirely unarmed, and have no means of meeting in order to overthrow these usurpers. Their silence has therefore been taken as showing assent to the present order of things. The foreign newspapers have been persuaded or bribed in a spirit of partiality to suppress all accounts of local disorders, all the significant manifestations which have occurred, anything, in short, from which could be inferred the real feeling of the country. The arms of Sardinia, which have been placed over all the public buildings in the town by order of the Government, are nightly bespattered with mud. The troops begin to mutiny, the dungeons are crowded with political prisoners, the homes of thousands have been violated. The National Guard never stir without loaded pieces. And yet we are told that the most perfect order reigns, and the English Government itself cruel manner, men who were more liberal than themselves. Of this nature was the injury inflicted on Signor Montecchi, who had held high office, and who was said at that time, 1849, although connected with the extreme party at Rome, to be enlightened and moderate in his own opinions. Letters were opened at the post-office, and in one, which was not signed, but supposed by the Government to come from Mazzini, were discovered some expressions to which a dangerous meaning was attached. He was arrested at Leghorn, and having been thrown into a dungeon but without being brought to trial, the utter absence of any evidence to connect him with political offences was so apparent as to cause the charge against him to be dismissed. The Tuscan correspondent of The Times had published the fact to the world, adding that Signor Montecchi's letters gave painful details of his treatment; but if these letters were published, as stated in many Foreign journals, the English press had never noticed them. Now, in a very curious document, entitled La Politica Napoleonica e il Sovrano Toscano, written by one of the most distinguished men of the liberal party in Italy, Signor Ampère, but which from the place of its publication must be presumed to have the sanction of the Emperor, it was shown that the French Emperor had been deceived by Sardinia as to the amount of force which she had at her disposal, and the assistance which the Italian States might expect from her. Instead of keeping up her army to the amount of 100,000 men, which was the extent of her army in 1849, there were not 50,000 men in arms; and as stated by that author, he had good reason to believe that this was one of the reasons which tended to disgust the Emperor Louis Napoleon with the war, and induced him to sign the treaty of Villafranca. Another object of the writer seemed to be to show that the inhabitants of the Central Italian States were averse from annexation to Piedmont, and desired the restoration of their former rulers. He further said, that the noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Lord J. Russell) who was now so anxious to alter ments and separated from each other for ages. In short there was no nationality in Italy, and he recollected last Session his noble and learned Friend near him (Lord Brougham) saying there could be no such thing as a united Italy. He therefore felt that he was entirely justified in remarking on the particular phrase put into Her Majesty's mouth, to which he had called their Lordships' attention. Again, the phrase raised a question, which had hitherto been considered settled from the dark ages downwards. Were treaty obligations binding or were they no longer to be so considered? It was a novel and startling doctrine that popular outcry in any country was to establish a right to change the government and territorial arrangements. Besides, had it been ascertained that in this instance the popular outcry was the honest expression of the national will, and not brought about by foreign influence or gold, or intimidation practised by Foreigners who had usurped the Government? An expression of popular opinion created in that way was no justification for a change of Government and deposition of rulers. Again, if in 1860 they agreed to ratify a change of territorial limits in accordance with the popular outcry of the day, they must equally recognize the same principle in 1861, should the popular outcry turn round by that time. In 1848, Lombardy was annexed to Sardinia by a popular vote; and in the autumn of the same year deputies were sent to Paris to say that this was not what the people wished; and that the vote had been obtained by deception. General Cavaignac requested I would see some of these deputies, as I had hitherto given him to understand that the policy of my Government was rather to encourage the annexation of Lombardy to Sardinia if there were to be any change of territorial limits. I conceived myself that nothing could then be so distasteful to the Lombards as such an arrangement. If they acted at all in the matter, they should guard themselves against recognizing any new settlement, until they were quite satisfied it was in accordance with the opinion and the wishes of the people; and Ministers would have advised Her Majesty to express herself more correctly if the Royal Speech had said that any proposed new Government, or constitution, or change of territorial limits should be in accordance with the well ascertained independent vote of the natives of the State. The last time they had assembled in that House his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary had stated that he was content to leave the result to the well-matured deliberation of the Tuscan people. But what was the fact? There had been no deliberation whatever, and they afforded the only instance of a deliberate assembly, who, without one single word uttered, or one single reason given, had destroyed the constitution under which they had for years been governed, and had declared in favour of annexation to a State which was a stranger to their own. He would read a few lines which he had received from an Englishman who was well acquainted with Tuscany, and especially with its financial condition; and, perhaps, before both Houses of Parliament agreed that it was desirable to annex Tuscany to Piedmont, it might be well to ascertain what the effect of such a measure would be upon the interests of this country—interests which they had been that night told were to form the basis of international legislation. The letter stated:—

“There is no longer an ad valorem duty on English manufactures. The duty is regulated by weight; fine Saxony cloth pays the same duty as coarse Manchester fabrics; duty of cotton goods and produce of the Potteries is doubled; colonial produce doubled; mixed stuffs of silk and cotton are rated as pure silk—all to protect Piedmontese manufactures! Articles paying 15 per cent. now pay 10. Piedmont has no colonial possessions, no manufactures or commerce worth mentioning, but just sufficient to oblige them to adopt the protective duties. They cannot compete with England and France even with a duty of 20 per cent. I know of an hotel keeper at Genoa, who stated that in '48 he paid 60 francs a year duty on his house, and [this is now increased to 1,500. . . . The equalization of taxation, which would compel all Tuscany, Parma, and Modena to pay from 50 to 60 per cent., would relieve Piedmont from the levy of 75 per cent. on her population.”

He would next read a letter from a Tuscan gentleman of position and intelligence. The writer said:—

“If the English Government had followed their profession of absolute neutrality desired by the English people they would not so much have compromised the Government of England, which had always formerly been known as one desirous to maintain settled order in Europe. But since her statesmen and her organs of public opinion have allowed themselves to be deceived by the false reports of a factious and lying minority, they have deservedly exposed themselves to the criticism of all other nations for having, without due consideration, encouraged revolution and anarchy. The principles which the English Government now profess are such as must produce disorganization and ruin in any monarchy. The English Government pretends to sustain the rights of the people as claimed by the majority, and to free Italy from the yoke of the stranger. These principles, if at last free from foreign domination. They had not perhaps established an Italian Kingdom, but they had freed from foreign domination several of the petty Italian States. One, two, three or four of those States had successively allied themselves to Sardinia, or declared their desire to do so. And all that England could now wish was, that foreign interference with Italy should be prevented; that the Italians should be left to themselves, to fight their own battles, to form their own Government, and choose their own rulers as they thought fit, provided they did it without Austrian, French, or any other interference. His noble Friend (Lord Normanby) objected to the expressions in the speech, people of Italy, because he said there was no such people. Would his noble Friend take the plural instead of the singular, and allow him to say, the peoples of Italy? He had yet to learn why several different Italian States, or a group of those States, should not secure their own freedom without the interference of the foreigner, the Modenese assisting the Tuscans, and the Tuscans assisting the people of Parma. No one was originally more opposed than he was to the treaties of Vienna in 1814-15. He condemned them in the other House of Parliament over and over again; but after they became as it were the statute law of Europe, it was in vain to argue against them. When Charles Albert attacked Austria, some twelve years ago, we objected to his conduct, because it was calculated to disturb the distribution of kingdoms which had been effected in 1815. That attack failed, but it had since been repeated, and had been signally successful—a result due not to want of valour, of the greatest valour, on the part of the soldiers of Austria, but to the errors of her councils, which were as great as those of the Aulic Council, which marshalled the way to the victories of the First Napoleon, and to the incapacity of her generals, each of whom showed himself to be almost more unfit for command than his predecessor. It was to be hoped that the struggle would be succeeded by a settlement in which regard would, of course, in some degree, be had to the relative force of the parties engaged in the contest, but in which deference would also be paid to a consideration of what was just and fair. He would noble Friend had alluded to the expected treaty of commerce between this country and France. He had an old prejudice, if it be one, against commercial treaties, which was not wholly without effect in the present instance, thinking that duties ought to be levied or removed without regard to diplomatic views; but, nevertheless, he had less objection to this treaty than to almost any other of the kind that he remembered; and he was quite convinced that the greatest possible advantage would result to France and some to ourselves from the commercial policy which the Emperor had announced his intention to pursue, and which he had no doubt would be carried much further. In France he had heard great objections to the treaty. It was pretended that all the benefits resulting from it would fall to England, and that France would derive but little advantage from its operation. He would not go the length of saying that it was a treaty wholly for the benefit of France, because he believed that England would gain considerably by it, but he was quite clear that our gain from its operation would be as nothing compared with that of France. Our gain was to be postponed for eighteen months; our neighbour's would be immediate. Our gain would be to a very small extent; theirs to a very large one. The outcry against the treaty reminded him of what had frequently occurred in this country. No step was ever taken in the direction of free trade, or of the removal of restrictions, that a clamour was not immediately raised by some party which, though numerically large, was not so in comparison with the rest of the community, but the members of which made up for their want of numbers by the violence with which they strained their throats; so that, to listen to them, any one would have thought all England was against the measure. Probably the most extensive,—in deference to some of his noble friends near him, he would not say clamour—he could hardly call it argument or even declamation,—but he would only say the most extensive utterance was that against the repeal of the corn laws; and yet we had lived to see the day when a real, genuine, uncompromising Protectionist could only find his proper place in one of our museums, among the relics of the ancient world, or extinct animals. The the Emperor tended idly feeling between tranquillity, too, prevailed all over the Continent. The liberal policy now inaugurated by the French Government would tend to confirm and consolidate that peace. But, he had been asked in Paris, "If that be so, why do you go on arming?" In answer to that question he would remind his French friends of a proverb of their own:—"When it is fair weather, be sure to take your cloak with you; when it is foul weather, do as you please." At present all was peace. The storm had ceased, the wind no longer blew, the thunder, if it rolled at all, rolled at a distance, and the lightning was but sheet lightning, that glanced innocuous through the sky. Then according to the wise proverb, let us be prepared for all exigences. We lived in an armed world. There were prodigious armies all around us; armies of 500,000 men in one country, of 300,000 or 400,000 men in another; beside naval armaments, which were being increased, as they are told, in the time of peace. Who, moreover, could answer for the chapter of accidents, or predict what state of things might exist six years—aye, or six months hence? It was, therefore, absolutely necessary that we should be armed—he would not say to the teeth—but sufficiently to make all attacks upon us not only impossible to succeed, but impossible to be attempted. He had been in the north of England since Parliament was last prorogued. He there found that one question which once used to excite a very lively interest, he meant the question of Parliamentary reform, was asleep if not dead—dead even in Yorkshire, where it used to be quite a local question. But it was far otherwise with electoral corruption. He had taken the liberty, while among his old friends and constituents in that county, to chide them, and to chide them pretty severely, for the share they had in that corruption, some of the very worst cases of the kind having occurred in that quarter. He was zealously and constantly supported in all his references to that topic by those whom he had addressed, and they showed themselves as stoutly determined to put down by all possible means that curse of our representative system as he could have wished to see them. But the subject on which of all others there was the greatest earnestness and even enthusiasm, as well as the most perfect unanimity in those assemblages, was the defence of the country. Everywhere, and he found it the same in Northumberland as well as in his own county, and in Lancashire, every where there was the most entire agreement as to the necessity, at all costs, at all pains, and all risks, of putting the country, by every means which human wisdom could devise and human activity employ, on a footing of perfect and absolute security.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY was understood to remark that Sardinia ought not to have any influence in the final settlement of the Italian question, but that the people ought to be left to declare their wishes without any extraneous influence.

THE EARL OF DERBY:—My Lords, I do not recollect any occasion on which a Speech from the Throne, touching on such a variety of important topics, was treated in debate with greater silence by Her Majesty's Ministers than we have seen preserved by them in this instance. The noble Mover and Seconder of the Address, no doubt, made very excellent speeches; but, unfortunately, I was unable, from the tone of voice in which they spoke, to hear more than a word here and there of the one, and not a syllable perfectly of the other. And notwithstanding the great variety and importance of the subjects adverted to in Her Majesty's Speech, we have heard from Her Majesty's Ministers not one single word in the course of this discussion, except the few remarks which fell from the noble Duke opposite, in reply to the statements on the Amendment moved with great ability by the noble Earl. Of many of the topics referred to in the Queen's Speech no notice whatever has been taken by any preceding speaker; and I am not going, more than by a single word, to deviate from the course which others have followed. Even on those subjects to which our attention has been called, and on which I shall have to make a few observations, I trust I shall be able to confine myself within very moderate limits; for, as far as this discussion has gone, there does not seem to be any very serious difference of opinion between those who sit on different sides of this House. Certainly, among the great variety of topics which have been entirely passed over, I am not surprised that no notice should have been taken of the treaty concluded with the Tycoon of Japan, or of the Treaty regarding boundaries which has been entered into with the Republic of Guatemala—a very important subject, nevertheless, and one likely to have a very important influence on the serious questions pending between this country and the United States. I do not suppose that the silence with respect to those treaties arises from the fact that they were begun by the predecessors of Her Majesty's present Government, because the ratifications have been exchanged since the present Ministry came into office. But I certainly thought it probable that greater attention would have been paid, in the course of this debate, to proceedings which at one time threatened to lead to very grave consequences, consequences which, however, have been averted—as is most truly stated in the Speech—by the judicious forbearance and admirable behaviour of the naval and civil officers of Her Britannic Majesty in the neighbourhood of Vancouver's Island. I must also do justice to the conciliatory spirit in which the representations of our Government on this subject were met by the Government of the United States; and I can only concur in the earnest hope that the questions out of which this difference has arisen “may be amicably settled, in a manner conformable with the just rights of the two countries.” There is, my Lords, another subject with regard to which I have listened to the remarks made to-night with unfeigned astonishment. Up to the present moment I certainly did expect to hear, even in your Lordships' House, some more complimentary mention than has yet been made of the question of Parliamentary Reform; but since the commencement of this debate the only hint we have had that this subject is under consideration, or has ever been discussed, fell from my noble and learned Friend who has just sat down, and who emphatically assured us that, from one end to the other of an important district, where there used to be a pretty extensive reforming element—as the noble and learned Lord in former days had reason to know—he did not find a single person who cared one farthing about reform. I had certainly thought that the zeal and enthusiasm on that question was not quite so great as has been represented, and I have seen hints tending to throw a wet blanket over it emanating from quarters of great eminence; but I was not prepared for the sweeping and unqualified statement of the noble and learned Lord as to the public indifference in respect to a subject which Her Majesty has recommended more than once to the careful consideration of her Parliament. I can only say, my Lords, that if Parliament proceeds to consider the question in the same cool and dispassionate spirit with which the people of Yorkshire and Lancashire appear to treat it there is little apprehension of any very serious danger to the constitution, or of any very revolutionary principle being introduced into the Bill of the Government. Now, having just touched on some points to which no attention has been called, there are others on which I am sure but one feeling must pervade all classes of Her Majesty's subjects, and that is, a feeling of universal satisfaction and gratitude to Providence for the happy prospects which Her Majesty is able to hold forth in the Speech from the Throne. I am sure all must deeply rejoice when Her Majesty states that “the great interests of the country are generally in a sound and thriving condition, that pauperism and crime have diminished, and that throughout the whole of my empire, both in the United Kingdom and in my Colonies and possessions beyond sea, there reigns a spirit of loyalty, of contentment, of order, and of obedience to the law.” I say, every one must rejoice to hear such language from the Throne, and more especially as I believe in my conscience, with the exception of an ebullition of some little animated Irish feeling, the statement may be taken to be tolerably correct. No one, I repeat, can hear such a statement, which Her Majesty was justified in making to Parliament, without the most lively satisfaction and gratitude. Nor is it a less gratifying subject for congratulation, that by a mixture of firmness and humanity, by listening to the dictates of justice and policy, as well as by the combined devotion and energy of our troops, an end has not only been put to that formidable insurrection which so long disturbed our Indian empire, but there exists a reasonable expectation that the restoration of peace will be followed by good and friendly feeling between the Government and the Native Princes and a steady increase in the prosperity and welfare of Her Majesty's subjects in India. I cannot but rejoice to think that these happy results have been materially assisted by the adoption of the spirit of a proclamation which Her Majesty was advised to issue, of a policy at once just, generous, and conciliatory, and dealing, more especially with the revolted subjects of Oude, in a temper and manner more in accordance with that recommended by my noble Friend (the Earl of Ellenborough), who then filled the office of President of the Board of Control, than that which, whether rightly or wrongly, we had been led to apprehend was contemplated by the Governor-General of India. It is due, however, to that noble Earl to say that in his actual dealings with the talookdars of Oude he has combined with justice a wise and well-considered policy; and I believe that by his clemency, generosity, and more especially by his regard for territorial rights, he has done more to re-establish and maintain an empire in that part of India than could have been effected by all the measures of repression which any Government could devise or any army enforce. There is one other subject of congratulation, to which I gladly take this opportunity of referring. I cannot but rejoice that Her Majesty has been advised to express in the Speech from the Throne the gratification and pride with which she has received such extensive offers of voluntary service from her people. I think that expression was due to the spirit of loyalty and patriotism which has been manifested by all ranks and classes in the country in defence of Her Majesty's Crown. I trust in God that the service of my countrymen will never be required, for there is only one occasion on which such service can be rendered; but at the same time that does not diminish the merit due to the spirit in which they have come forward or diminish the value of the service they have thus rendered by its tender under present circumstances; for I am perfectly certain that with regard to our influence abroad, as well as our security at home, nothing could produce a greater or more powerful effect than the spontaneous, universal burst of patriotic devotion which has shown that with all our wealth and with all our commercial anxieties and rivalries they will not for a single moment be put in the scale in comparison with the safety of our beloved country from the horrible prospect of invasion, from whatever quarter it may come. There are three topics, and only three, on which comments have been made in this discussion, and to which I would now allude. They are all of them most extensive and important; far too important and extensive for me to do more than allude to them in this discussion. The first of these questions is the Commercial Treaty, with regard to which it is rather singular that Her Majesty's Speech has not been able to furnish us with the latest information. Her Majesty's Speech says:—

The Earl of Derby

The fact, I believe, is that at the time we are speaking the treaty to which Her Majesty thus vaguely refers as the result of these communications has actually been signed at Paris. Among the few words I was able to collect from the noble Lord who seconded the Address was an expression in the terms of which I wholly concur, though I fear in a somewhat different sense from that in which he used it. The noble seconder of the Address has told us, he hardly knew in what terms to express his gratitude for the reductions in the tariff announced in Her Majesty's Speech. Now, I hardly know in what terms to express my gratification, but for a different reason, because I really do not know what the reductions are, or what is to be the extent of the sacrifices we are to be called on to make for these advantages. Being wholly unknown to me, I am unable, in adequate terms, to describe them; but I must confess that so far as I do know them I do not consider them a matter for unmixed congratulation. I have my doubts whether the peculiar time at which this treaty is signed, as being well calculated on by the Government and their friends across the water, is likely to produce a very favourable impression on the public mind; and all I can hope is, that the public mind in England will be well informed as to the nature of the arrangement before conclusions are formed as to the advantages to be received from it. I don't hesitate for a single moment to say, that the extension of commercial intercourse between this country and France is an object of the greatest national importance to both countries; and I should rejoice to see any opportunity taken for legitimately extending that trade, believing as I do that the extension of commercial intercourse, though it cannot be a complete preservative against the hazard of war between the two countries, must always exercise a great moral influence in indisposing both Frenchmen and the people of this country unnecessarily or rashly to enter into a war, and more especially as our commerce with France has certainly been much more restricted than might be desired or expected, considering the relative position of these countries and their means of supplying each other with the articles they respectively require. I sincerely and cordially rejoice in anything likely to extend the commercial intercourse between this country and France; but with regard to the terms on which this treaty proceeds, and the mode in which the Government have come to it. I must forbear expressing, nay, I must postpone even the formation of an opinion until I know more about it. The noble Earl who moved the Amendment discussed this subject with his usual ability and freedom. He laid down most distinctly and clearly the principles of free trade as he understands them, and no doubt he most accurately and most properly laid them down. He also drew a broad, clear, intelligible distinction between the principles of free trade—as he contended for them—and the principles of the extension of commercial intercourse through the medium of treaties of reciprocity or commercial treaties of any kind. I am not about to enter on a discussion of the abstract merits of the two principles. I do not at all dispute the proposition laid down by the noble Earl, that it is for the advantage of any country to make such reductions of duties as shall, consistently with its general interests and the purposes of revenue, enable its population to obtain articles of primary necessity on easy terms, irrespective altogether of corresponding reductions in the tariff of foreign countries as affecting its manufactures. But, on the other hand. I am not prepared to say, that there may not be occasions, and many occasions too, on which you may obtain essential advantages for the manufactures of your own country on condition of conceding similar advantages to the manufactures of other countries, and consequently the conferring of these advantages on the manufactures of other countries may be made a most powerful instrument in your hand for obtaining reciprocal advantages from other countries. But it appears to me that the Government has pursued a most extraordinary course on this subject, because the noble Lords opposite, condemning the principle of reciprocity and commercial treaties altogether, now enter into a commercial treaty giving advantages on one side in consideration of advantages on another. And when do they do it? At a time when no step whatever is taken by the country seeking these advantages from us, and when we have made almost every concession to the commerce of France it is possible for us to make. We first of all give away freely almost all we have to give, and having given away everything we then go to barter on the principle of commercial reciprocity, which they all along condemn. They first give away almost all they have, and then deal with their customers on the principle of exchange. I do not know, I have no means of knowing, what advantages we are to obtain, or what sacrifices we are to make; but, with regard to this treaty, if I am rightly informed, the conditions in the first place, as stated to-night, and not denied on the other side, are that on the one side the advantages we are to give are to come into operation immediately, whereas the corresponding reductions to be granted on the other side are not to come into operation for a period of eighteen months. I pass by the question that the articles which are about to be admitted into France at a lower rate of duty than is at present the case are those very articles which are of vital importance to her, more especially for warlike purposes, and shall content myself with simply observing that among the manufactures which she will, under the operation of the treaty, take from us—if, indeed, the term manufactures is applicable to them at all—are those very articles which require the least amount of skill and labour to be applied in their adaptation to use: whereas the article which we shall receive from France is a staple commodity of that country, the production of which involves the longest industrial occupation in which the French people are engaged. But if there be objections upon general grounds to the principle of a commercial treaty, I think those objections acquire considerably increased force in the case of a treaty such as that of which I am speaking, regulating as it does the precise amount of duty to be paid on certain articles; and if ever there was a time when the Government of this country ought to be cautious in committing itself to the reduction of a duty which now produces a revenue of nearly £2,000,000—the exact sum, I believe, is 1,800,000 and odd pounds—that time is surely the present, when, in connection with the loss of revenue thus created, the enormous demands which in all probability must be made upon the Exchequer, for objects the most vital and necessary, ought to be taken into consideration. It is, therefore, my Lords, that I cannot help regarding it as, under those circumstances, a most unfortunate policy to bind yourself to a large reduction of duty on an article of simple luxury by entering into a treaty by which, supposing it should not answer your expectations in a financial point of view, you would still be bound, and without the power of retracing your steps. Recollect that we are at this moment on a friendly footing with France.

vailed all over the Continent. The liberal policy now inaugurated by the French Government would tend to confirm and consolidate that peace. But, he had been asked in Paris, "If that be so, why do you go on arming?" I do instructions which he received at our hands. Whether it is capable of justification by other instructions or on other grounds I am not now in a position to say. A grave question in connection with this point has been raised by the noble Earl who moved the Amendment. It is one, too, I am bound to say, which it is not easy to answer in the affirmative. That question is, whether all the blame of those unfortunate transactions which occurred at the mouth of the Peiho is to be thrown entirely upon the Chinese, and whether we ourselves are exempt from all charge of precipitation and imprudence in connection with the matter? The point is one which I do not now wish to discuss. We shall, in all probability, have at no distant day fuller information and more ample means to enable us to do justice to a subject so important and of such great extent. There is, however, one topic in connection with it which I must not pass over on the present occasion. It is a topic which I am sorry to find has not received publicly, whatever may be the case privately, that attention which it seems to me to fairly deserve. I now allude to the heroic conduct which was displayed by the Admiral and the seamen who were engaged in the conflict which took place at the mouth of the Peiho. In referring to that conduct your Lordships will, I am sure, concur with me in the justice of the sentiment that the meed of praise and honour is not to be the meed of success alone. I may add, that unsuccessful though this unfortunate expedition to the mouth of the Peiho may have been, I know of no other in which the daring gallantry and perseverance of British seamen and British troops have ever been more signally exhibited than in that unhappy encounter. I feel assured, too, that these brave men who have suffered so severely in person and in mind from the failure of their expedition will have justice done them by their fellow-countrymen, who, whatever they may think of the policy of the proceeding, will not fail to pay the tribute of their admiration to those unparalleled efforts by which success was sought to be attained, and which, even in the midst of defeat, were of a character nobly to maintain the national honour. The gallant officer who was chief in command of the expedition—Admiral Hope—received a most severe wound on the occasion; and the manner in which, after re-

self in those positions most exposed to danger, furnishes, in my opinion, an example of almost unmatched devotion to his duty, and of an heroic bravery which cannot be surpassed by anything, even in the annals of the British naval service. Now, the noble Earl opposite (Earl Grey) has, in the course of this discussion, called our attention to what he considers to be the neglect of Her Majesty's Government in not immediately, upon the receipt of the intelligence of those events, calling Parliament together for the purpose of consulting it as to the course which ought to be pursued; and it is, undoubtedly, under ordinary circumstances the duty of the Ministers of the Crown to take no step so serious as that which involves their country in war without seizing the earliest opportunity to secure—if possible even before taking so serious a step—the sanction of the Legislature to the course which they desired to pursue. I doubt not, moreover, that if Parliament happened to be sitting at the time, the Government would have availed themselves of the earliest opportunity to bring the whole subject of the war with China under our notice. The noble Earl opposite, however, seems to think that it was equally their duty to take this course, even though Parliament was not assembled. Now, in that respect, I do not altogether concur in the view to which the noble Earl has given expression. There are other matters which must be taken into consideration in determining upon such a point, and other motives which might render the calling together of the Members of the Legislature on such occasions a matter of difficulty. I am also disposed to give some weight to the argument of the noble Duke (the Duke of Newcastle) that this is not, in point of fact, the first declaration of war with the Chinese. Hostilities had been previously sanctioned by Parliament, as I think most unfortunately. Not that I think we had no cause of complaint with the Chinese; but I thought the Government acted with great imprudence in sanctioning the act of an officer on the spot, who took on himself to decide for the Government whether there was or was not a sufficient cause for war. We never had since been really at peace with China, because peace has never been ratified by that Power. We continued then in the state, not of war, but of hostilities with China. But I must take the liberty of saying that that fact disposes of another argument of the noble Duke opposite, for if we were at war the Chinese were fully justified in strengthening their ports, and if we were not at war there was no occasion nor justification for our destroying them. I dissent altogether from the opinion laid down that we had a perfect right to force our way up the Chinese river. On the question of right there was nothing whatever said in the treaty as regards the manner in which we should go to Tien-tsin. We were informed that barriers had been placed at the entrance to the river and that resistance would be offered to our passage; and under those circumstances we had no more right to force our way up that river than, as had been happily said in the course of the debate, a French squadron would have to force its way up the Thames with an Ambassador, accompanied by an armed escort. But the important point to which I wish to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government is this. We call on the Chinese to respect international rights and the usages of civilization. Do we expect them to deal with us in accordance with our views of those matters? I entreat the Government to take care that we deal the same measure to the Chinese which we require at their hands; and that if hostilities are to be renewed they shall be renewed on a more regular footing than hostilities were formerly waged against that people. I had some experience upon this subject during the time I had the honour of holding office, of the extreme difficulty and embarrassment to which this country might be exposed in consequence of an irregular mode of carrying on a war. Without a declaration of war we have no right to introduce a blockade, to force our way up the rivers of another power, to establish a prize court, or to capture a single vessel. We learn that at present the United States and Russia have had commercial advantages secured to them by treaties with China. I entreat the Government to consider what will be the consequences if, without a declaration of war, should it be necessary to resort to hostilities—which I earnestly trust it may not be—we, undertaking a blockade of the Chinese rivers, stop a vessel belonging to the United States or to Russia in the prosecution of a legitimate trade. Your blockade will be treated as wholly illegal, for illegal it will be, and you will be answerable for all the consequences of an irregular seizure. I hope, therefore, that by prudence and judgment the calamities of a protracted war with China, the results of which no human being can foresee, may be avoided; but should hostilities be inevitable, I trust the Government will take care that they are carried on, so far as we are concerned, in accordance with the usages of civilized countries. I admit, where any great party object is to be attained, it is a legitimate course to take advantage of the Address with that view; but not seeing in the tone of the Speech any cause for a serious difference of opinion, and not concurring with the noble Earl in the strong views he has expressed as to the laches alleged to have been committed by the Government with regard to calling Parliament together, I shall not be able to support his Amendment with my vote in the event of his pressing it to a division. I think, apart from the constitutional view of the case, it is rather a fortunate circumstance that Parliament was not called together on the receipt of the disastrous intelligence from China, because from the feeling which that intelligence excited in the country, Parliament—then imperfectly acquainted with the facts—might have been carried away in the adoption of a course, which in cooler moments and on a calmer consideration of the merits of the case they might not have been inclined to take. If I now touch upon another question it is rather with the view of eliciting some information from Her Majesty's Government which we do not at present possess than of discussing the merits of any particular course. Some suspicion has been excited in my mind by the introduction of a word into the part of the Speech relating to our sending a representative to the approaching Congress. I trust that expression does actually mean what at first sight it may be supposed to mean. I see we are promised that papers on that subject will "soon" be laid on the table. I have had some experience with reference to the production of papers, particularly by the noble Viscount now at the head of the Government, and I know there is a degree of latitude and elasticity about his movements in that respect, which would rather lead me to infer that the use of the word "soon" in that part of the Speech points to a remote rather than to an early fulfilment of the promise. Yet, in the present position of affairs, some information as to the views and policy of the Government ought to be furnished without delay; because we have been lately in a worse position than if we had received no information. We have had information, some of it anonymous, some of a semi-official character, and some on an authority so high as to place it beyond dispute. Now, I must say, when Parliament is ever disposed to press any Government for the production of papers, and when the Government states that the production of such papers at a particular time would be inconvenient, that is an excuse which is readily admitted; but I do think at the present period, when we have been obliged to take such information as we had from telegrams, many of them of high authority, from newspapers, and last of all from Imperial letters, Her Majesty's Government should set the public mind at rest by producing their own version of the actual state of things. I find it stated in the Speech at the close of the last Session that overtures had been made to Her Majesty with a view to ascertain whether, if Conferences should be held by the Great Powers of Europe for the purpose of settling arrangements connected with the present state and future condition of Italy, a Plenipotentiary would be sent by Her Majesty to assist at such Conferences; but Her Majesty went on to say that she had not yet received the information necessary to enable her to decide whether Her Majesty may think fit to take part in any such negotiations. I should like, therefore, to hear from the Government the precise nature of that proposition, and under what conditions the assent of Her Majesty had since been given to it. It has been also stated, in some of those sources of information to which I have referred, and I have not seen it denied, that, as long ago as August, Her Majesty's Government proposed to the Government of the Emperor of France, in the absence of a Congress, separate negotiations on the affairs of Italy between England and France, setting aside the other great Powers. What answer was given to that proposition at that time we have no means of knowing; but I believe there is no doubt that within the course of the present month—not from Her Majesty's Government, but from that of the Emperor of France—a proposition was made for a separate negotiation by England and France on the affairs of Italy, unconnected with the other Powers; but that—whether by a unanimous vote of the Cabinet or otherwise we know not, though Cabinets are always supposed to be unanimous—proposition was declined, and declined on the ground that such an alliance might be offensive to the other Powers, or might give rise to suspicion, and that, as Parliament was about to meet, it was not deemed expedient to take such a step until it had met, and both Houses had had an opportunity to consider the question. The reason why I advert to this is, that the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne would seem to indicate a probability that the Congress may never take place; yet I trust some member of the Government will explain how they mean, either “in Congress or in separate negotiation,” to secure for the people of Italy freedom from foreign interference by force of arms in their internal concerns. These words appear to me to lead to the inference—especially when connected with the previous proposition to which I have referred—that now Parliament has met, and supposing the Congress to fail, the question of a separate intervention of France and England in the affairs of Italy has not been dropped, but may be again renewed. I wish, therefore, to have a full explanation of what is meant by a “separate negotiation for the settlement of the affairs of Italy, and for preventing the intervention by force of arms of any other country in the internal affairs of Italy.” I beg your Lordships and the Government to consider the serious consequences to which an agreement like this might lead. If you bind yourselves to France by any engagement to prevent foreign armed intervention on the part of any other Power you tie yourselves to the heel of France, and may find yourselves bound to support her in whatever she may attempt to establish in Italy by any mode other than by force of arms. If France should establish a state of things in Italy calculated to excite the not unnatural jealousy of other Powers, and those other Powers should attempt to interfere with the view of preventing it, if you were to bind yourselves by such a treaty as I have referred to, you would be compelled to join with France whether she had acted rightly or wrongly, in order to stop the intervention of those Powers by force of arms. Now, foreign intervention in the affairs of Italy has been denounced in this and the other House of Parliament in the strongest terms. If there is one principle more recognized than another in this country it is that every State has an undoubted right to settle its own internal affairs at its own will and pleasure, whether with regard to the constitution it may wish to have, or the dynasty it may desire to establish, and that without the intervention of any foreign country. When I say this I am only stating what is the feeling of every Englishman. It is a principle which has, generally speaking, been steadily maintained by us. Even the great war consequent on the French Revolution was no departure from that principle, because that war was undertaken not in consequence of what had been done in France, but in consequence of what was done in France being deemed dangerous to the peace and tranquillity of other countries. There was, no doubt, a deviation from this principle in one particular instance, but that deviation has proved utterly ineffective—I mean the resolution which bound the Powers of Europe to prevent in all time coming a member of the family of Bonaparte from sitting on the throne of France. The Emperor who now sits on the throne of France, by the voice of the French people, has afforded an opportunity of enforcing this article of the Treaty of Vienna, and there is not a single Power in Europe that has ventured to do so, or to call in question the right of the people of France to elect their own ruler. I say not only that every country has a right to settle its internal affairs without foreign armed interference, but that it must be done without foreign assistance; and I am sure that, much as we may desire to see the independence of Italy secured, every one of us would join in saying this, that they ought to attain their own freedom,—that if they wish to place themselves under a constitutional Government they must achieve that great object, not by foreign assistance, but by their own unaided efforts. I go still further, and say that they must be strong reasons indeed which would justify other Powers in taking away any portion of territory from a particular country. Undoubtedly there are cases in which the transfer of a portion of territory from one country to another may be not only at variance with previous engagements, but may involve consequences so serious and dangerous as to render it a matter of universal European interest. If a State already powerful should seek to obtain from another, even with the consent of the people, a new line of frontier which, though not of large extent in point of territory, might be of great value in respect to the construction of fortifications, that would be a con-

Applying this to the present state of affairs in Italy, I would observe that we were anxious in this country to prevent the war that ultimately broke out. So long as that rupture did not actually take place, so long as we were able to appeal to those treaties by which the various States of Europe were bound; and no man laid down more strongly than the French Emperor himself, that so long as Austria confined herself within the limits of those possessions secured to her by the treaty of Vienna he would recognize her rights, and had no power to interfere. But unhappily, and in an evil hour, Austria threw away her chance. I do not mean to say that she might not have had provocation to do as she did; but, unhappily for herself, she took the initiative, and the result was that she lost her possessions in Lombardy. By the treaty she has concluded with France she was compelled to make a sacrifice of a portion of her dominions. We are all familiar with the great evils that have arisen to Italy from the constant contests, not for the independence of Italy, but of the rival Powers of France and Austria to possess influence in that country. No doubt Austria had a perfect right to enter into treaties with the smaller States of Italy, and to afford them protection; but those treaties naturally excited the jealousy of other Powers, because by them, owing to the relative position of Austria and those minor States, the independence of the one was sacrificed in proportion as the other became a protector. But the provisions of those treaties which were most injurious, and by the sacrifice of which Austria might have retained her dominions, were those by which she not only guaranteed the Governments of the smaller States against external aggression, but against their own subjects. It was a violation of every right principle that the Governments of those States should be entitled to demand the assistance of Austria against their own people, and the refusal of Austria to concede this point naturally excited the opposition of other Powers. As to the state of things at Rome, I hope the noble Earl opposite will be able to give us satisfactory assurances on that subject, inasmuch as statements have been made that in my mind seriously

cently made public. The Pope has been told by the Emperor of the French that if he would give up the revolted provinces, not that he might hope or expect to be guaranteed, but that he should be guaranteed by the other Powers in his other possessions. I will not enter into the vexed question of the temporal power of the Pope. It is said by Roman Catholics that the maintenance of the temporal power of the Pope is absolutely essential to the maintenance of his spiritual power. That is not the question which the country has at the present moment to consider. No doubt, the spiritual power of the Pope is of great importance to all Roman Catholics, and if they believe that the temporal power of the Pope, although it was not considered necessary by St. Peter himself, is necessary for the maintenance of his spiritual power, I cannot question the sincerity of their anxiety that the Pope's temporal power should remain undisturbed. I can understand that for the due exercise of his high spiritual power, it is important the Pope should be placed beyond a suspicion of being controlled or influenced by any temporal Power, and that he should be, indeed, practically independent. But I ask any human being whether, during the course of the last ten or fifteen years, the Pope has been practically independent? Up to a late period, we have seen one portion of his territory defended by one Power, and another portion by another Power. One portion was ill maintained by the troops of one of these Powers, and the instant they were withdrawn, those provinces were in revolt. Now, I am not arguing as to what shall be done, or what steps shall be taken, but I say that this country can look upon the Sovereign Pontiff in no other light than it would look upon any other Sovereign whatever; and the same principles must be applied to him, as to other Sovereigns, as between himself and his subjects. Viewed in this light, his dynasty is capable of being overthrown, the constitution of his kingdom may be modified by the free will of his subjects, and no foreign Power has the right to interfere with the action of the Pope and his subjects. My Lords, these are the opinions and principles that ought to be acted upon throughout the whole of the Italian States. They are free to choose their own Government and their own constitution; but that constitution must be established of their own free will and under no foreign influence, domination, or interference. I should like to know from the Government, that with regard to these principles they have followed out that line of strict neutrality which was chalked out for them by their predecessors. I acquit them of any of that pro-Austrian tendency that was so liberally imputed to the late Government, because the course taken by Her Majesty's Government cannot be charged with any violation of neutrality in favour of the Austrian cause. But I ask the Government, who professedly desire that the Italian States should settle their affairs for themselves, on what ground one French army at the present moment occupies Lombardy, and another French army occupies Rome? Is that leaving it to the States of Lombardy and Rome to settle their own affairs according to their own free and unbiassed will? The Austrians have been withdrawn from the Roman States and Lombardy; they have crossed the Mincio, and Lombardy has been ceded to France, and by France handed over to Sardinia. Why, then, do the French troops remain in Lombardy, unless it is that there is some lurking apprehension that if the presence of the French troops is withdrawn from the Milanese or the Roman States, some manifestation of feeling would follow which might not be in accordance with the wish of the Sovereign who has sent those troops? The first step towards the due exercise by Italians of those rights which we admit them to possess, must be the withdrawal of foreign Powers and foreign interference, and then Sovereign and subjects will be free to exercise their constitutional rights without interference. We are now either to have a Congress or a separate negotiation for settling the affairs of Italy. How is that Congress to be carried out? What course are the separate negotiations to take? How the decisions of the Congress or the separate negotiations are to be enforced I do not understand. I object to any interference by England if it can possibly be helped in the settlement of a question in which she has no direct or immediate interest. I believe that it is in consequence of our having kept aloof from these embarrassments and from any interference that we have attained to the high position in which we now stand, and which has caused the opinion and the moral force of England to be looked up to, and given her the most powerful influence with all

Chinese were fully justified in strengthening their ports, and if we were not at war there was no occasion nor justification for our destroying them. We have had information, some of it anonymous, some of a semi-substantial reform, and that the question must be settled during the present Session. Now, I flatter myself that the measure which Her Majesty's Government will shortly be prepared to bring before the House will merit the title of a substantial reform.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I never used the word "substantial." If the noble Earl is anxious to know what I really did say, I may tell him it was just this,—that I thought it important that the question of reform should be settled during the present Session, and that if the Government brought forward a fair, temperate, and reasonable measure—such as I apprehended they would—they would have no reason to anticipate hostility from those who generally sat opposite to them, but, on the contrary, I should be very glad to give them my support, and settle the question.

EARL GRANVILLE: I am delighted to hear the noble Earl's resolution, and can only say that I have been deluded, like himself, by the report of a telegram. I cordially concur in the very just compliment which the noble Earl next paid to the volunteer movement in this country—a movement which has met with the cordial encouragement and support of Her Majesty's Government. There is only one perfect test by which to measure the utility of this movement, and that is an invasion of our shores, which I trust and believe, though, of course, one cannot be certain on that point, will never take place. That this movement will be of the greatest use I cannot for a moment doubt, but of how much use will depend on a variety of circumstances—on how steadily the volunteers go on in the same spirited, resolute way in which they began, and are now engaged in perfecting their training for the work they have undertaken, on the degree of organization applied to this large force, on the discipline and obedience displayed by them, and on the readiness of officers of the regular army to avail themselves of this powerful instrument, placed ready to their hands. Though I have no doubt in my own mind of what will be the result, this is, as yet, only a matter of conjecture, and has never been put to the proof; but what is certain is, that already the spirit shown by these volunteers has had a great effect upon foreign nations. I believe that, while it is generally acknowledged to be a perfectly unexceptional movement on our part—purely and entirely defensive in its nature, and impossible to be put to purposes of attack,—no two raised the prestige of this country more than, first of all, that marvellous resistance offered by a small number of military men and civilians in India against the millions who had been excited to rebel against our sway; and, secondly, that sort of warlike spirit which has sprung up among a nation certainly not military in its nature, and which any power which might venture to touch or attack our shores—as I hope and believe none think of doing at this time—would find very troublesome and difficult to deal with. It is, I think, a matter of especial congratulation that the time at which this movement is going on, and an increase of our defences is being made, is one when we are on good terms with our neighbours and other countries. If such steps were taken at a moment of great and sudden panic, such as certainly prevailed some months ago, it would stamp them with a different character; but, as it is not stamped with any characteristic of panic, it leaves us clearly and unmistakeably in the attitude of merely taking those measures of permanent and reliable defence which the nation has a right to insist upon that the Government should adopt, and which are intended merely to render us independent of any casualty which may arise. The next point referred to by the noble Earl was India; and I entirely agree with what he has said on this subject. I am especially glad to hear such a tribute of praise accorded to the moderation and judgment of the Indian Administration. The noble Earl said that whatever might have been the mind of the Government of India previous to the proclamation as to Oude, subsequently the instructions of the late Government of Her Majesty had been carried out in a most conciliatory manner. But it is in my power to state what was the mind of the Government of India at that time, and that not from any private information, but from that celebrated despatch in which the Governor General stated what his plans were with regard to Oude, and expressly intimated that he had given the Talookdars to understand that the confiscation of the land was not to be regarded by them as a permanent deprivation, but merely as a means of placing in the hands of the Government the power of punishing or rewarding them according to whether they joined the insurgents or co-operated with the Government in the restoration and maintenance of peace. They were to understand that titles coming to them with the authority of the Government would be much more substantial than the very insecure titles which they previously held, and that the acceptance of them would be coupled with conditions by which some guarantee would be taken for their fealty and good conduct. The noble Earl then reproached my noble Friend on account of his approbation of the commercial treaty with France, of which he could know nothing, and then himself went into all sorts of assumptions and calculations in regard to it, which a better acquaintance with the purport and details of the convention would, I am sure, have dispelled. In thinking over the probable points of attack which would be made use of against us, and bearing in mind the axiom delivered by the noble Earl last year, that when one was bound to find fault one was sure to be able to do so, I had no doubt that some points in our policy would be selected as vulnerable. I anticipated pretty closely the style of objection to this treaty which might be made by the noble Earl who followed the seconder of the Address, and which I might characterize as the very purism of free trade. I have really no ground for knowing what the opinions of the noble Earl opposite may be at this moment on free trade and protection. I believe the last speech on this question which he made in this House was one in which he deferred to public opinion, although he prophesied national ruin, and even appealed to the Freetraders to know how far the gratification of their vanity would prompt them to carry the desolation of the land. Well, I thought we should arrive at what his principles were. He broached two principles, one that laid down by the noble Earl (Earl Grey), and the other a strict reciprocity system. The first admitted certain concessions to free trade, but I remarked throughout the whole argument the old anti-free trade principle coming out strong; whenever he mentioned advantages, it meant always the advantages of sending out our goods to other nations, and not of what we should receive from them. A great deal of what was said by the noble Earl (Earl Grey) was very true. He said it was bad for the nations of Europe to be continually haggling to see which could obtain the best terms, and he could not conceive anything more suicidal than when a nation considered a reduction good for itself that it should wait for the pleasure of another nation to make a corresponding reduction. Our great difficulty formerly was to make a commercial treaty at all. No human thing is perfect, but supposing that our tariff is perfection itself, then perhaps it would be suicidal to alter it; but supposing that there are improvements which can be introduced in our tariff, and when it comes to be discussed it will be seen that it would be the height of pedantry to refuse to insert those amendments in any treaty when by so doing you extend to an immense amount the commercial intercourse with so important a country as France. Nobody doubts that there are great disadvantages to the mercantile and commercial interests of France under the present protective system, but it is also disadvantageous to ourselves. It is injurious to both parties, and it will be undoubtedly an advantage to both sides to remove those artificial restrictions to commerce. I happened by accident lately to open a speech of Sir R. Peel, in which he said that he favoured a better understanding with France, because it would lead to a more extended commercial intercourse, which would have the effect of increasing our mutual prosperity, as well as of increasing the guarantees for peace and goodwill between the two countries. That speech was made more than a quarter of a century ago, and during the time which has elapsed since that period the example on which the noble Lord relies, though it has had an immense effect on other nations, has had no effect on commerce; and now when we are assured that the effect of the treaty will be to introduce a more liberal system in France, combined with improvements in the economy of our tariff, it would be a monstrous thing to throw away the undoubted and immense advantage which increased commercial intercourse would confer upon both nations in the increased security for the maintenance of peace. It is true that we may have close commercial intercourse, and yet go to war with another nation; yet where there is that great commercial intercourse there will also be found a large body of persons whose personal interests will lead them to use their utmost efforts to avoid that which would destroy their profits. The other question—that of revenue—broached by the noble Earl, is one which of course it is impossible for me to enter upon now, as no one can expect me to anticipate the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon this difficult and important subject. The noble Earl suggested that this treaty had been managed ~~to~~ to act as a sort of firework to effect at the opening of Pa'

can assure him nothing of the sort is the case. There is no secret about it. A distinguished man, Mr. Cobden, having, to my regret, declined to join the present Government, for certain reasons of his own went to Paris, and I think it reflects wonderful credit upon that gentleman, and is an extraordinary circumstance, that after having by his influence and eloquence exercised a decisive effect upon the multitudes of a free country in inducing them to adopt a certain policy, he has been enabled to exercise a similar influence upon a very few intelligent men at the head of a wholly different institution of Government, and to bring them to entertain similar convictions. An error not much to the credit of this country has been that sometimes there has been an adulation of the Emperor of the French, and at others a vituperation of him and his acts. I have never gone to either extreme, which are equally offensive to good taste as well as to other considerations, but I must say that this act of the Emperor, which, I believe, will be one of the most beneficial to the country he reigns over, has been one of his best acts, and one which I have no doubt required great moral courage to perform. The noble Marquess had referred to the representation of certain Protectionists in France, which afford a proof of the immense force which a strong organization offers to acts of this kind, and the noble Earl (Earl Grey) says that the Treaty will strengthen the feelings of the French against commercial liberty. There may at first be a feeling against reductions in favour of other nations, but the story of Sam Slick is quite apposite. He left clocks at cottages not for sale, but when he returned he found the cottagers had become, from their use, so alive to the value of the clocks that they would not part with them. A greater freedom of commercial intercourse on the part of France would have another effect, for it would show to other nations that there was nothing peculiar in the institutions and position of England which rendered free-trade possible for it, since so great a continental nation as France had taken the same course. The next subject touched upon by the noble Earl is the subject of the Amendment, namely, China; and I am rather embarrassed how to deal with it. It appears to me that the question—the technical question—of whether we were right or wrong in — — — — — ment together upon that — — — — — completely answered by the noble Duke near me (the Duke of Newcastle) and by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) that I need not attempt to repeat their arguments. But then comes the general question of China, upon which both the noble Earls professed their intention not to enter, but using the usual oratorical figure, said they would not say the thing which they meant to say, and which they did say nevertheless. I think, however, I judge rightly the feeling of the House if I postpone my remarks upon the subject until a future and a more fitting occasion, and I hope the noble Earl, having had an opportunity of expressing his sentiments, will not press the Amendment he has moved. I next come to the subject of the Congress. The noble Earl has spoken of the imperfect information he possessed upon the subject, but a noble Friend near me assures me that further details will be speedily laid before the House. The noble Earl referred to various statements gathered from various sources, and asked me for an answer to them. I must say the whole of them are almost without foundation. I am not aware of any sort of negotiation or proposition having been made to the French Government in August such as he alluded to. I have no official communication as to any offensive or defensive treaty, and perhaps the best way of answering all those questions is by stating that the Government is perfectly unfettered, free from any pledge or engagement or guarantee to or with any nation whatever. Then there comes the question of our going into Congress at all, which the noble Earl deprecates. I will state shortly what the reasons were which induced the Government to consent to go into the Congress. If we had refused, one of two things would have happened—either the Congress would not have met, and then any complications which arose would have been imputed to our refusal; or the Congress would have met, and whatever dissatisfaction Italy might entertain as to its results would have been brought home to us. I believe it will be found that, with nations as with individuals, in political opinions there is no such thing as a secession from duties naturally belonging to them. Supposing that the Congress had met without us and adopted conclusions respecting the Italian people, opposed to our feelings, what answer could we have made to reproaches addressed to us that we had neglected to use the influence naturally belonging to us upon so interesting a subject?

And when we are asked under what conditions we would go into Congress there is the simple answer in Her Majesty's Speech which has made known to Europe that the condition was non-interference by arms in the affairs of the Italian people. We thought it necessary to preserve perfectly free action in the Congress, so that we might either retire or take any other line we thought proper; but to say that other nations had got into a difficulty, and they might get out of it as they could, would have been a selfish sort of policy accompanied with great discredit and fatal effects to this country. With regard to the future, I believe that our policy is very simple. I do not believe that the settlement of Italy is a very simple one. The various interests and feelings in Italy make the settlement a very difficult subject; but the policy of this Government is, I think, as clear and simple as noonday. Indeed, I agree with all the noble Earl has said as to using our influence to prevent armed interference with a country dealing with her own internal concerns. As long as we do that our influence will have a great effect, and if we obtain the result we seek, we shall obtain that which is the real interest of England, and also consistent with the real interests of Europe—namely, the maintenance of a condition of things likely to insure lasting peace. With regard to separate negotiations it is clear that, if we move at all and there is no Congress, it must be by separate negotiations; but I can assure the noble Earl that the interpretation of that point which he has suggested is entirely without foundation. The noble Earl has put to me questions which I certainly do not feel called upon to answer. He has asked me to explain what is the necessity for the temporal power of the Pope in support of his spiritual power, but I must decline to enter into that question. In a great deal which fell from the noble Earl I entirely concur. I am sorry to see a tendency among Catholics, and even among some Protestants, to treat it as a religious question. I do not think it is a religious question. I think it is a purely political question, and I am quite sure that, as far as the Government is concerned, it is their duty to treat it as a purely political question. At the same time I think it very natural the Catholics should feel an interest in the state of their spiritual head, and wish to see what guarantee there is of his independence of lay sovereigns. But, from the sort of accusations made against the Government by some of these gentlemen, one would suppose that the Pope was in peaceful possession of large States, with a perfectly contented population, and that Her Majesty's Government were about to deprive him of some portion of those States. The case is exactly the reverse. All that we ask, free from any religious feeling, but in accordance with the political feeling of an enormous majority of the people of this country, is what has been eloquently laid down by the noble Earl—namely, nonintervention in the internal affairs of other countries; and all that we wish is, to leave the inhabitants of those countries to settle among themselves what form of Government they choose and what sort of administration they wish to adopt. I believe these principles will be shown by the debate to-night to be very generally adopted in this House. I was very much struck with the feeling manner in which the noble Lord alluded to the death of one among us. It is one of the melancholy incidents of each meeting of Parliament that we miss faces we have known, either the faces of political friends or of respected opponents, and this year has been no exception to the rule. It is very difficult not to allude to the fact that of the four perhaps most eminent modern historians of Europe and America, whose deaths we have seen within a year, one of them should have been a Member of your Lordships' House. It singularly illustrates the elasticity of our constitution; and while I know he felt proud to belong to this House, I believe few among us do not feel pride that his name should be upon the roll of Peers. I know that in accepting a peerage it was his intention to take part in our debates, and it was only that malady which prematurely cut him off which prevented his adding much distinction to our discussions. All know his writings and his speeches; many know his private conversation, and I believe you will agree with me there were no greater characteristics of that noble Lord than his pride in the past history and his faith in the future destiny of this country. Animated with the same feelings I am sure all here will agree to this Address, more particularly that portion of it which refers to the contentment, loyalty, improvements in social life and diminution of crime which year by year must add so much, not only to the material prosperity but the moral force of this country.

THE EARL OF DERBY asked whether the Government could give any information as to the period when the French troops were likely to be withdrawn from Rome, or if they remained, upon what terms they would remain?

EARL GRANVILLE said, it had been a subject of communication with the French Government, but that it was impossible to give an answer as to the precise period when the withdrawal would take place.

EARL GREY said, he would not withdraw his Amendment, but he would not give their Lordships the trouble to divide. He had listened in vain for any instances of an expedition like this to China being fitted out upon the simple sanction of the Government, without the early concurrence or authority of Parliament.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he had given the instances of Portugal and Greece.

EARL GREY said, they were not precedents, and that this was the first time such an expedition had been fitted out without the concurrence of Parliament.

Question put, Whether the said Words shall be there inserted?

Resolved in the negative.

Then the original Motion was agreed to; and a Committee was appointed to prepare the Address: The Committee withdrew; and, after some Time, Report was made of an Address drawn by them, which, being read, was agreed to, and Ordered to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

The Lord REDESDALE appointed Nemine Dissentiente, to take the Chair in all Committees of this House for this Session.

HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH.

MR. SPEAKER reported, That the House had, this day, attended HER MAJESTY in the House of Peers, when HER MAJESTY was pleased to make a most gracious Speech from the Throne to both Houses of Parliament, of which Mr. Speaker said, he had, for greater accuracy, obtained a copy, which he read to the House.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH

MR. ST. AUBYN:—Sir, in rising to move that a humble Address be presented from this House to Her Majesty in answer to the gracious Speech delivered from the throne this day, I feel that it is more than usually necessary to appeal to the House for that indulgence which, I believe, is never denied to the natural hesitation of those who venture to address it for the first time; and I may be permitted to add, that when I was requested to undertake the duty which

I shall now endeavour to perform, I was selected certainly not from any qualifications of my own, but rather as a mark of respect to the large constituency that I have the honour to represent—a constituency which is not less varied and important than any in this kingdom, and which has invariably, for a long period of years, returned to this House two Members belonging to that great party with whom I have the honour and the happiness to act.

The first great subject to which Her Majesty has called attention is the state of our foreign relations; and it must be a satisfaction to every one that Her Majesty is again able to repeat the announcement that Her Majesty's Government is on terms of amity and friendship with all Foreign Powers. With respect to public affairs on the Continent of Europe, there is undoubtedly one question which has occupied the attention of all thinking men in this country, almost to the exclusion of every other, and that question is the present state of affairs in Italy. I believe I may safely say that the course which Her Majesty's Government has thought it right to pursue during the war which has desolated and the struggles which are still distracting a large part of that peninsula, is in accordance with the opinions of the great majority of the people of this country. It was felt, inasmuch as we had no direct personal interest in the question, and as we were no parties to the original dispute, that we were not called upon to interfere between the Italian people and those who had governed them. But it is impossible to deny that there was in this country a deep sympathy with the cause of a generous people, struggling for freedom and independence, and the hopes that were at that time entertained are now, I hope and believe, in a fair way of being realized.

By the treaty of Villafranca it is stipulated that neither on the one side nor on the other shall force be employed with the view of imposing any Government upon the Italian people, in any way obnoxious to them; and for eight months the population of Central Italy has been freed from the domination of their former rulers. During that time they have exhibited to the world a firmness, moderation, and, generally speaking, an absence from excesses of all kinds, which has endeared their cause to every lover of true liberty. I trust that the great influence which Her Majesty's Government is able to exert, whether it is used in or out of Congress, will be exercised for the purpose of securing to the Italian people those privileges of freedom and good government which they have already proved themselves so worthy to enjoy.

It will be in the recollection of the House that in the course of last year the Chinese Government, in direct violation of existing treaties, and either in ignorance or in wanton violation of the usages which regulate the public intercourse of civilized nations with each other, attacked and nearly destroyed an expedition which was advancing into the interior of the country with the view of carrying out the provisions of the treaty of Tien-tsin. It has been determined, in concert with France, to send an armed force to exact reparation for that injury ; but, notwithstanding the insult offered to our flag and the indignities to which our representatives have been subjected, it is still, I believe, in the power of the Chinese Government, by full, prompt, and permanent reparation, to avert actual hostilities. Should they, unfortunately, be so obstinate as to refuse acquiescence in the moderate terms now offered them, we must trust to the skill of our commanders and the bravery of our troops, which have never been more signally displayed than on former occasions in that country, to vindicate the honour of England.

As to the difficulty which arose in the course of last year with regard to the island of San Juan, and which, but for the moderation of the British officers in command there, might have assumed a much more disagreeable aspect than it has done, negotiations are, I believe, at present on foot which are likely to remove all difficulties by an amicable settlement of the question.

With regard to the affairs of India, it must be matter of congratulation to every one to learn that tranquillity has been completely restored in that part of Her Majesty's dominions. All traces of the great mutiny of 1857 have passed away, the last embers of discontent have been trodden out, and the successful issue of the Viceroy's progress through what were lately the most disaffected provinces appears to augur the commencement of a new and happier era in the history of India, when England, by assuming a policy of conciliation and regard, may not only win, but retain the affections of the Indian people, and prove herself not unworthy of the high mission which has devolved upon her in the supremacy over that empire.

As to that part of Her Majesty's speech which refers to the coming Estimates, I will only say, that if one idea has taken possession of the minds of the people of England during the past year with a firmer hold than any other, it is, that however strict and close our alliances might be with neighbouring Powers, it is neither becoming to the dignity nor consistent with the safety of this country that we should be at the mercy of an invasion which might arise from causes entirely fortuitous and unforeseen. I believe the country will heartily support the House in voting such sums as may be necessary for rendering England independent of any menaces or apprehensions of the kind. The reference of Her Majesty to the internal condition of our own country at this time also appears to me to contain ample matter for congratulation. The loyalty and contentment of the people, and the total absence of all agitation at the present moment, seems to mark the present as a peculiarly fitting time for introducing and effecting those reforms in the Parliamentary representation of the people, so long expected, so often promised, but so long delayed. Her Majesty has intimated that a Bill will shortly be laid before us with that view, and I hope not only that such a measure will be introduced, but that it may so far meet with the approbation of all parties in the House as to have a successful course, and become the law of the land before the end of the present Session. I am encouraged in that hope by the reflection that, on the one hand, hon. Gentlemen opposite are not averse to the principle of reform, but, on the contrary, regard it with so much favour that they last year brought in a measure, which, if carried, would have effected very considerable changes in the constitution of this House ; and, on the other hand, that there are many Gentlemen below the gangway on my own side, who, though generally supposed to desire a more extreme measure, appear very generally willing to accept the coming Reform Bill as an instalment, even though it may not contain all they wish. I trust, therefore, that the approaching measure will sufficiently meet the views of all parties in the House as to pass through Parliament, and that it will at the same time rest on such a broad and firm basis as to admit within the pale of the constitution many of those classes who are now excluded, but whose intelligence, increased education, and industry have proved them not unworthy to exercise a more direct influence in the legislation of the country.

and indeed of every class in the country, no one can form an adequate idea who has not attentively considered the volunteer movement. I will not inquire into what were the causes which led to the sudden outbreak of military ardour, now displayed among us; but the fact still remains that the people of this country, acting, whether rightly or wrongly, under apprehensions of attack, rose and armed, with a zeal, devotion, and disinterestedness which have convinced the world that the old English spirit is not yet extinct among us, and that one and all, high and low, rich and poor, are resolved to preserve inviolate the honour, and, if need be, the soil of England. Second only in importance to the reform of the representation, on account of its bearing on the happiness and well-being of all classes, is the question of reform in the administration of the law; and the people will hear with satisfaction that the legal advisers of Her Majesty's Government have been actively engaged in preparing measures which have for their object improvements in that department. It is proposed, as the House has already heard, to introduce measures with a view to the consolidation of the statutes, to the removal of evils now existing in the laws of bankruptcy and insolvency, and to the avoidance of those delays and expenses which arise from the conflicting jurisdictions of the courts of law and equity.

In conclusion, I trust that I may express, without impropriety, the satisfaction which I feel at being permitted to be the mouth-piece of the House in congratulating Her Majesty upon this occasion; because I never remember to have read of a time in which the position of this country stood higher than now, whether as regards domestic or foreign relations. At home we present the spectacle of a free, contented, and happy people, united among all classes by a community no less of interest than of patriotic feeling. Those panics which in former years, and not long ago, caused such disastrous consequences in the commercial world, have not been repeated in the year just closed, and the gradual increase of trade proves a return of that confidence which was no doubt somewhat shaken by the events of 1857. Abroad, the position of this country excites the envy and admiration of the whole civilized world. We have seen two great nations, both the allies of this country, engaged in a desperate and sanguinary struggle on the plains of Italy. Her Majesty's Government, as I have already truly said, did but express the opinion of the majority of persons in this country, by steadily and resolutely refusing to interfere in that conflict, and the consequence of their conduct has been that England is now in a position to enforce, with the greatest possible effect, the policy which, in my humble opinion, should ever be the policy of this country—namely, to allow every other country to be the best judge of the form of government under which it would live. Our relations with France, which at one moment in the course of last year, caused uneasiness to the true friends of both countries, are now on a much more satisfactory footing. The powerful Prince who controls the destinies of that great country has lately inaugurated a scheme of commercial policy, long ago adopted by England, which, if carried to its legitimate end, cannot fail to confer the greatest benefit upon both. If the Emperor shall be permitted to carry his plan to its legitimate consequences, it will do more to maintain and secure the good will which should always exist between this country and France than the most liberal professions of amity unaccompanied by acts calculated to give effect to them. That the Emperor of the French may be permitted to persevere in the course which he has now introduced must be the sincere wish of every one who desires to advance the civilization of the world. That our Queen may long continue to rule over a nation which presented the spectacle of a loyal and contented people, attached to peace but not afraid of war, must be the sincere desire, not only of every Member of this House, but of every man who owns the name of Englishman.

The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving,—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to convey the Thanks of this House for Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech from the Throne.

“To express to Her Majesty the gratification with which we learn that Her Majesty's relations with Foreign Powers continue to be on a friendly and satisfactory footing.

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for the information which Her Majesty has given us with regard to the invitation which Her Majesty has received from the Emperor of Austria and from the Emperor of the French to send a Plenipotentiary to assist at a Conference of the Great Powers of Europe.

"Humbly to express our gratification at learning that Her Majesty has accepted the invitation, while, at the same time, making known that in such a Conference Her Majesty would steadfastly maintain the principle that no external force should be employed to impose upon the People of Italy any particular Government or Constitution.

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that, whether in Congress or in separate Negotiation, Her Majesty will endeavour to obtain for the People of Italy freedom from foreign interference by force of arms in their internal concerns; and that we trust, with Her Majesty, that the affairs of the Italian Peninsula may be peacefully and satisfactorily settled.

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for commanding that Papers on this subject should be laid before us.

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that Her Majesty is in communication with the Emperor of the French, with a view to extend the commercial intercourse between the two Countries, and thus to draw still closer the bonds of friendly alliance between them.

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty that we partake in the regret expressed by Her Majesty that Her Majesty's endeavours to prevent a rupture between Spain and Morocco have been without success.

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that Her Majesty's Plenipotentiary and the Plenipotentiary of the Emperor of the French having, in obedience to their instructions, proceeded to the mouth of the Peiho river, in order to repair to Peking to exchange in that city the ratifications of the Treaty of Tien-tsin, in pursuance of the 56th Article of that Treaty, their further progress was opposed by force, and that a conflict took place between the Chinese Forces at the mouth of the river, and the Naval Forces by which the Plenipotentiaries were escorted; and that Her Majesty is preparing, in concert and co-operation with the Emperor of the French, an expedition intended to obtain redress, and a fulfilment of the stipulations of the Treaty of Tien-tsin.

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty, that we shall participate in Her gratification if the prompt acquiescence of the Emperor of China in the moderate demands which will be made by the Plenipotentiaries, shall obviate the necessity for the employment of force.

"To thank Her Majesty for directing that Papers on this subject should be laid before us.

"To assure Her Majesty that we learn with satisfaction that a collision, which might have occurred between Her Majesty's Forces and those of the United States, arising from an unauthorized proceeding by an Officer of the United States in regard to the Island of San Juan, has been prevented by the judicious forbearance of Her Majesty's Naval and Civil Officers on the spot, and by the equitable and conciliatory provisional arrangement proposed on this matter by the Government of the United States; and that we trust with Her Majesty that the question of Boundary, out of which this affair has arisen, may be amicably settled in a manner conformable with the just rights of the two Countries as defined by the First Article of the Treaty of 1846.

"To express our heartfelt thankfulness in learning that the last embers of disturbance in Her Majesty's East Indian Dominions have been extinguished; that Her Majesty's Viceroy has made a peaceful progress through the districts which had been the principal scene of disorder; that, by a judicious combination of firmness and generosity, Her Majesty's authority has been everywhere solidly established, and that Her Majesty has received from Her Majesty's Viceroy the most gratifying accounts of the loyalty of Her Majesty's Indian subjects, and of the good feeling evinced by the Native Chiefs and the great landowners of the country.

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that the attention of the Government in India has been directed to the development of the internal resources of the Country, and that an improvement has taken place in its financial prospects.

"To express our satisfaction that Her Majesty has concluded a Treaty with the Tycoon of Japan, and a Treaty regarding Boundaries with the Republic of Guatemala.

"To thank Her Majesty for having directed the Estimates of the ensuing year to be laid before us, and for having caused them to be prepared with a view to place the Military and Naval Services and the Defences of the Country upon an efficient footing.

"And to assure Her Majesty that we are glad to learn that the Public Revenue is in a satisfactory condition.

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for graciously expressing to us the feelings with which Her Majesty has accepted the extensive offers of Voluntary Service which Her Majesty has received from Her Subjects.

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that measures will be laid before us for amending the Laws which regulate the Representation of the People in Parliament, and for placing that Representation upon a broader and firmer basis, and to assure Her Majesty that we will give our best consideration to this important subject.

"To assure Her Majesty that we will give our most serious attention to Her Majesty's recommendation that we should resume our labours for the improvement of our Jurisprudence, and particularly in regard to Bankruptcy, the Transfer of Land, the Consolidation of the Statutes, and such a further fusion of Law and Equity as may be necessary to insure that, in every suit, the rights of the parties may be satisfactorily determined by the Court in which the suit is commenced.

"To humbly express our gratification in learning that the great interests of the Country are generally in a sound and thriving condition; that Pauperism and Crime have diminished; and that, throughout the whole of Her Majesty's Empire, both in the United Kingdom and in Her Majesty's Colonies and Possessions beyond sea, there reigns a spirit of loyalty, of contentment, of order, and of obedience to the Law.

"And humbly to assure Her Majesty that, in common with Her Majesty, we fervently pray that the beneficent power of the Almighty Ruler of Nations may guide our deliberations for the advancement and consolidation of the welfare and happiness of Her People."

LORD HENLEY said, that he rose to second the Address which has just been so ably proposed by the hon. Member for Cornwall. The hon. Member in the speech which he had just delivered had described to the House the thriving condition of the nation at home and abroad. He had described to the House the tranquillity and contentment of the people; he had told them that provisions were cheap, that railways were constructing in every direction. He described everything as flourishing at home, and then he told them of the proud position occupied by this country in relation to all the Powers of the Continent.

But there was one thing upon which, in the course of his able and eloquent speech, he did not congratulate the House, and it was one, therefore, upon which he, (Lord Henley) in seconding his Motion, might be allowed to supply his omission—it was on the fact that the affairs of the country were in the hands of the Government, into whose hands they gladly saw them committed. He was happy to say that the presence of the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government and of the noble Lord as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was a sufficient guarantee that our relations with foreign nations would be such as they had always been while under the conduct of these noble Lords. With regard to domestic affairs, he believed that the Reform Bill which this Government would produce would be such as would put the representation of the people on a firmer and broader basis, and that, while it increased the popular character of the House, would at the same time maintain the character of that noble constitution of which, as Englishmen, they were all so justly proud. In legislating with regard to the affairs of religion he believed that the Ministry would be actuated by one great principle—a principle which had been too often neglected, upon which all history showed that pure religion and morality could best be founded and which was approved by God and man—namely, the principle of universal toleration. He begged the House to look for a moment at the question of foreign affairs.—the subject first referred to in the Speech from the Throne. He would ask them whether the position of this country had ever been higher than it was at the present moment? Let them cast their eyes across the Channel and take the first nation upon which they would light. He asked any one to recollect the state of France a few years ago, who could recollect the later years of the reign of the Bourbon dynasty—the condition of mind of the French people twenty years ago. The city of France was still, but it was the stillness of a quiescent volcano. There was a fire burning beneath and trying to burst forth and cast off the mass of misgovernment by which it was suppressed—a fire which was the remnant of that old revolutionary spirit which sixty years before hurled France like a thunderbolt against the peace and tranquillity of Europe. The feeling of discontent remained even until the commencement of the reign of Louis Napoleon. It was not until affairs began to be developed, and the people found that they really had a man to govern them, that it subsided. During the later reigns of the Bourbon dynasty France was governed by a scholar, a bigot, and an intriguer; but until the accession of the present Emperor, she had never felt that she was governed by a man—by a really reflecting, efficient, and patriotic Sovereign. It was only when France felt she had such a ruler that, like a noble horse, which felt a good rider on his back, she pushed forward in the career which would carry her to prosperity and honour—and he was sure that no man in that House would grudge to see her bounding forward on the path of improvement. Such a man as Louis Napoleon at the head of such a country as France could not fail to have a great effect upon the affairs of Europe, and, through the affairs of Europe, upon our affairs. He asked the House to look at the past conduct of Louis Napoleon, and, by considering it, to form some idea of what his future conduct would be. They would find that he was not averse to war—a peaceful ruler would be hardly able to maintain his rule in France—but while he had not been unwilling to make war, instead of making war for self-aggrandisement he had made it on behalf of the weak and powerless, against a tyrannical Government which oppressed smaller States. He thought that, looking at the past conduct of Louis Napoleon, he was likely to assist in carrying out that kind of Government of which, as Englishmen, they were all proud. The war which had lately been concluded was undertaken by Louis Napoleon to countenance the King of Sardinia in assisting the States of Italy to throw off the iron and despotic rule of Austria. Now that the war was concluded it was found that the Emperor of Austria was endeavouring to construe the words of the Treaty of Villafranca into an admission on the part of the Emperor of the French, that he was bound to use force to replace the discarded Sovereigns of Italy on their thrones, and restore the lamentable state of things that existed in Central Italy previous to the breaking out of the war. The words of the treaty might be somewhat ambiguous, but, looking to the fact that the Emperor of the French had taken up arms solely for the purpose of freeing Central Italy from Austrian tyranny, it never could have been his intention in making peace to consent to conditions which would have the effect of binding him to employ force to restore that tyranny in Central Italy by compelling the inhabitants of the Duchies to replace their expelled rulers. Our Government had been invited by France, in conjunction with Austria, to take part in a Congress to consider of the pacification of Italy; and he thought that the Government had acted rightly in agreeing to be one of the parties to that meeting; for the influence of this country in European affairs was justly such, that no Congress could be effectual without her concurrence. In going into a Congress our Government could but have two objects in view—to maintain England in the position which she had always occupied among European Powers, and to use English influence to induce the great Powers to concede to Italy the power of choosing her own rulers. On this principle our Government had acted all along, and it would be for the benefit of the whole of Europe, that every State, however small, should have the power of deciding on its own form of Government. Whatever might be the decision of the Italian States—whether they returned to their old Sovereigns, established a republic, or placed themselves under the dominion of the King of Sardinia—England would have the satisfaction of knowing that she had done her best to obtain for them the exercise of their own free will and the blessings of that freedom which she had herself so long enjoyed. As Italy a thousand years ago had introduced Christianity into England, so England in our own times would have the proud satisfaction of carrying freedom into Italy in return for it. After the war was concluded, Louis Napoleon had wisely come to the determination that the Romagna ought to be separated from the Papal territories. The people of the Romagna had shown that they were not desirous of continuing under the dominion of the Pope, and the Pope had shown that he was not fitted to exercise dominion over them. This question of the Romagna, no doubt, was the great obstacle to the meeting of the Congress; but, whatever might be the course pursued in this matter, he felt confident that, as far as our Government was concerned, the right of every people to choose their own rulers would be maintained. Turning again for a moment to our own domestic affairs, while he rejoiced to hear that Her Majesty's Government had given notice of their intention to introduce a Bill for the amendment of the representation of the people, he must be permitted to say that there were two essential faults in the present system of election, which he hoped would be amended by that Bill. The first was the prevalence of bribery in the election of Members; the second the exercise of undue influence. Whatever might be the original theory of our Constitution, it never could have been the intention of the framers of it that gentlemen should go down to boroughs and secure the honour of representing them in Parliament by purchase, or that those persons who possessed large territorial dom-

should exercise the influence so obtained, for the purpose of influencing the election of Members of Parliament. A remedy might, he believed, be found for both these evils by the enlarging of small constituencies, by adding considerably to the number of voters, and also by adding large districts to those places which now enjoyed the privilege of returning Members. Another remedy which might be applied to these evils, and which he trusted he should live to see enacted, was the establishment of a system of voting by which persons would be enabled to exercise the suffrage without the fear of the interference of their landlords or any other persons who might be in a condition to exercise power over them. But he was afraid we could hardly look forward to the establishment of such a system as yet. We must be satisfied at present with that which the Government had promised to bring forward, to which the House of Commons had almost promised its consent, and which, to a certain extent, had been proposed by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Even those who sat opposite must feel that the settlement of a question of this sort rested better with the party who sat on that side the House, and whose hereditary policy it had always been to place the Constitution of the country on a wider basis, than in the hands of those who had always opposed great changes, and who did not profess to see those abuses to the removal of which a new Reform Bill would be addressed. He trusted that the Bill to be introduced by the Government would have the effect of admitting to the exercise of the franchise a large number of the industrial classes. How far it would go, it was impossible for him to say, but though it might not go so far as every one would wish, he hoped it would receive a full and fair consideration from all parties—especially from all parties who sat on his side of the House. He could not expect that all of them would be quite satisfied with it, but he had no doubt that it would be a great improvement upon the existing electoral system. Seldom had Parliament been summoned together under more prosperous circumstances, and he hoped that the country, now that it had a strong, wise, and united Government, would advance rapidly along that path of prosperity which lay before it, and that no factious opposition would prevent the House from considering the measures that would be submitted for its approval. And having adopted every means which ingenuity could devise or experience perfect, let us put our trust in that Providence which for 800 years has maintained this kingdom in an united, a prosperous, and an advancing condition. He begged, in conclusion, to second the Motion of his hon. Friend, that an Address be presented to Her Majesty in answer to Her Majesty's Gracious Speech they had that day heard from the Throne.

MR. DISRAELI:—Mr. Speaker—The last Session of Parliament opened with a question of confidence; but until the noble Secunder rose to-night, I was not aware that the question was to be renewed upon the present occasion. Sir, you read the Address not with that usual clearness which characterizes your elocution, and I did not collect whether the passage expressing confidence in the two noble Lords, which I suppose from the intimation of the noble Secunder (Lord Henley) must form a portion of the document, is really to be found in it. But, although anxious on this occasion not to move an Amendment, I beg it may be distinctly understood on my own part, and on that of my friends, that if that passage is included, it is under protest. The noble Lord has addressed the House to-night in rather an unusual tone. Indeed, as I listened to the noble Lord, it appeared to me that he delivered an address suited rather to the atmosphere of the French Senate than to that of the English House of Commons; and the noble Lord will allow me to say, that I do not think it favourably contrasted with that graceful and ingenious speech with which the Mover of the Address introduced his sentiments and observations to the consideration of the House.

Sir, it is not my intention to-night, and I have heard of no such intention in any other quarter, to move an Amendment to the Address which we are about to vote—I hope unanimously—in reply to the gracious Speech from the Throne. But as that Address adverts to many topics of great interest, the House will perhaps excuse me if upon some of them I make a few observations; because I think there are passages in that Speech—passages referring to matters of considerable gravity and import,—on which the House, even to-night, has a right to expect some explanation from Her Majesty's Government. I remember last year that the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs found great fault with me that the paragraph which referred to that which in common parlance is termed the Reform Bill, was placed in so low a position in Her Majesty's Speech. But on referring to the gracious Speech which has been delivered to-day, I find that that passage—in the composition of which from the notice that has been given this evening, I doubt not the noble Lord has the vested interest of a parent—does not occupy a more prominent position than it did in the Speech of last year. And this shows how much easier it is to be critical than to be correct; for the noble Lord himself, alive as he is to the importance that the Reform paragraph should obtain an early and prominent position in Her Majesty's Speech, still finds, with all his solicitude upon the subject, that it was unavoidably necessary that it should occupy the position which it now fills. I hope I may augur, from the similarity of the circumstances under which that notification has appeared in these two Speeches, that the measure which the noble Lord is about to bring forward, although it may of course differ in details from that which was introduced by Gentlemen sitting upon this side of the House, will, at least, have this resemblance to that measure that its tendency will be to strengthen and confirm our Parliamentary institutions, and not to change their character or to impair their influence. I can assure the noble Lord that if such a measure is brought forward it will receive from us that calm and candid consideration which was once invited from the Throne to a proposal dealing with the same topic; and if necessary we shall offer such assistance as we can to render it a measure such as the exigencies of the country require, and such as the public opinion of the country may sanction.

Sir, there is another point on which I would also make an observation, and that is the congratulations which the House has received on what I may consider the successful negotiation of a commercial treaty with France;—for although technically that title is not included in the Speech, I apprehend it necessarily follows, from the language which is actually employed, that the form of instrument in which the new commercial relations of the country are laid down must be a treaty,—even if we had not heard to-day, I believe from authority, that it is so, and that such an instrument is signed. Now, the fact that there is a prospect of increased commercial relations with France is one undoubtedly of much gratification; and taking it also, as we are bound to take it, as a sign of the cordial good feeling subsisting between the Governments of the two countries, no one can for a moment deny that it is a circumstance, not only of gratification, but of an important political character. Nevertheless, I must address an inquiry to Her Majesty's Government with respect to the mode in which the attention of Parliament is to be brought to this subject. I want to know what is to be the duty of the House of Commons if a commercial treaty should be laid on the table for our examination and approval? I certainly did not expect to live to see another commercial treaty introduced into the House of Commons. From all that has recently passed I associated that form of instrument with those ancient modes of conveyance which have in our time disappeared, and which, although the traveller may perhaps have found them more interesting than those now in vogue, have yielded without much chance of revival to the rapid means of locomotion which are now at our command. Assuming, as of course we have a right to assume, that it is convenient to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to reduce the duties on wine, for instance—assuming that, I can easily understand why Her Majesty's Government should have felt that by a reduction of such duties the commercial relations of the two countries might be considerably and advantageously increased; and, that being the case, I cannot understand why Her Majesty's Government should not have proceeded to adopt that policy without having recourse to a commercial treaty. What is to be our business as a House of Commons in examining this commercial treaty? Are we to be called upon to decide whether the terms of the bargain are advantageous or adequate? If we do that, we must admit that the principle of reciprocity is the principle which is to guide us in our decision. But it appears to me that by admitting that the principle of reciprocity is to guide us in our commercial relations, we are shaking to its centre that new commercial system which has of late years been established in this country with so much zeal, especially by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and established with a determination upon our parts of showing upon all occasions that it is totally independent of reciprocal concessions from other nations. But if reciprocity be not the principle that we are to acknowledge in the present instance as the one which is to determine the merits of this instrument, I should like to know why we have recourse at all to such a form, and why we should not have increased our commercial relations with our neighbours—a circumstance which we all highly value—without at the same time asking for an equivalent, if indeed an equivalent has been made. We have all been told that a distinguished Member of this House, the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden), is the individual to whom we are indebted for this prospect of increased commercial relations with France. But I am quite sure that the hon. Member for Rochdale is not the person who would ever have counselled the adoption of a commercial treaty founded on the principle of reciprocity, in order to increase the commercial relations of the two countries. There is another circumstance connected with this question of a commercial treaty which requires, I think, some explanation from Her Majesty's Ministers. We live in an age in which events succeed each other so rapidly that whatever occurs, however important, is easily and soon forgotten. But I find that in 1856, only four years ago, the Emperor of the French made a similar communication—similar in character and very similar in expression to that which he has recently addressed to the Minister of State, and in that document also he proposed the entire extinction of the prohibitive system, and the adoption of measures similar in character to those which are intimated in the State paper that has lately created such a sensation in Europe. In that case, in the year 1856, a Bill was absolutely introduced into the Legislative Assembly of France; and although that Bill was not upon that occasion passed—probably from the lateness of the Session—the Emperor of the French considered that it was of such importance that the question of commercial freedom should be settled and acknowledged by the country—based as his recommendations were on the acknowledged superiority of articles of French industry in the Great Exhibition—that his Imperial Majesty ordered that this proposal of his should be referred to the 86 Conseils Généraux—the departmental Parliaments of France; and it is a fact that, with the exception of six of these conseils, the proposal was adopted, with the understanding that a certain period of time should be allowed to elapse before the new system should be brought into play. The consequence was that the Emperor, agreeing to this suggestion, published an ordinance, or some public document of that character, in which he treated their decision as final, expressed his firm resolution to carry that system into effect, and appointed July, 1861, as the period at which its operation was to commence. And that is the reason, I apprehend, why in the commercial treaty that is to be placed upon the table of this House, a provision will appear to the effect that on the part of France the relaxation of her system cannot come into operation until the month of July, 1861. But then the House will see that if there even had been no commercial treaty at all, this abolition of the prohibitive system on the part of France, and the adoption of protective duties would have inevitably occurred; and therefore if we are making a concession to the French we are making it for that which we should have obtained without it. If, therefore, we can conveniently, in the present state of our revenue, make such a concession, I say make it upon a scientific principle—make it in a way which will not embarrass you hereafter—make it upon the general principle recognized in our own commercial system, and not upon the principle of reciprocity, by which you will create a precedent you may on some future occasion find extremely embarrassing, and which is not in the least necessary, if the circumstances I have detailed are correct—and I shall be surprised if their accuracy is impugned. The adoption of such a policy upon our part is not in the least necessary, because all that France now engages to do is to put an end to the system of prohibition in the month of July, 1861, and to substitute a system of protective duties, or something analogous, instead; and to that policy she is already committed. What, then, is it you expect to gain by a treaty? All you can do to encourage an increased commercial exchange with France, you can do at once by reducing your own duties, without placing on this table a document you may find very awkward and embarrassing hereafter, and raising claims for reciprocity from other quarters, opposed to that commercial system you have now so long and so successfully been carrying into practice. On these two points, then, I think the House has a right to ask some explanations from Her Majesty's Government; we have a right to ask why they have negotiated a treaty with France on the principle of reciprocity, which has been absolutely rejected in our own commercial system? Why have they ostensibly endeavoured to obtain a result which must inevitably have occurred at the very period the treaty stipulates for? Why have they engaged us by treaty for what must have been done without any treaty whatever? These are points, in my opinion, which call for explanation.

Passing to another topic, I must say I think it extremely inconvenient that we should to-night enter into any discussion upon the recent events in China, notwithstanding the strong opinion expressed by the noble Lord the Seconder of the Address. I hope, however, it will not be understood by noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen opposite that our silence upon that subject argues that we at all agree with the version which the noble Lord has given of those transactions. I have no doubt that our policy with respect to China may in due course become a source of discussion in this House; but if I advert to the subject now it is only because I for one would express my satisfaction that Her Majesty in her Speech has been wisely recommended to refer to the bravery of our troops in the recent engagement. It is too much our habit to sympathise only with the successful. But there are occasions of adversity in which the most signal courage may have been displayed; and I do not think that the conduct of our troops—disastrous as was the ultimate consequences of their onset—I do not think that the conduct of our troops upon that occasion should, when Parliament meets, and the subject is thus brought before us, be passed over in entire silence. It was characterized by a signal bravery; and I think that we can hardly remember the conduct of the Admiral, who upon that occasion commanded our forces, without feeling that his behaviour was that of a man whom England may be proud to own as one of her warriors; and, unfortunate as was the termination of that struggle, let us make him, at least, feel that his country regard his sufferings with pity and his conduct with admiration.

I have touched thus upon one or two points to which I thought it was right that I should refer before I asked for some explanation upon that theme which is undoubtedly the one that engages most the public interest, and on which I may perhaps say that all the attention of the country is at this moment concentrated—and that is the condition of Italy and the relations of our Government to that country. Now, that subject is treated in Her Majesty's gracious Speech at considerable length. But I confess, after having read it with great attention, it appears to me that there is in the treatment of the theme so much ambiguity and perplexity of phrase, that I should be totally at a loss to gather from this document what is the real state of our diplomatic relations with that country, or with France with regard to that country, had it not happened that we have been favoured from another, although a foreign, source with information upon the subject. The terms employed in Her Majesty's Speech renders it my duty to-night to ask some explanation from Her Majesty's Government of what has taken place in the interval since the prorogation of Parliament, and how far this country stands committed, and what prospects may exist in reference to any engagement into which Her Majesty may have been counselled to enter upon this important subject. Now, I would recall to the House the tone and temper in which, towards the close of the last Session of Parliament, this question was entered into and discussed. About three weeks before Parliament was prorogued, there was a general expectation that a Congress of the great Powers and other States would be held, by which the affairs of Italy would be settled. That was the expectation throughout the country, and in this House it was accompanied with some distrust and suspicion. We were not responsible for the condition of Italian affairs. It was felt that if we were called on to participate in any way in their settlement, it was highly expedient this country should not interfere, unless the object of that interference was satisfactorily determined. In the House this feeling was strong, even stronger than in the country. I expressed my hope that Her Majesty's Ministers would not be induced to take part in a Congress on this subject. I did so for this reason—the soundness of which time and experience have confirmed,—that if we went into the Congress it would be asking England to assist in carrying into effect the Treaty of Villafranca—an office that, in my mind, England ought not to be called on to perform. On the other hand, if the Treaty of Villafranca were to be set aside, then it would be asking England to commence in the dark the task of reconstructing Italy, a task that might embroil us seriously with other Powers. That opinion was not unpopular in this House. A noble Lord, not now present, gave notice of a Motion which would have afforded the House an opportunity of expressing an opinion against the policy of our entering into a Congress on the state of Italy ; but accidental circumstances, for which he was in no way responsible, prevented him from carrying out his intention at the time he had expected, and the result was that the Motion was not introduced until the last night the House sat. Even then, I believe, there could be no doubt that it would have been adopted by a majority of the House if it had been pressed to a division. But I thought it would be a circumstance to be deplored if the Government should then be embarrassed by its adoption ; and although I did not consider that the advice which I gave to the noble Lord was in any way opposed to the course which he recommended, I used my humble influence to procure its withdrawal. There is no doubt, however, that the House was opposed to our going into the Congress, and that it was in favour of that policy which is popularly known by the name of the policy of non-interference. I say popularly known by that name, because I do not know any Member of this House—either among my colleagues or among those who sit on the other side the House—who has ever maintained the monstrous proposition that England ought never, under any circumstances, to interfere in the affairs of foreign States. There are conditions under which it may be our imperative duty to interfere. We may clearly interfere in the affairs of foreign countries when the interests or the honour of England are at stake, or when, in our opinion, the independence of Europe is menaced. But a great responsibility devolves upon that Minister who has to decide when those conditions have arisen ; and he who makes a mistake upon that subject, he who involves his country in interference or in war under the idea that the interests or the honour of the country are concerned, when neither is substantially involved—he who involves his country in interference or war because he believes the independence of Europe is menaced, when, in fact, the independence of Europe is not in danger—makes, of course, a great—a fatal mistake. The general principle that we ought not to interfere in the affairs of foreign nations, unless there is a clear necessity, and that, generally speaking, it ought to be held a political dogma that the people of other countries should settle their own affairs without the introduction of foreign influence or foreign power, is one which, I think, the House does not only accept, but, I trust, will cordially adhere to. That was the policy which the late Government maintained six months ago when there was some wavering in the faith of that policy, and some persons high in authority spoke of the possibility of England being humiliated by not taking what is called a leading part in the settlement of foreign questions. I ask those who then wavered or who indulged in such observations to contrast the position of England now, when after six months we still have to acknowledge the blessings of non-interference in the affairs of our neighbours, notwithstanding the efforts which may have been made to interfere, and to which I shall presently refer—I ask them to contrast the position of England with that of any other country in the world. Has not the adherence to the policy of non-interference by England been most beneficial ? Has there ever been a period when England has occupied a prouder or a more powerful position than that which she at present fills ? As, therefore, she has attained that position while adhering to the policy of non-interference, I trust that the House of Commons, which, on the last night of the Session, clearly expressed its opinion in favour of that policy, will, at the commencement of the present Session, take this opportunity of asking explanations of Her Majesty's Government, or, in other words, will show to Her Majesty's Government that if they continue in that policy they will receive the support of the House ; but that if they diverge from it they must offer to the House reasons far graver than any that have yet reached my ear, and arguments of more weighty import than I believe will be introduced into this debate. I mention this because, while the House of Commons in the month of August was expressing in so unequivocal a manner, sustained by the common sentiment of the country, its opinion that the policy of non-interference in the affairs of Italy was the one which this country ought to follow, it appears to me, from what I have learnt, that Her Majesty's Government were pursuing not precisely that course. I make no charge to-night on that head. I am, however, speaking from information, and I shall make the statement which I have to make upon what I believe to be facts, and shall give to Her Majesty's Government a fair opportunity of explaining what may now seem ambiguous, and of refuting statements which may not be founded in truth and accuracy. The House will recollect that upon its prorogation we were informed that overtures were made in order to ascertain whether Her Majesty's Government would be represented in any Congress which might take place upon the affairs of Italy. Certainly, it was to me somewhat surprising that when on the last night of the debate we were speaking on that subject, Her Majesty's Government gave us no intimation that any such overtures had been received. But the matter is of little import; it is of more importance to remember that in the Speech from the Throne at the prorogation we were informed that overtures for a Congress had been made, but we were not informed that they had been accepted. On the contrary, we were then told, if I recollect rightly, that until Her Majesty received further information she could not give any answer on the subject. Now, I should like to know what was the intimation which Her Majesty's Government received, which induced them to consent to enter into a Congress. But what I want to know from Her Majesty's Government still more than that is, why in the month of August, when Parliament was sitting—the very month that Parliament was prorogued, the very month that the House of Commons had expressed in debate, scarcely with any exception, its belief that the maintenance of a policy of non-interference in the affairs of Italy was necessary and politic—I want to know if, in that very month of August, the noble Lord, the Secretary of State, made overtures to the French Government in order to enter into a special agreement for the settlement of the affairs of Italy? We are, indeed, promised in the gracious Speech that papers on this subject will be soon laid before us. On that I would make two observations. I will say to the noble Lord the First Minister that there are no promises that he has made so frequently as promises for the production of papers to the House; and, of all Ministers, there is no one of them of whom it can be alleged, as of the noble Lord, that so great an interval was allowed to elapse between the promise of papers and their actual production. Papers are promised at the beginning of the Session, and they are produced at the end of it. Therefore when the noble Lord says that papers will be laid upon the table of the House, let me remind “the two noble Lords”—to use the language of the Seconder of the Address—that there has been a formal account of all the negotiations that have taken place between the Government of the Queen and the Government of the Emperor of the French already published. Is it to be our lot that we are not to receive information from the Ministers of our own Sovereign respecting our own affairs, but that we are to be indebted for the information to the condescending candour of a foreign potentate? I think, therefore, that upon this subject it is becoming that Her Majesty's Government should give us some distinct information to-night. I did, indeed, believe—knowing that in this very month of January an intimation of these important negotiations has been authoritatively published on the other side of the water,—that the noble Lord the Secretary of State would, on the very first night of the Session, have placed the papers relating to these negotiations on the table of the House. Well, then, on that subject I want information. It appears, according to this statement, that in the month of August last Her Majesty's Government made overtures to the Emperor of the French to enter into a special agreement for the settlement of the affairs of Italy. I should like to know what was the character of those overtures, and what was the nature of the agreement which the noble Lord the Secretary of State contemplated. Is it unreasonable in the House of Commons to expect such information? I know that the noble Lord the Secretary of State may say that the sources from which I have obtained my information are anonymous. [Lord JOHN RUSSELL: Hear, hear!]. The noble Lord cheers, and I, of course, accept that as an objection to the information. I take it for granted he means to say that it is not authentic. [“Hear, hear!”] Very well. All I can say is this; three communications have appeared by means of the electric telegraph in this country, and they are communications dated the 9th, the 12th, and the 16th of January. In the communication of the 9th of January it is stated that Lord Cowley had repaired to England in order to revive negotiations which were commenced in August previous by the English Government for the settlement of the affairs of Italy by England and France by way of a special agreement. The noble Lord seems to deny the authenticity of that statement. I can only say, before I availed myself of it in this House, that I took steps which I thought would be satisfactory under the circumstances. I did not presume to follow the example of those four ingenious gentlemen of Liverpool to obtain it; but I took adequate steps, and I have been assured from a quarter which leaves

we are not immediately connected? This is a matter to be carefully weighed; but I think the House, before giving its assent to our taking part in any Congress, should make it a condition to know what objects the Congress will entertain, and should have security that those objects should not be expressed in such vague phrases as its "preventing the interference of others in the affairs of Italy," or any general expressions of that kind. I think the Government and the House will do well to consider into what an embarrassing and dangerous position this country may be led by entering into agreements of that kind. Sir, these are questions upon which I think we have a right to ask information from Her Majesty's Government. I do not think that on the first night of Parliament assembling, with a Royal Speech of this length, embracing topics of such importance and dwelling at such length upon that one topic upon which all public interest is now concentrated—I do not think we should be doing our duty without asking from the Government for a full explanation of what has taken place during the recess with reference to Italian affairs. For my own part, the only conclusion that I can arrive at upon the subject is, that the less we meddle with this business the better. I defy any man, be he Monarch or Minister, to form any accurate conception of what is the real opinion and the real feelings of the various populations of the Italian peninsula. One man will tell you—and I speak of men of the highest position and authority, and men who have mingled in the politics of the Italian States—one man will tell you that Tuscany is prepared to be annexed to Sardinia. Another, with means of information and knowledge quite as good, will tell you that if there be one conviction rooted in the mind of that mild and tranquil people of Tuscany deeper than another, it is their nationality, and that the Tuscans will consent to anything but not to be Tuscans. If you will go to the Romagna you will be told that it is ready to be annexed to Sardinia; while another may say, who is inclined to more democratic or republican opinions, that if it is so desirous of being annexed to Sardinia it is with the view of obtaining that unity for Italy which should enable them to free Venice; but if there were any intention of making the Romagna part of a central kingdom of Italy the country would be in flames to-morrow. One man will tell you that Lombardy is prepared to send members to the Sardinian Parliament; but another will allege that if the principle of federation is to be applied to Italy the Milanese have as much right to an independent place in a national federation as the Sardinians. Go to Naples, and you are told that Naples is in such a state that a spark only is required to make a revolution; but as good authorities will deride this as a mistaken notion, and maintain that if conspiracies should be attempted there is no Sovereign who has so strong a hold upon his subjects, or who would be better able to put down a revolution than the King of the Two Sicilies. Again, if you come to Sardinia itself, opinions equally differ. One man will tell you that there only is security for a national constitution and national independence for Italy; and another man will tell you that the whole thing is illusory, and that as soon as a special emergency arises constitutional forms are cast aside—and the Government of Sardinia is merely a Government of force and fraud. What is the moral of all this? The moral I draw is, that a country in that state is in a condition far beyond the management and settlement of Courts, and Cabinets, and Congresses. National independence is not created by protocols, or public liberty guaranteed by treaties. All such arrangements have been tried before, and the consequence has been a sickly and short-lived offspring. What is going on in Italy—never mind whose may have been the original fault, what the present errors—what is going on in Italy can only be solved by the will, the energy, the sentiment, and the thought of the populations themselves. The whole question, in my mind, is taken out of the sphere of Congresses and Cabinets. We are pure—we are at this moment pure—from any consequences of previous interference in these affairs; and it is of the utmost importance that we should remain so. The process of emancipation appears to be one of considerable length, ambiguity, and perplexity. It is a year ago since the commencement of the freedom of Italy occurred. Then there was one French army in Italy. The process of freedom has been going on for a year, and you have now two French armies in Italy. I think it must be a source of satisfaction and pride to us that we have held aloof from any interference. I am quite sure if we now interfere we shall do so to the lasting dishonour of this country. But I do not doubt that we may do great good to Italy by our counsels and by the authority of our position. It is however of the last importance that this country should not enter into engagements which have the plausible pretext of preventing interference in Italy, and the consequence of which may be not the freedom of Italy, but the aggravation of the very circumstances which have produced her previous weakness and degradation. Now, Sir, I hope the noble Lord will throw some light upon our situation as regards these important questions. I hope that we shall know from the noble Lord—from an English Minister—from a Minister of the Queen—what has been the conduct of the Government, and that we shall not have to derive from foreign sources that information which ought to be supplied to us from this country. The noble Lord seemed to think that because the document I have referred to was anonymous, that, therefore, it was not correct. I will now refer to a document which is not anonymous, and which, I think, will justify me in asking explanations from the noble Lord; and that is a letter addressed to the Pope of Rome by the Emperor of the French—a public document, published throughout Europe, and signed by the Emperor himself. Well, there is laid down a policy upon which I will to-night give no opinion, because to-night I am rather making inquiries of the Government, and trying to obtain information, than attempting to call upon the House to give an opinion; but there is a policy recommended to his Holiness by the Emperor of the French, which is shortly this, “Renounce your right to certain provinces at this moment not under your authority, and the Powers of Europe will guarantee the rest of your possessions.” The Emperor does not say, “I will guarantee the rest of your possessions; and will ask my Allies to do the same; I will use my influence with the Powers of Europe to do the same.” The Emperor says, “Renounce these provinces, accede to the terms in this letter, and the Powers will guarantee you the rest of your possessions.” Surely it is no unreasonable request—even the noble Secunder of the Address will hardly call it a factious one—to ask Her Majesty’s Ministers whether among those Powers England is included? Who are the Powers the Emperor refers to? Now, Sir, I do not at all urge this inquiry to raise odium against Her Majesty’s Government upon the point of guaranteeing the possessions of the Pope. I am observing upon the question simply as a political question. I think we have a right to ask the noble Lord whether Her Majesty’s Government has authorized the Emperor of the French to make that offer. I think if the Government has taken that course it has taken one very impolitic; but I deem it inconvenient, at this moment, to enter upon a subject which would bring about such a lengthened debate as its importance naturally requires, and therefore I do not wish any erroneous inferences to be drawn from my question. It is a simple, honest, and legitimate question, and after the publication of such a document as the letter of the Emperor of the French to the Pope making that assertion, I say it is our first duty, when Parliament meets, to request information upon the subject. I hope, therefore, the noble Lord, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, or else the noble Lord at the head of the Government, will, upon this question of Italian politics and the diplomatic conduct of the Government during the recess, enter into a frank explanation to the House. I have no doubt the papers promised by the Government, and which in due time are to be produced, will give us much information which it might be inconvenient and embarrassing, being such a mass of details, for the noble Lord to enter upon to-night. I think these are questions to which the noble Lord ought to furnish an answer, and that he will do so—I think the noble Lord will tell us what are the reasons which induced Her Majesty to assent to enter into Congress in August, when on the invitation being first made Her Majesty was evidently disinclined to do so, as deeming the occasion not one justifying her compliance; I think the noble Lord will tell us whether he did or did not, in August, offer to enter into a special agreement with France for the settlement of the affairs of Italy; and if he did, I trust he will tell us the nature of that special agreement. I hope the noble Lord will tell us to-night whether it is true that Lord Cowley did come over here merely for his private affairs, or whether it is the fact that Lord Cowley came over here to revive the special agreement which was commenced in August, and which, from the opposition of Count Walewski, was then prevented from proceeding—whether Lord Cowley came to propose that England and France should sign a joint note, addressed to the Powers of Europe, declaring that interference in the affairs of Italy should be considered by both as a casus belli—

whether the noble Lord and his colleagues refused to enter into such an engagement, and whether he did so, merely or mainly, because Parliament was not sitting; and, whether, now that Parliament is sitting they are prepared to propose or recommend such a course; lastly, I hope the noble Lord will inform us, whether he has on the part of Her Majesty's Government authorized the French Government to say that England was prepared to join with it in guaranteeing the States of the Pope other than the province the Romagna. These are legitimate Parliamentary inquiries, which if I did not make I should not be doing my duty. I do not want upon these inquiries to raise any controversies as to the state of Italy, or as to the course which we may think it wise to take. Subsequent occasions, when we shall be better informed, will no doubt be afforded to us for that purpose; but upon this, the first night of the Session, it is in my mind most important that the House of Commons should have a clear comprehension of what is their position.

The gracious Speech of Her Majesty from the Throne is full of topics involving questions of no mean character; but every man in the House knows that there is only one subject really upon which the people of this country are thinking; and that is what may be the position of England with regard to this Italian question, and whether the course which we shall pursue will be one which, at the same time may redound to our honour and yet secure the blessings of that peace which every year that elapses we learn more and more to value. I invite the answer of the noble Lord or of the head of the Government to these inquiries.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Buckinghamshire, has announced that on this occasion there will be no interruption to that unanimity with which it is so becoming and so desirable that on the first night of the Session this House should return a respectful answer to the communication from the Throne to Parliament. I must, in the first place, however, congratulate the noble Lord (Lord Henley) and my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. St. Aubyn) on the ability with which they have respectively moved and seconded the Address; and I am sure that the House has listened to them with pleasure on this the first time they have been heard within its walls. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), has made some observations upon the different topics to which the Speech and the Address relate, and he thinks that without going into the details of the measure of Parliamentary Reform which we shall have very shortly to propose to Parliament, we have been inconsistent at least in regard to form, inasmuch as it was made a reproach to the late Government that at the opening of last Session they put reform at the very tag end of the Speech, and now we have ourselves failed to put it in that prominent position which the right hon. Gentleman thinks it ought to occupy. I cannot, Sir, admit the justice of that remark. According to practice, the first part of the Royal Speech is devoted to foreign transactions, then comes the Address to the House of Commons in regard to the Estimates and matters of finance, and questions of internal legislation are reserved for the third department of the Speech. Now, Sir, on the present occasion we thought it fitting that the Sovereign should take the earliest opportunity when she came to the domestic portion of Her Speech to express the pride and gratification with which she accepted the generous offers of voluntary military service from Her subjects; but immediately after that we have placed the question of Parliamentary Reform, which thus takes precedence of all other topics of domestic legislation. I am very glad, Sir, to hear the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman in regard to the distinguished bravery exhibited by our forces in that unfortunate conflict at the mouth of the Peiho; and I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman that there may be as much merit displayed, as much honour gained, and as great credit reflected upon the country by exertions not attended with success as by those upon which fortune smiles. It is well said that nunquam successu crescit honestum. It is not the success of an achievement which ought to be the measure of the merit of those who have been engaged in it; and there certainly never was an occasion on which those in command and all concerned exhibited more heroic devotion and bravery than in that unfortunate conflict.

The right hon. Gentleman then made some observations on the commercial negotiations between France and Her Majesty's Government. Sir, I am happy to be able to say that yesterday a convention or treaty was, I believe, signed between the two Governments at Paris. We have not yet received the document, and I have reason to believe that there may have been some technical informality which may have rendered it necessary that a fresh document should be signed to-day. The right hon. Gentleman has stated opinions on this point in the abstract of which I entirely concur. The right hon. Gentleman says, that as a general principle it is not desirable that this country should enter into any conventional agreement with other countries as to her tariff and Custom duties; on the contrary, it is better that we should keep in our own hands full discretion to legislate from time to time, in regard to these matters, in such a way as the interest of the country may seem to demand. But there was this unusual feature in the present negotiations—that, owing to a peculiarity in the French constitution and mode of legislation, we could not obtain from the French Government that security for future arrangements which it was essential we should obtain, unless the transaction assumed the character of a Convention between the two countries. It is, therefore, an entirely exceptional arrangement, and not one which at all implies that we have altered our opinion as to the general principle on which commercial matters of this kind should be governed. I am not going at present to enter into any details as to the arrangement proposed. When ratified, the Convention will be laid before the House; but this much I will say now in answer to the question of the right hon. Gentleman as to what would be the function of this House in regard to that Convention, that the arrangements stipulated to be made on the part of Her Majesty are made conditional on the consent of Parliament to them. Unless we have the consent of both Houses of Parliament we are free from any engagement that has been contracted. I must also remark generally, that it must be for the interest of the two countries to enter into any arrangement calculated to promote commercial intercourse between them. No great increase in the exchange of commodities can take place without giving an increased stimulus to the productive energies of the two countries. Commerce is not a one-sided operation. An increase of commerce must be an advantage to both countries, and cannot be an advantage to one alone. Therefore, if we in this country should reap advantage from the arrangements contemplated, France must participate in it also. If, on the other hand, the French nation are to obtain advantages, it is impossible they can enjoy them without our receiving corresponding benefits. Taking it in its political bearing, it must be obvious to every man, that whereas it is for the interest of the two countries that they should remain together in a state of friendly intercourse, it is manifest also that the more they are connected together by the ties of mutual interest and commercial transactions, the more likely it is that neither will, on light grounds, suffer an interruption in their political relations with each other.

Then, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has asked questions as to our policy with respect to Italy. The right hon. Gentleman is fully entitled, when Parliament meets after a recess, to call upon Her Majesty's Government to explain what has been the course of their policy upon a great question, upon which he justly says the attention, the feelings, and the opinion of this country are more particularly concentrated than upon any other question now pending. But, Sir, I think the right hon. Gentleman need not have rested his right to put these questions upon the grounds upon which he has been pleased to put them. He seems to me an example of a man reasoning rightly, but upon wrong premises. The grounds upon which the right hon. Gentleman put these questions are a certain number of anonymous telegrams which he picked out of newspapers. "Here is a telegram," he says, "stating that in August you made a proposal to France to come to a clear understanding and agreement for mutual action in Italy. You tell me it is anonymous. Ah! but I have an answer. I asked the editor of the newspaper whether the article was correct, and he told me it was." ["No, no!"] Sir, I cannot be mistaken. The right hon. Gentleman said he made inquiries whether those articles were correct, and was told that they were. It reminds me of the Italian proverb, that you ought not to ask an innkeeper if he has good wine. You ought not to ask the author of an anonymous telegram whether he rested it on good authority. Of course he will tell you he did, but the assertion is of no more value than the paragraph to which it applies. I shall protest, however, in the first place, against any Government being called upon to answer interrogations founded upon anonymous telegrams picked out of newspapers. I admit the right of the right hon. Gentleman to make his inquiries. But, I apprehend that he had much better put it on his right as a Member of Parliament to interrogate than found it on such flimsy and frivolous grounds as those which he has chosen. I have no hesitation, Sir, in saying, that the telegram upon which the right hon. Gentleman mostly relied—namely, that some time in the month of August this Government applied or proposed to the French Government to enter into a specific engagement with regard to the affairs of Italy—is totally unfounded; that there is no truth whatever in that statement; and I have to say that at the moment at which I am speaking Her Majesty's Government are totally free from any engagement whatever with any foreign Power regarding the affairs of Italy.

Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman admits that we were right in consenting to enter into the Congress, but he thinks that the communication made at the end of last Session and that now made are somehow or another inconsistent, and he wishes explanations upon that point. At the end of last Session the Crown informed Parliament that overtures had been made for the purpose of ascertaining whether, if Conferences were to be held, Her Majesty would send a plenipotentiary. It had not at that time been determined that a Congress or Conferences should take place, because the holding such Congress or Conferences must be, and was, contingent upon the conclusion of a definite Treaty to carry out the preliminary engagements of Villafranca. At that time no such Treaty had been concluded. All that had passed then was, that we were told it was the intention of the French and Austrian Governments, whenever that Treaty should be concluded, to propose a Congress to take cognizance of the Treaty, and to consider the affairs of Italy. The Treaty was not concluded until late in the autumn, and the actual invitation to join a Congress did not reach us until the month of November. It was not, therefore, until then that Her Majesty's Government were able to advise the Crown to give an answer, aye or no, whether the Crown would send a Plenipotentiary to the Congress. In the intermediate time no doubt communications frequently passed. There were constant communications between the two Governments. Lord Cowley came over once or communicate the information he possesses, and receives instructions which can often be given verbally in more detail than in despatches. When the distance is so short and the communication so easy as between Paris and London, it is natural that, without any particular or important transaction in view, Her Majesty's Government should, from time to time, find it desirable to have personal communication with the Ambassador at Paris. It is very probable that on those occasions the Ambassador combined private convenience with public duty. But, Sir, there was no overture received from the French Government of the nature of that of which the right hon. Gentleman has been informed—that is, the French Government did not propose the separate engagement which the right hon. Gentleman thinks was proposed and, I believe he said, declined by Her Majesty's Government. No doubt, in the interval which elapsed between the preliminary intimation and the actual announcement that a Treaty was concluded and a Congress was to be held, Her Majesty's Government endeavoured to ascertain, with as much clearness as they could, what were the views of the French Government with regard to Italian affairs. It was our duty to do so. The knowledge which we might acquire of the views of the French Government might very much influence Her Majesty's Government as to whether the proposal, when it came, ought to be accepted or declined, because, although there were many reasons why it was undesirable we should decline to join a Congress, yet if we had reason to think that in that Congress there would be a wide difference of opinion between England and France—that we should find ourselves quite at variance with France on the great questions to be discussed—that knowledge would be a considerable element in the decision as to whether we would go into Congress or not. Upon the general question the right hon. Gentleman seems not to have any doubt that our decision was right. When the proposal came, we might either have accepted it or declined it. Suppose we had declined. Suppose we had said, "We anticipate that a majority of the Powers who will be parties to the Congress will differ with us upon an upon which we have a strong opinion. We make no secret mention in Congress to assert (to which I am glad to find Gentlemen agree)—that it ple of Italy should be left to settle their own affairs—that the people of Italy should be left, as the right hon. Gentleman says, by their own will, opinion, and energy to settle the question of Government between themselves and their rulers, or between themselves and their allies and neighbouring States. We anticipate a majority of the Powers will differ with us, and we decline.” We made no secret; we took pains to make known that such was our principle, and that we should maintain it in Congress. If we had found that it was likely a majority of the other Powers would have differed in opinion, and a moment would have arrived in Congress in which we should have been compelled either to acquiesce in silence in a principle which we did not approve, or withdraw, that would have been an element in our decision. It was, therefore, of the utmost importance that we should ascertain as accurately as we could what were the opinions and feelings of the French Government in regard to this question, and it was upon it that the communications which have been referred to took place between us and the Government of France.

Now, Sir, if when the invitation came, we had met it with a refusal, one of two things would have happened. It was possible, in the first place, that Prussia and Russia might have said, “If England, one of the great Powers in the Congress of 1815, does not choose to go into Congress, neither do we.” It was thus possible that our refusal might have prevented the Congress assembling. If that had resulted in disturbances in Italy, we should have been called the cause of those calamities, and that was a responsibility which I think we ought not lightly to have incurred. If, on the other hand, Congress met without us, England, by its own act, would have excluded herself from a great transaction in which all the other Powers of Europe were engaged. Now that was a position which it did not become the Government of this country to take. Moreover, in abstaining from going into Congress, we should have run the risk of seeing conclusions adopted opposed to our convictions, and which we might have prevented from being adopted had we been there to give our reasons against them. We, therefore, were perfectly right, I think, in accepting the invitation, and we should have been very blameable if we had held aloof from the Congress, if Congress there had been. We were prepared to enter into Congress free from all engagements, but having announced fully what our opinions were as to the propriety of leaving the Italians to settle their own affairs, without any foreign interference by force of arms, I am quite persuaded that if that policy is adhered to, if the Italians are left free to settle their own affairs, the result will probably be satisfactory; and if it is not, then the Italians alone will be to blame.

Then, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman, quitting Mr. Reuter's telegrams, took higher ground, and quoted the letter of the Emperor of the French to the Pope—though I think he did not read it quite accurately—which, he contends, contains an engagement that, if the Pope would agree to allow the Romagna to remain independent, the Powers of Europe (including England, as the right hon. Gentleman conceived) would guarantee to him the secure possession of the rest of his territories. Speaking from recollection, though, probably, as the right hon. Gentleman has the paper before him he may be right after all. [Mr. DISRAELI: I spoke from recollection.] Well, then, my recollection differs from that of the right hon. Gentleman. The phrase, I think, is, that in that case the Pope might address himself to the other Powers, and ask—demand—such a guarantee, which I think the Emperor said they would very likely give. All I can say, Sir, is, that we were no parties to such an engagement. It is not a guarantee, I think, which this country would be at all disposed to enter into. I trust, therefore, that I have given the right hon. Gentleman an answer on this point which will be satisfactory to him. I agree with him that it would be trespassing needlessly on the time of the House to go on this occasion into the detailed communications which have taken place on this subject. What they are will be shown by the papers which are to be laid on the table; and though I do not recollect the instances to which the right hon. Gentleman referred of papers promised at the beginning of the Session and delayed until the end, I can assure him that my noble Friend (Lord J. Russell) has no intention of delaying until the end of the Session the production of the papers which the right hon. Gentleman is so anxious to see, and which I trust will be perfectly satisfactory to him and to the House.

Our policy, Sir, with regard to Italy has been the simplest possible. It is fully explained in the Speech from the Throne, and which I certainly cannot admit to be either ambiguous or unintelligible on this point. Our policy has never varied. We said in the beginning, and we say still, that no foreign force ought to be exerted to control the people of Italy in the arrangement of their own affairs. Our opinion is, that they should be left to settle their affairs among themselves between people and Government; that they should be free to adopt that form of Government and such an arrangement of States as they might think best for their own interests, and that no foreign Power ought to interfere by force of arms to prevent them from arriving at the result which would be most satisfactory to their own feelings and interests. The right hon. Gentleman says that if you ask the opinion of different people, all of whom are respectively and individually good authorities on the subject of Italy, one will tell you one thing, and another another; that whether it is about the Romagna, Tuscany, or Sardinia, or Naples, or Lombardy, every one you consult gives you a different opinion. But, Sir, is that peculiar to Italy? Without going further than the walls of this House, I should like to know whether you won't find Gentlemen here who will give you the most opposite opinions about any question of domestic interest you like to name. Ask my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Spooner) his opinion about Maynooth, and then go to some Irish Member below the gangway, and ask him his opinion on the same subject. Ask about Parliamentary Reform, or any other question on which the public attention is fixed, and I will venture to say that within the walls of this House you will find as many discordant opinions as the right hon. Gentleman says exist among Italian authorities with regard to the state of Italy. Well, then, adopt the same course with regard to Italy as you do with regard to questions of domestic policy. In this House a question is settled according to what the majority thinks about it; let the people of Italy settle their own questions in the same way. If it be true that Lombardy wishes to be a separate nationality, so be it. If it be true that the King of Naples is the most beloved of monarchs, let his subjects remain united to him in the bonds of affection. If it be true that the people of the Romagna are enamoured of the Government of the Pope, let them return to the happiness from which they have been temporarily separated. All that we want is that the Italians should be left to judge of their own interests—to shape their future arrangements according to their own opinions of that which is most likely to contribute to their happiness and is most in unison with their feelings and opinions. I quite concur with the right hon. Gentleman that there is no question which has arisen for some time upon which the people of this country feel more decidedly than on this, and I am persuaded that the policy which we recommend is most in consonance with their wishes. It is founded upon the same principle as that on which the Throne of this country now rests, and therefore in advocating it, I feel that the Government are backed and supported by the feelings and opinions of the people at large, by the historical traditions of our own country, and by the principles on which that constitution is founded under which we have the happiness to live. I trust, therefore, that when these papers are produced, the House will find in them nothing to censure, but much to approve; and that in pursuing the course which it is our intention to pursue, in endeavouring by negotiation, whether in Congress or out of Congress, if no Congress should meet, to secure to the people of Italy freedom from the control of foreign interference, we shall meet the wishes and receive the approbation of the country.

Motion agreed to.

Committee appointed, to draw up an Address to be presented to Her Majesty upon the said Resolution:—Mr. ST. AUBYN, Lord HENLEY, Viscount PALMERSTON, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Lord JOHN RUSSELL, Sir GEORGE LEWIS, Mr. Secretary SIDNEY HERBERT, Sir CHARLES WOOD, Sir GEORGE GREY, Mr. MILNER GIBSON, Mr. CARDWELL, Mr. VILLIERS, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. LAING, and Mr. MASSEY, or any Five of them;—To withdraw immediately.

Seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, January 25, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Appeal in Criminal Cases; Church Rates Abolition.

CHURCH RATES.

RETURN MOVED FOR.

MR. PACKE moved an Address for “Return of all the Parishes in England and Wales where Church Rates have ceased to be collected; when a Rate in such parish was last levied; what sum was collected by Rates to keep the Church in repair during the last seven years before the Rate ceased; and what sum has been raised by voluntary contributions for that purpose since the Rate ceased."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, without wishing to oppose the Motion, he would observe that great delay and trouble had arisen in obtaining returns relating to church rates, owing to the different forms in which the information was called for. He thought it would be convenient that a short Act of Parliament should be passed, making it compulsory in Churchwardens to make an annual return in a prescribed form, in the same manner as was now done with highway and other local rates. If it were thought this would be giving a Parliamentary sanction to church rates, and prejudicing the decision of the House, that objection seemed to him not to apply, since the maintenance of church rates to a certain extent was contemplated by all the plans for dealing with the question last Session.

MR. PACKE said, it was most important that the House should be in possession of the information specified in his Motion, having regard to the discussion which might be expected to take place on the second reading of the Bill, for leave to bring in which the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock (Sir J. Trelawny) was about to move.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked if the right hon. Baronet, the Home Secretary, proposed to introduce a Bill of the kind to which he had alluded?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he had not stated that it was his intention to introduce such a Bill. He had mentioned the subject to the House rather with the view of ascertaining whether such a measure would be acceptable; and if so, he should be prepared to propose it.

Motion agreed to.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITIES.

QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked the Home Secretary Whether the Government contemplated the introduction of a Bill for the regulation of Roman Catholic Charities?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said the Government had a Bill on that subject, and he hoped to be able to introduce it on an early day.

LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY, pursuant to notice, moved for leave to bring in a Bill to abolish Church Rates. He stated that the measure was the same as he introduced last year, and he trusted his Motion would not be opposed.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to abolish Church Rates, ordered to be brought in by Sir JOHN TRELAWNY and MR. DILLWYN.

LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

MR. M'MAHON, pursuant to notice, moved for leave to bring a Bill to secure a right of Appeal in Criminal Cases. The measure he proposed to introduce was substantially the same as the one he propounded to the House last year.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, there was no intention on the part of the Government to oppose the introduction of the Bill. The subject to which it related was not of a political character, and was one which, on account of some recent circumstances, had attracted a good deal of public attention. It was one which he thought properly deserved the attention of the House, and he hoped it would receive that attention from both sides, independently of all political considerations. It was obviously a subject in which no party interest was involved, and one in which the whole community had a common interest. He would not now, by going further into the matter, anticipate the discussion which must occur on the second reading of the Bill; but, in not opposing the introduction of the measure, he wished to be understood as not giving the smallest assent to the principle on which it was founded.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to secure a right of Appeal in Criminal Cases, ordered to be brought in by MR. M'MAHON, MR. BUTT, and MR. HADFIELD.

Bill presented and read 1^o.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.—REPORT.

MR. ST. AUBYN brought up the Report of the Address in reply to Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that for many years it had been his practice to give a tacit assent to the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, believing that nothing could be wiser or more proper than to maintain the utmost unity between the Houses of Parliament and the Sovereign, and that the House should express its loyalty in the form prescribed by ancient usage. Nor should he, on this occasion, have deviated from that course were it not that the Address to which they were about to agree seemed to require, in one point at least, some explanation. He had always understood that these documents pledged no Member of the House to anything; that they were meant to be mere courteous demonstrations. It did seem to him, however, that on the present occasion, with regard to China, there was a deviation from that course. As to the paragraph respecting the Italian question, he would only say that it committed this country to nothing, but indicated at the same time that we wished well to the Italian people, and that the Government were watching with a friendly interest the course of events in the Italian Peninsula. But he was sorry the answer to the Speech did not contain something like an expression of regret that Her Majesty's Government had thought it necessary to prepare a hostile expedition against the Empire of China. He believed we were committing a grave mistake in so dealing with that large portion of the human race, and that neither commerce nor civilization could be extended by such a course. If ever there was a question requiring the deep consideration of that House, it was the commencement of a war with 300,000,000 of half-civilized people, 15,000 or 18,000 miles from our own shores. The House was called upon by the Address to thank Her Majesty for the information that She had prepared an expedition; but let it be remembered, that when an expedition had been prepared, the expense had been incurred. What, then, became of the constitutional doctrine of the control of Parliament over the finances? The manner in which the Estimates were treated in that House had often struck him as being altogether farcical; for it was quite clear that vast sums were constantly being expended in these hostile preparations—sums for which this House was responsible to the people, who sent them there as their representatives. Now, if there was one class of wars with respect to which the country should be peculiarly alive, it was the wars into which we had been so frequently precipitated by the collision of subordinate functionaries with native authorities in the East. For example, there was first the Affghan war. What a monstrous proceeding was that! It cost £15,000,000 of treasure—was the origin of the disorganization which had since taken place in Indian finance, and the cause of thousands of our people being slain. He should like to see the Gentleman who could rise in that House and point out a single advantage which we had gained from that proceeding. One thing which was quite clear was, that that war had been entered upon without the sanction of the Parliament of that day. True, the constitutional doctrine was, that the prerogative of making peace or war rested with the Crown; but then it was also a constitutional doctrine equally sound, and to be as rigidly maintained, that the means of carrying on wars had to be provided by that House. In a certain sense, therefore, the House possessed, and might exercise a control over, what might appear to them an unjust war. Had he been able to collect the words of the Address, when it was read by the hon. Member for Cornwall (Mr. St. Aubyn) who had so ably and gracefully moved it, or by the right hon. Gentleman in the chair, he should have been inclined to move the insertion of words expressive of deep regret on the part of that House at the information conveyed in the Speech from the Throne that it had been deemed necessary to prepare an hostile expedition against China. The House was promised further information upon the subject; but he believed that the way in which we had become involved in these Chinese troubles was totally inexplicable. If the noble Earl who was supposed to have managed matters so well in arranging the treaty of Tien-tsin (the Earl of Elgin) thought that it was right to get the treaty ratified at Peking, why did he not go himself? Why leave it to a subordinate? Surely it was a mistake that he did not conclude his diplomatic career in China by going to Peking, assuming that it was really necessary to go there at all. It was likely that we had been led into this Chinese difficulty by sending a little man to complete a treaty which a great man had concluded. To leave the ratification to a "subordinate button," as the Chinese would term Mr.

Bruce, was to infuse a suspicion in the mind of the Emperor and the people that they were not treated with the respect to which the "Flowery Land" was entitled, and thereby create an exacerbated feeling. Nor did he know why our representatives in China were compelled to ascend the Peiho, nor why a peaceable Minister should be attended by an armed force. Moreover, the House, by expressing an opinion in favour of the expedition, would also imply approval of the operations being carried on conjointly with a neighbouring country, which he (Sir H. Willoughby) confessed he would rather not see. In giving his vote for the Address, therefore, he should do so under protest; but he considered that he was not bound in any way, nor did he presume that any other Member regarded himself as bound, to an opinion in favour of the policy which was pursued towards China. He believed the result would be the derangement of our finances, and the setting aside of all control by this House over the public purse. He owned, too, that he felt rather surprised that at a very critical period in British finance the word "economy" found no place in the Address. He entertained very great respect for the noble Lord at the head of the Government. The noble Lord had great administrative abilities, and in many respects had carried on the government of the empire very well; but he owned he thought that the noble Lord was a very extravagant Minister, and that a duty devolved upon the House to watch, with more than ordinary vigilance, the course of the noble Lord's Government in matters of finance, for he (Sir H. Willoughby) believed serious expenditure was now being incurred and about to be incurred, which, of course, could only result in increased taxation. For these reasons he gave his vote for the Address under some sort of protest that we were about to enter into hostilities with 300,000,000 of half-civilized people, to whom we ought rather to set an example than launch against them all the inventions and appliances of modern warfare.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: I indulge the confident hope that the House will not consider that I should offer an apology for rising as a naval officer, to observe on a matter which nearly affects an individual brother officer, and my profession at large. I acknowledge with satisfaction the gracious allusion made in the Speech from the Throne to the action of the Peiho, as well as the graceful and generous tributes offerred in the same spirit by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire and the noble Lord at the head of the Government. I am truly happy to be thus assured that the ancient judgment with regard to unfortunate bravery has not been reversed by the country, and that the conduct of a forlorn hope is no subject of dishonour to those engaged in it. I feel sure that the sight of the heroic Admiral, stretched wounded and bleeding on the deck, but undaunted under that terrible fire of the enemy, and calm in the midst of onerous responsibilities, conveyed a moral influence with his officers and crews, which no amount of success would have exercised without it. The victory for the time remained with the Chinese, but the impression that was lasting was wrought by the intrepidity of the Admiral in that hour of severe trial, for a brave man enduring adversity, if the saddest, is the grandest spectacle under heaven; and, "what will they say in England?" is a question which daunts and perplexes the weak mind, but strengthens and nerves the heart of the courageous. I hope that the breasts of those men, who were worthy followers of the Admiral, will not remain without their merited decoration. It is a debt we owe to the memory of the dead. It is a debt we owe in justice to the living—and a pledge of acknowledgment which we should hold out to those who shall hereafter bear the arms of England. We owe it to these gallant men, for I believe that the story of that unwavering struggle through the treacherous marsh, that intrepid passage across the moat, that reiterated attempt to scale the walls under a withering fire, and the murderous cannonade of foes who were unsailable, will one day be recorded in a page as full of honour as that which commemorates the ride of the immortal six hundred in the valley of death at Balaclava—upon the graves of those who fell we may write the epitaph of old, "we could not conquer but we died." The bravery of the survivors will not prove in vain; it did not cease when they turned, in slow and sullen retreat, and with a magnanimity greater than heroism, a noble resolution equal to the highest acts of bravery, raised the dying and wounded comrades as they fell, and bore them on their shoulders to their boats, although the delay more than redoubled the likelihood of their own death. The memory of their invincible fortitude and of their daring, that never quailed when defeat was trembling on the verge of annihilation, the deaths that were met for the glory of saving the lives of others, will in the coming hour of signal retribution yet strike dismay into the hearts of their enemies. Meanwhile, I will hope that hon. Members and the country at large will adopt the sentiment of the great soldier of Rome, that if it was ordained that the victory should rest with his foes, that cause which was lost commended itself to him.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, before the Address was put, wished to ask a question of the Government with regard to that part of Her Majesty's most gracious Speech which referred to the commercial treaty with France. Before doing so, however, he could not refrain from expressing his concurrence in the remarks just made by his hon. and gallant Friend behind him (Admiral Walcott). He could not help expressing the satisfaction which he felt at the circumstances that both in the discussion yesterday and to-day, justice had been done, though rather late in the day, to the conspicuous gallantry which had been displayed by Admiral Hope in the action in the Peiho. There had been previous occasions on which the Government might have recognized that gallantry, but it was not done. Nevertheless, he was glad that at last the distinguished service of the gallant and heroic Admiral, and of those who fought under him, had been recognized. For his own part, he believed that no more heroic conduct had ever been exhibited by the navy of England than that of Admiral Hope and his forces at the mouth of the Peiho. He would not then enter into the state of our relations with the empire of China. He would only say that he regarded the state of those relations with the greatest possible anxiety, and he hoped the day was near at hand when Her Majesty's Government would feel themselves at liberty to state what was the course which they meant to pursue in respect of that difficult and important matter. He would now address to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the question to which he had alluded. For the sake of those parties who were interested in the approaching changes in our commercial relations with France, he wished to express a hope that the Government would, at the earliest possible period, state to Parliament and the country the nature of the changes in the duties which were thus to be brought into operation. It had been represented to him that trades, whose interest were likely to be affected by those changes, were already experiencing great difficulties from the uncertainty which prevailed on the subject. He himself had received a communication from the glove trade of Worcester, complaining that the trade was completely paralyzed; that goods to a very great value had to be arrested at Folkstone, and that the manufacturers were unable to decide what course to take. It was most important to that trade, then, and equally so to others, that they should at the earliest possible moment be informed what were the intentions of the Government, and what would be the actual changes affecting their interests. The present uncertainty was operating most injuriously; and he hoped that no time would be lost in giving the necessary explanation upon the subject.

MR. HADFIELD protested against the course that was about to be pursued with regard to China. We call them semi-barbarians, but they called us downright barbarians; and he was sorry to say that in many respects they had too good reason to say so. We were raising up in China a military feeling, and teaching them how to contend with us in war. They had already gained one victory over us, and if the military spirit of so vast an empire were roused, there was no telling what the consequences might be. He hoped the papers would be presented full and entire, and not mutilated as in the case of the Affghan papers, which it had lately been demonstrated were in the first instance presented to Parliament in so mutilated a condition, that to this day our knowledge of the transactions which then occurred was incomplete. That war was undertaken without the consent of Parliament, it cost us 24,000 lives, and £15,000,000 of money, and to this day the causes of the war had never been investigated. The Americans had managed their affairs much more reasonably, and were now on terms of friendship with the Chinese Government.

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR was desirous to add his testimony to what had been said with regard to Admiral Hope, his gallant successor in the Chinese seas. He could speak of him, not only as his friend, but as an officer of great experience and high professional qualifications, as well as undoubted ability and gallantry; and he should be sorry to lose the present opportunity of expressing his most cordial concurrence in the meed of approbation which had been extended to him by others. As to the policy of this country in sending an armed force, in conjunction with France, to readjust our relations with China, he would only observe that, from his own experience and knowledge of affairs in China, he did not understand how any approach could be made to that Power otherwise than by the accompaniment of an armed force. He concurred in the wish that had been so often expressed, that our dispute with that country might have a peaceable termination. Personally, that would be highly gratifying to him, but he repeated that he did not understand how it was possible, after what had occurred, to approach China without being accompanied with an armed force.

MR. SLANEY said, he was delighted to find that the commercial ties between this country and France were about to be drawn closer by the means of freer intercourse: it would be of vast importance to both countries and to the cause of peace. But he desired to learn at the earliest moment what alterations of duty were to be made affecting the various industries of the country. With regard to the Worcester manufacturers and their low state referred to by the right hon. Baronet, he remembered that some years ago when it was stated in that House that those manufactures had been injured by foreign imports, the late Mr. Morrison, a great authority on trade matters, declared that their want of employment arose not from any foreign importations, but from recent improvements in other branches of our own manufactures. He heartily congratulated the House on the prospect of changes which would be beneficial to both countries.

LORD FERMOY protested against the delay which was to take place in the introduction of the Reform Bill. This was understood to be pre-eminently a Session for considering the question of reform; but instead of having the Bill brought forward in the first week it was delayed for a month. He was one of those who cared very little what position this subject occupied in the Queen's Speech, provided that he saw in office a Government who were sincerely desirous of carrying it to a successful issue, but when he found that it was not to be brought forward for a month, he began to think that either the Members of Government were not agreed among themselves, or that they were recklessly wasting the time of Parliament. The result would be that the Bill would not be brought in till late in February; the country must be allowed some time to consider it; the Bill must afterwards pass through the House of Lords, and, after undergoing some alterations, it would return to that House in the latter end of July, and might perhaps fall through altogether. It would then have to be reintroduced and debated over again in another Session, to great public inconvenience. He hoped that the Reform Bill for Ireland would be brought in along with the one for England, so that the two measures might have equal justice done them. Another thing he complained of was, that while congratulating the country on the general armament of volunteers, Ireland, which was nearly one-third of the United Kingdom, had been entirely overlooked. We were all proud and glad that the people of England were voluntarily arming and drilling to defend their country; but Ireland was entirely disarmed; and why? Because it was distrusted; and why? Because it was discontented; and why? Because its affairs were not dealt with in a wise and statesmanship spirit. They ought to deal with Ireland as they would with England; but they had not done so. Nobody had seen with more regret than he the late agitation in Ireland. The Ultramontane party there were strong and violent, and no one regretted it more than himself; but the Government must address themselves to that matter as practical men and as statesmen. What had the Ministers done during the recess to encourage the moderate party in Ireland; Don't let Hon. Members suppose that because the Ultramontane party were noisy and violent, the majority of the people of that country went with them. There was a very large and powerful party of moderate men—Roman Catholic laity—who did not wish to sever the connection between England and Ireland, and did not look to Rome and Rome alone for directions and orders. What had the Government done with regard to mixed education in Ireland? His belief was that they did not owe to them the non-surrender of that excellent system to the Ultramontane and violent party in Ireland. They owed it to the celebrated letter written by the Primate of Ireland, and read at the meeting at Coleraine, and in which he said that the Protestant Church in that country was not disposed to adopt another system. Until that letter was made public the Government gave no proof whatever that they were prepared to stand by the system of mixed education. Great credit was due to the Protestant party in Ireland—who in past time had no doubt been extreme in their views—for the moderation they had shown during the recent agitation in that country. If the Government really wished to deal with Ireland in a statesman-like manner, they ought to rally round them the moderate party, who were disposed to keep up the British connection and to see the country governed upon free and enlightened principles. On the previous evening the Government gave notice of a number of measures relating to England, but not of a single measure for Ireland; although there was no country in the world which more required legislation, not upon political or religious, but social and financial questions. Her fiscal taxation was levied in a most unjust way, and her poor law required reform; yet there was not a single word in the Royal Speech about these or any other subjects touching Ireland. With regard to the question of the representation, he hoped that if the promised Reform Bill for England was introduced, the Irish Reform Bill will be brought forward at the same time. If they passed an English Reform Bill first there must be a dissolution immediately afterwards, and the Irish Bill would have to be considered in the next Parliament; so that the unfortunate Irish Members would be subjected to two elections instead of one, and great injustice would thereby be done both to them and to Ireland.

MR. CARDWELL should have hoped that the absence of any special reference in the gracious Speech from the Throne to Ireland was a subject for congratulation rather than regret. It was undoubtedly true that no particular reference was made either to Ireland or Scotland in the Speech; but in that congratulation in which Her Majesty invited all of them to join, the United Kingdom and the possessions beyond the seas were all included as belonging to one common country. If his noble Friend thought that the non-raising of volunteer corps in Ireland was a proof that the loyalty of the people of Ireland was distrusted, he might dismiss that feeling from his mind. The Act under which volunteers were raised in England was peculiar to Great Britain, and did not apply to Ireland. Her Majesty's Government had not the power to come to the determination of enlisting rifle corps in Ireland under the same regulations under which they were enlisted in England. There was, however, an old Act of the Irish Parliament, confirmed by the Act of 1802, which enabled them to receive offers of volunteer service; and the Secretary for War had before him now an offer of the voluntary service of an Irish artillery corps, which he believed it was his intention to accept; but there had been no pressure of applications from Ireland for the establishment of rifle corps. This might arise partly from the belief or knowledge in Ireland that the Government had not the statutory power which existed in Great Britain; and it might also partly arise from the feeling of the moderate party, to which his noble Friend referred, that there were special considerations of an internal and social character to be borne in mind with regard to Ireland before they had recourse to anything like a general arming of the country; but undoubtedly it had not arisen from any distrust on the part of the Government of the loyalty of the people, and he did not believe it arose from any want of patriotism or zeal in the people of Ireland. His noble Friend complained that they did not encourage the moderate party by some "timely declaration" on the subject of mixed education. He did not know what his noble Friend would call a "timely declaration," but he thought he could satisfy him that no less than three declarations had been made on the subject. At the close of last Session he stated, as plainly as his command of the English language permitted, that it was the firm determination of the Government to adhere to the mixed system of education in Ireland. Again, about the middle of the recess, the declarations of the Lord Lieutenant on the occasion of distributing prizes to successful candidates at the Queen's University, on the same subject, were not ambiguous or few: and only last night he (Mr. Cardwell) laid on the table of the House the answer of the Government to the representation of the Archbishops and Bishops, which his noble Friend would see contained a distinct declaration of their steadfast adherence to the system of mixed education. His noble Friend also said that they gave no notice on the previous evening of measures for Ireland; but a number of important measures relating to that country had already been prepared, and he sincerely hoped that if not all, at least some of them, would be passed in the course of the present Session; but he should not be dealing respectfully with the House generally, or the Irish representatives in particular, if he were to give notice of meaasures when there was no prospect of commanding an immediate day for their consideration, and especially when the great commercial interests of the country were about to be brought under their attention. With regard to the Irish Reform Bill, his noble Friend's wish would be gratified, because at the same time, or immediately after, that the Bill for England was introduced, the Irish Reform Bill would be laid on the table, so as to enable the House to have a full view of both together.

MR. W. EWART, as one of the oldest free-traders in the House, wished to express his cordial approbation of the measures taken by the Government for promoting our commercial intercourse with France. Last Session he gave notice of a Motion for the reduction of the duties on foreign wines, and he then thought that, without reference to any treaty or system of reciprocity, they might proceed in a straightforward way to lower the duty on various articles imported into this country. He did not wish to detract from the advantage of treaties, if they were the best means of accomplishing that object, and he had no doubt that the Government, in arranging the particular treaty which had recently been entered into with France, had taken care of the interests of this country. But, as regarded the wine duties, any reduction of them would be utterly futile unless the consumption of the wines was brought down to the lower substratum of the population who never drank them before, and, in order to do this, there must be an alteration in the system of licensing. He therefore hoped that that point had not escaped the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Nor did he see why, when they repealed the duty on the importation of foreign corn, they should yet retain a duty on foreign cheese, butter, and eggs, which entered so largely into the consumption of the labouring population. If there should be a Congress of European Powers, he ardently hoped Her Majesty's Government would bring before it the question of the immunity of commercial shipping from acts of hostility by the Powers at war. If property on land were excepted, so ought property at sea; otherwise, during a maritime war, the whole carrying trade would be thrown into the hands of neutral Powers. He repeated his thanks to the Government for re-establishing our trade with France, which had so long remained in a disgraceful state, French wines being still dealt with under the enactment of William III., which declared that our trade with France was a pernicious thing and ought to be put down.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, it appeared probable at one time that the discussion would be closed without any allusion having been made to the commercial treaty between this country and France, and if that had been the case it was not his intention to address any observations to the House on the subject; but the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had thought it his duty, as a consistent free-trader, to congratulate the House on the formation of this commercial alliance with France, and to tender his thanks to the Government for entering into a treaty of reciprocity. He (Mr. FitzGerald), as one who acquiesced also in the policy of free trade which had been adopted by this country must, in opposition to the hon. Gentleman, enter his protest against this commercial treaty, which, in every point of view, whether as political or as a question affecting the privileges and rights of the House, or whether as solely a free-trade question, was as objectionable a measure as had ever been introduced to Parliament. He had always thought that a primary principle of free-traders was that they distrusted commercial treaties of reciprocity. They were told that reciprocity was protection in its worst guise, and certainly on that ground any treaty of reciprocity so objectionable as this one could not well be imagined. If the Government had carried out this measure by a treaty of reciprocity, then they had done it in the most clumsy and objectionable manner; and if not by a treaty of reciprocity, then they had taken a course most adverse to the interests of the country. He would take it, however, that it was a treaty of reciprocity; and it was on this ground that the noble Lord at the head of the Government last night recommended the adoption of the Treaty to the House, and said, in fact, it was absolutely necessary they should enter into it, because otherwise, owing to the peculiar position of the French, it would be impossible to secure the advantages which it gave. Let the House understand exactly how England stood towards France. We were going to make certain immediate concessions in reference to French productions, and in return we were to receive certain advantages at a distant period of eighteen months. But how stood the case of the wine duties as regarded other nations of Europe? First, with reference to Spain, Portugal, and Naples, it had always been the great object of the commercial classes of England, and especially of the commercial department of Her Majesty's Government, to obtain a reduction of the duties levied upon British commodities imported into those countries. Negotiations had taken place between us and the Governments of those kingdoms upon that subject, and the answer we received was—"We will admit your produce, but we must have a reduction of the duties which you levy on our wines." The reply of England to this was—"The duty imposed on your wines is not a protective duty, but one solely for the purposes of revenue, and as it produces a very large sum we cannot enter into any reciprocal arrangement, which would involve the sacrifice of a large amount of revenue, even for the sake of securing to a certain extent the admission of our own productions." The consequence was, we had not reduced the duty on the wines of those three countries, and they had not admitted British commodities. Again, Austria was willing to admit our wool and cotton, and various other articles of British produce; but she said our tariff was such that the wines of one portion of her empire—Hungary—were virtually excluded from this country; and, accordingly, we had remained also without a treaty of reciprocity with Austria. He could understand the position of the Government, if they had declined from beginning to end to enter into a treaty of reciprocity, as being inconsistent with the great principles of free trade which this country had adopted with such great success. But instead of employing any argument of this kind, the Government were actually claiming credit to themselves for having effected this reciprocal convention. And now he would ask what was the position of the Government and the country with regard to this treaty of reciprocity? By it we were to receive a certain concession; instead of prohibitive, there were to be high protective duties on certain articles of English produce imported into France, and we were to reduce the duty on French wines; but, at the same time that we did this, we in fact reduced the duties on Spanish, Portuguese, Sicilian, and Hungarian wines, and we altered the whole system of our revenue, arising from duties on wine, as regarded all the countries of Europe; and while Spain, Portugal, and Austria might claim to themselves the credit of entering into reciprocity treaties, we received no reciprocal concession from them. By entering into this reciprocity treaty the Government, in the first instance, abandoned that free-trade policy in which they had before prided themselves. Their treaty was an anachronism altogether; it was a retrograde measure; and so far, it met with his most decided opposition. But if it were to be viewed as a reciprocity treaty, then it was a most clumsy proceeding, because it reduced generally duties on foreign produce, while we received from the various foreign nations interested in this matter none of those tangible benefits which they were willing to afford, and that on the promise only of some return from France some eighteen months hence. The treaty was also objectionable because of this delay of eighteen months in its operation as to British produce—a delay which might possibly lead to misunderstandings, and perhaps complications. And he would tell the House why. No doubt if the duties on French wines were lowered there would be a much larger consumption of those wines in England, and the French producers would be largely benefited; but the moment they reduced the duties on all other foreign wines the proportion of French wines consumed would probably remain the same; while, in fact, a large increase would take place in the importation of those wines to which the people of this country were more accustomed, namely, the wines of Spain and Portugal, which possessed greater body and strength, and were probably more adapted to this climate and atmosphere. Now, if that should prove to be the case, what would be the result when the time came for France to perform her part of the agreement? He feared French producers, disappointed in their expectations during the eighteen months, would say, "We have entered into a bargain in which England has overreached us. They proposed to admit our produce, and led us to believe that there would be a great increase in the consumption of it. After eighteen months' experience we find there has been no great increase in the consumption of French wines, and yet we are called upon to carry out that which will probably very much injure our producers." This would, he believed, lead to misunderstanding, and possibly to contention. The French indeed believed that the introduction of this system would blow out all the forges in the north of France. He must, for himself, confess that he could not see the slightest necessity, in a commercial sense, for making immediate concessions to France for the sake of a prospective return at the end of eighteen months. But when he came to look at the question as a question of revenue, the position of the Government appeared to him infinitely more objectionable and unjustifiable. It appeared to him that, as regarded commercial treaties, the position of the House and the Government entirely changed after the adoption of the free-trade policy, and the moment they declared that there were no import duties levied in this country, except for the purposes of revenue. In the days when it was considered a part of the duty of the executive to watch over the industry of the country and to promote this, to repress the other branch of the trade, the Government were, no doubt, at liberty to enter into any commercial treaty by which certain restrictions on articles of foreign commerce were modified in return for concessions from abroad ; but the position of the Government was entirely changed when it was laid down as a rule that there should be no duties in this country save for the purposes of revenue. And yet, within a week of the meeting of Parliament, the Government had thought proper to enter into a treaty which would affect the permanence of revenue to the amount of three millions of money. Supposing a deficiency should occur under the new system—and whatever it might be ultimately, that could hardly be avoided during the first year—some new tax must be imposed to make up for it. It might be perfectly true that the wine duties were a tax not in the best state ; but it was quite clear that if there was to be any considerable reduction in these duties, they must be replaced by some new tax. What was that tax to be ? The wine duties chiefly pressed on the higher and opulent classes who could afford to indulge in such luxuries, and as a substitute for them, were they to have a continuance or an increase of the income tax, which touched many who did not drink wine ? If so, the Government would levy a tax on those who did not drink wine for the benefit of those who did—a tax on those who did not consume luxuries for the benefit of those who did. Or were they to continue the war duty on tea and sugar ? Did the Government contemplate taking off a duty on stimulants in order to maintain an increased duty on that which formed the beverage of the frugal and temperate ? Those were questions which ought to be put fairly before the House before the Government embarrassed themselves and the House, and to a certain extent, embarrassed the Crown, by entering upon a treaty which, subject of course to the approval of Parliament, involved a reduction of revenue duties. But in another point of view the treaty was very objectionable ; and this applied to commercial treaties generally. It was quite possible that the duty on wine at the present moment might not be in the best state, and that when reduced the increased consumption might lead to a larger revenue. It was an experiment, however, and they could only conjecture what the result would be. But in entering into a commercial treaty of this sort they prevented any return to an increased rate, should there be a falling off. They had often before had deficiencies of the revenue which rendered it necessary to put an additional ten or fifteen per cent upon the Customs' duties ; but the result of this commercial arrangement would be to throw the additional percentage, if found necessary, upon all articles except wine, to raise the price of articles of ordinary consumption among the poorer classes of the community, and to exempt one of the chief luxuries of the rich. These were the main objections to the treaty ; but beyond these he could not help thinking there was some special reason why the treaty was to be entered into just then, and he felt as confident as he could be upon any subject, where he had no documentary evidence, that it was with a political, and not a commercial object, that the convention had been got up. It was done with the object of diverting the attention of this country from the political relations of Her Majesty's Government with the Government of France, and it was assumed, no doubt, that as a nation of shopkeepers we should at once become engrossed in anything which wore a commercial aspect, and give no heed to what required the closest and most anxious scrutiny on the part of the House and the country—the political relations of the noble Viscount's Government and the Government of France. There was no man more anxious than he (Mr. FitzGerald) to maintain the most intimate relations between England and France. He believed it was for the benefit of both countries, and necessary for the peace of Europe and the world ; but there was a great deal of difference between having the most friendly feeling between the two nations and having an understanding between the two Governments which should amount to an identity of policy.

He believed that the policy the noble Lord was prepared to adopt, and the language he was disposed to hold to Europe, was this—"We and France are agreed, and you may do what you like." Now, such a policy could only be met by a combination of the other Powers who entertained different views, and the result of it could only be to divide Europe into two camps, and the maintenance of peace solely by the preponderance of power on the part of England and France. That was a most objectionable position to be held by this country. He thought so for many reasons. In the first place, if he understood the feeling of this country at all it was this, that we should not needlessly interfere in wars on the Continent; and this feeling arose not from mere commercial reasons, but he hoped and trusted from a higher and Christian view of our national responsibility. If, however, that policy was to be enforced when there existed this entente cordiale and this identity of policy between the two countries, it must end in this way: the Government which had the active military power, and put that policy into execution, would be the Power to lead, and it would only be for England to follow humbly in its wake. This was a position equally inconsistent with the honour and dignity and with the feelings of the people of this country. He was perfectly satisfied that it was possible for this country to maintain most amicable and friendly relations with France and the rest of Europe, and yet hold her own position, make her opinions and weight felt, and have the example of her liberal and enlightened policy followed. But he was perfectly certain that if there was one policy which, more than any other, would detract from the interest and lessen the influence of England, it was that of not maintaining the dignified independence which he had described, but attempting to preserve an identity of policy between the two Governments. There were many reasons why there should not be such an identity of policy. The English were not the people to go to war for an "idea." We regarded the reason and necessity for war in a very different light from that in which our neighbours regarded them; but, without entering into the many points of difference which must exist, looking to the form of our Government and the spirit and genius of the people, there were reasons why, without any identity of policy, we might maintain the most friendly relations and the most intimate alliance with France; but the moment they had that identity of policy which he believed it was the object of the noble Lord at the head of the Government to establish, they would jeopardize the whole prestige and influence of this country, and endanger that alliance which he believed it was the wish of the people of England to preserve.

MR. W. EWART wished to explain. He disapproved of the policy of a commercial treaty, because he thought it was opposed to the principle of free trade; but if the treaty in question could be reconciled with that principle, he should be glad to see such a treaty concluded.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he wished first to notice an observation, though a very slight one, made by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), which he thought ought not to be allowed to pass entirely without notice. The right hon. Baronet said he was glad that justice had at last been done by the Government to the gallantry of our naval forces in the action at the mouth of the Peiho, because it appeared to him that other and earlier occasions of doing that justice had been allowed to pass by without advantage being taken of them. On the part of the Government, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) ventured to say that they had always entertained that feeling of unqualified admiration which was expressed by his noble Friend at the head of the Government on the previous evening. He was not aware of any occasion which they had lost for giving expression to those sentiments; but if there was, and the right hon. Baronet brought it to their knowledge, they would at once express their regret for having overlooked it. But, of course, he rose principally to follow the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, and who had discussed very much at length a treaty which was not yet on the table of the House. The first question which would suggest itself to the mind of any man who had listened to the hon. Gentleman was, how in the world had that singular and fortunate Member of the House of Commons attained to such a minute and accurate knowledge of the character of the treaty—which had not yet been published to the world—as to be enabled to express his opinion upon it in so copious a manner, and in every possible point of view. Although his hon. Friend was incapable of a dishonourable action, he was almost led to the suspicion that he had secreted himself, after the ancient fashion, behind the tapestry of the room where the negotiations were going on, and in that extraordinary and not very creditable manner, obtained that knowledge of which he now gave the advantage to the House. In one respect he was very sorry for his hon. Friend; for he had put himself at a disadvantage by thus forestalling and anticipating the occasion for his objections, because—although due weight must attach to everything that fell from him, even under the most unfavourable circumstances—his sweeping denunciations of this unfortunate instrument—this disastrous convention—would have come with greater force, because they would come to the minds of an audience better prepared to receive them, if he had waited for the few days which must elapse before the treaty could be in the knowledge of the House. He had, however, emptied the budget of his objections, and when the treaty was actually laid on the table he would have no more objections to urge; or, even if his ingenuity found others, the freshness and bloom would have been taken off his criticisms, and his charge would have lost a great portion of its edge, because he had dealt with the matter in every possible and imaginable relation. His hon. Friend had endeavoured to show that the Government, in entering into the treaty, had been guilty of some grave violation of the constitutional rights of that House; but this he had done with rather more fulness than prudence, after the statement of the noble Lord at the head of the Government the previous night, that the treaty was framed in such a manner as to preserve intact and entire every right and privilege of the House, and that if it was to take effect it must do so only in virtue of the deliberate vote and decision of the House. If his hon. Friend considered the position of the Government weak in that respect, his mind must be, though probably unknown to himself, influenced by an adverse prepossession against the Government, which prevents him from delivering a perfectly impartial judgment on the subject. The hon. Gentleman had shown the House what an objectionable document this treaty was with regard to the principles of Free Trade; and he regretted to say he was not at liberty to follow him in his discussion. He must be content to wait, as I hope the House will be also, until, in compliance with the necessary forms of diplomatic proceeding and the principles of the constitution, which he could assure his hon. Friend the Government had not altogether forgotten, the treaty could be produced, and they could have ample discussion of its merits, not in their present state of ignorance as to what it really was, but in the clear light of day and in the full knowledge of all its particulars. For the present he must beg to adjourn the defence of the principles of Free Trade and the establishment of the relation in which this treaty stands to them. Notwithstanding the denunciations of the hon. Gentleman, he could assure him that he entertained a full and perfect confidence that when Parliament should have obtained a knowledge of the subject on which it was to pass judgment, and when on one side and on the other they had come to a clear and comprehensive understanding of what the treaty was to effect, the verdict of Parliament would be favourable to the proceedings that had been concluded. His hon. Friend had told them that the treaty was bad as regarded Free Trade and commerce, but far worse as regarded revenue. It was monstrous, he says, to take up a subject of this kind after we have declared that we have no duties but those for the purposes of revenue. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) must confess his ignorance of the time when they had made any such assertion. He should like to know whether his hon. Friend would pledge himself to the fact that we have no duties but those for revenue, and whether he will maintain that the 15s. a gallon on brandy, compared with 8s. on spirits, was a duty solely for revenue. If he would, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) must join issue with him upon that matter. In point of fact, it was not true that we have no duties but those for revenue. It was true that we had been engaged for a great many years in a gradual, and he was thankful to say, sweeping purgation of our tariff, but though that task had gone far it was not yet fully accomplished; and he would soon invite his hon. Friend, as a man ardently attached to the principles of free trade, to join with the Government in congratulating the country upon another great step made towards the accomplishment of that object. He was afraid that his hon. Friend, who was so learned in things he did not know, had not taken adequate pains to inform himself of things he might know; because, however he might stand with respect to the future—and that the best of them could not conceive or conjecture—he was not accurate in his estimate of facts belonging to the past. He went back to the history of former negotiations for commercial treaties, which he said had proved abortive, and declared that our negotiations with Spain, Portugal, and Austria broke down because, as the duties we were desired to reduce were levied for revenue, we could not make the concessions which those countries demanded from us in return for the reduction of duties on articles of our manufacture. Well, he would not dwell on the history of those negotiations, but he had a large part in them, and his noble Friend who sat near him had likewise a large part in them; and so far from its being the fact that we always reserved the wine duties as duties on revenue, and were unwilling to touch them as being levied for purposes of revenue, there was not one of those negotiations, whether with France or Portugal, or Spain—and those were the great cases at issue—in which we did not offer large reductions of those very duties. Perhaps the real reason why those negotiations did not succeed was, because the two parties looked at the matter from different points of view, and could not agree as to the relative value of the concessions to be made on either side. Probably we did not proceed on that large and comprehensive basis on which alone such arrangements could be carried out. Then his hon. Friend said, that the wine duties were not in the best state. Now, he must say that was a very mild way of stating the case. The wine duties were not in a good state, but his hon. Friend did not support that opinion of his at all; and he (Mr. Gladstone), should rather have said, according to his hon. Friend's speech, that they were in the best state. For what did the hon. Gentleman tell them? He told them what, if it was true, was a very high eulogy indeed on duties that yielded £1,700,000 a year. He said they were duties that pressed only upon the rich. Well, he presumed his hon. Friend's words had a definite meaning. He said that the main pressure of them was upon the rich, and not upon the middle classes or the poor. But why did not these duties press upon the poor? Simply because they prohibited wines from being used by the poor. The wine duties did not press upon the poor because, with those duties, wines never came within their reach. The duties stood like a wall of brass between the poor man and a glass of wine. That was the reason why the wine duties fell only upon the rich; that was to say, the rich paid the duty and never thought of it;

the poor never drank wine, and therefore the hon. Gentleman said those duties did not press upon the poor. This was the way in which the hon. Gentleman dealt with the treaty that he had not seen, as respected the principle of free trade, and as respected the revenue; and then he ascended to still higher matters, in which he was loth to follow him. Although it was bad in respect of free trade—although with regard to revenue it was infinitely worse, to say nothing of its being a breach of the constitutional privileges of that House—the hon. Gentleman had not yet come to the climax. The climax of the case was this—there was a latent intention of drawing closer, in some mysterious way, the relations between this country and France, and, great as were the other evils, this was the weightiest and most dangerous offence of all. The hon. Gentleman said it would be very objectionable to maintain the peace of Europe by the preponderating power of England and France, and he said that the Government were aiming at an understanding that should bring us in all cases to an identity of policy between the two countries; and he said it was their object to divert the attention of the House from the political relations between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of France. If it were so, the plot had most signally failed, and they had that day had the proof; for on the very first day of the Session there had come down an hon. Gentleman, than whom no one had more completely detected them, exposed this clandestine procedure, and entirely blasted whatever hopes they might have entertained of concealing their infamous intentions. Well, then, his hon. Friend must feel that if this detestable policy had been concocted by Government, he had rendered a great service to the country, because at any rate now they should not succeed in diverting attention from the political relations between Her Majesty's Government and France. His hon. Friend was afraid of too close an understanding between the Government of England and the Government of France. In former times there had been individuals, even, perhaps, in that House, who had felt an ineradicable and incurable jealousy of a close amity between France and England. He had hoped that those times were passed, and yet he could not say he felt assured of that, after listening to the speech of the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman said he wished for an intimate alliance with France, but not for identity of policy; he was afraid of identity. Is there any other man in the House who is afraid of an identity of policy with France? Is there any other Member who believes in the possibility of an identity of policy, in all cases and at all times, between the policy of England and France? Now the practical question at issue was this—did any of them believe that there could be, in the nature of things, too close an understanding between England and France? The hon. Gentleman believed that there could. It was the fear of this too close understanding that had roused his hon. Friend's apprehensions and unloosed his tongue upon the present occasion. He said, in answer to his hon. Friend, that there could not be too close an understanding between England and France; because it lay in the nature of the case, it lay in the circumstances of the two countries, it lay in the circumstances of Europe, that it was hardly a possible contingency that France and England should ever be associated in policy except for objects that were laudable of themselves and beneficial for mankind. He knew of no occasion in our own day—he knew of no occasion in history—with regard to the policy of Europe, when England and France had been in alliance for a bad object; and therefore he wished—and he might say for his colleagues that they wished—the alliance to be drawn closer and closer, not only on account of its intrinsic value, but because they felt that it contained in itself nothing that could, by any possibility, be hostile to the interests of the other Powers of Europe. The best proof of this was—and his hon. Friend could not fail to have perceived—that though there had been of late years close association between the Governments of France and England, yet that association had not provoked the jealousy or suspicion of other Powers—because it was known and felt to be an association which could only be applied to good ends. He was far from thinking that he had offered a perfectly satisfactory answer to all the objections of his hon. Friend, because he did not like to proceed to a detailed argument of the case till the treaty was in the hands of the House, and therefore he would here notice a question which was put by his right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) as to the period when the practical proposals contained in the treaty would be submitted by the Government to the House. Now the treaty was signed the day before yesterday, and it was provided in it that the ratifications should be exchanged within ten days, which was a very short time for the necessary review of so important an instrument. That brought them to the latter part of next week, and at that time, about that time, it would be practicable to present it to the House. And when the treaty was presented to the House, it was the view of Her Majesty's Government that the propositions it contained should be submitted to the judgment of the House upon the very earliest day on which it would be convenient for Members to take them into consideration. But Her Majesty's Government had likewise felt that, as those propositions had an important connection with revenue, as they entered into questions bearing on the general financial arrangements of the year, they would therefore not be doing full justice to the House unless with the particular propositions contained in the treaty they combined the general statement of the revenue and expenditure of the year. With regard to the introduction of that statement, it was their desire that it should take place upon the earliest possible day. They felt quite satisfied that the House would permit any deviation of form that did not involve a violation of principle, in order that they might attain the great and principal object in view in the manner that was least inconvenient; because it was perfectly true, though he had never stated one particular with regard to the provisions of this convention, that impressions had gone abroad which might be more or less well-founded, which were exercising a paralyzing effect upon certain important branches of trade. They would have to consider some questions connected with the forms of the House, with relation to the different modes of procedure with regard to votes of money and votes of supply; but his hope was that they might be able to make arrangements which would enable them to lay the treaty on the table of the House and subject the general financial statement for the year on Monday week. It was their desire that not a moment should be lost in bringing these questions forward, and that there might be the fullest discussion in regard to them.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that he was not actuated by the zeal of a convert to the doctrine of free imports, and he was not prepared to condemn unseen a commercial treaty which had been referred to by Her Majesty in Her gracious speech from the Throne ; but he wished at this, the earliest opportunity, to call attention to the heavy duties imposed by the Government of France on thrown and coloured silks. In the silk trade the French possessed a monopoly, not only through having command of the raw material but of the fashions. A duty of 15 per cent. was therefore retained by Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Goulburn, and the ablest disciples of the doctrines of Adam Smith, as the only means to place our manufacturers upon a par with their competitors in France. He respected Adam Smith far more than some of his modern disciples, and was not adverse to Free Trade, understanding by that term equality of exchange, when that principle was fairly carried out on both sides, though he thought it often needed modification according to circumstances ; but he was no advocate for the blind adoption of a system of unrestricted imports, which might and had been grossly taken advantage of by France, to the damage of our commerce. If Her Majesty's Government had induced France to make some concessions in return for the great boons which England had conferred on her commerce in past years, he should not reproach them for acting on principles of common sense.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD explained that he did not say we levied no duties except for the purposes of revenue, but that the adoption of free trade implied an intention to levy duties only for the purposes of revenue.

MR. HORSMAN asked permission to remark upon the important statement which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had just made to the House. He did not wish to make any allusion to the commercial treaty which was not yet before them, nor to our general relations with France, except so far as to answering, in passing, the question of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether there was any one who could conceive it possible to have too close an approximation to that country. He said that we could be in too close approximation only in one way, which was, when approximation to France meant separation from the rest of Europe. The policy of England should be to have amicable relations with all the great Powers of Europe, but not to seek separate or exclusive alliances with any. But what he principally rose to allude to was this :—The Chancellor of the Exchequer, confirming the declaration of the noble Lord

at the head of the Government, which they had heard with much satisfaction last night, that the conditions of the treaty were contingent on the approval of Parliament, stated that the decision of Parliament would probably be invited about the 6th of February. He had watched with some interest the desultory discussion which had taken place upon a variety of topics, and he had come to the conclusion which the announcement which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had confirmed that great practical inconvenience was likely to be caused, and their discussions likely to be embarrassed by the unnecessary and unexplained postponement of the Reform Bill of the Government for four weeks. He said the postponement was unexplained, because he never in his Parliamentary experience remembered so scanty a budget of Ministerial measures announced to the House on the first night of a Session. It consisted of a measure for the reform of the Corporation of London, a Bill on the Annuity Tax, a Bill in reference to Mines in Cornwall, and a Committee to consider the Acts relative to the Consolidated Fund. The House could not for some days go into Committee of Supply. Many questions had been asked, and satisfactorily answered by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, but he should like to hear the noble Lord give the reasons which had induced the Government to put off for a whole month the introduction of the Reform Bill, which, as was said by the Mover of the Address, had been long promised and often delayed. Whatever differences of opinion there might be in the House and in the country on some points—and some persons were for a large, some for a small, and some might be for no measure at all, there was one point on which all were agreed—that the question should be speedily settled. The best means of arriving at a speedy settlement was an early introduction of the Bill, and unnecessary delay was a sign of apathy, or indecision. He had some right to say this, as he ventured to tell the House last year that postponing the question was likely to embarrass the party with whom he acted, and that they would find it easier to defeat a Bill of their opponents, than to construct one of their own. He predicted then that a delay of twelve months would occur, but he was told that a Bill would be brought in and laid on the table before the recess. The Session closed without the introduction of a Bill ; an autumnal Session was then promised but gradually lost sight of, and then they were told that it would be the first measure introduced by the Government in the present Session. Parliament had now met, and so far from being the first measure that was brought forward a number of insignificant measures were to have precedence, and it was put off for a whole month. As his noble Friend near him had said, the Government might have taken the course of introducing the Bill next week, and allowing the country three weeks or a month to consider it. The second reading might then have been taken before March. At any rate they would have seen the measure and the constituencies would have known what was proposed. The hon. Gentleman, the Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby), had gone to-day into the question of the war with China, and it was possible that a Motion might be brought forward in regard to that question. There were some indications also that this country would be invited to go into Congress on the affairs of Italy. That was a question upon which he expressed decided opinions last year, and those opinions were unchanged. They had had to-day a discussion of the commercial treaty with France. The decision of the House might before long be asked on one or all of these questions; and it was obvious that the fate of the Government might depend upon that decision. Two years ago a Reform Bill was promised by the Government, and was expected to be introduced; but, in the meantime, a question occurred with France; the Conspiracy Bill was brought in; a majority of the House, of which he was one, rejected the Conspiracy Bill, and the Government was changed. The reproach was then made that the majority on that occasion deprived the country of the advantage of a Reform Bill. He felt on this occasion that there was nothing in connection with the question of Reform so important as having the Bill introduced, that they might know what it was which the Cabinet were about to propose, which the Liberal party were ready to accept, and which the country, therefore, was expected to endorse. He should be sorry to see the House come to a vote on China, on the commercial treaty, or on the Congress, if the carrying a vote against the Government should prevent their seeing the Reform Bill; and he felt that their deliberations would be embarrassed, and votes to some extent affected, by the consideration that the non-production of the Reform

Bill would be a great misfortune. It did not matter so much whether it was a large Bill or a small Bill—they ought to know, for the sake of future Governments, what was the Bill which the present one was prepared to recommend, and then, under any Government, the House would, he believed, see its way. The present Government enjoyed advantages which no other Government had or was likely to possess. All parties were prepared to accept such a measure as was now expected. Among advanced reformers never was there such a spirit of moderation, and among the Conservative party never was there so general a disposition to acquiesce. But at the same time he could not help expressing his apprehension that if there were a change of Government those who were now prepared to follow Ministers in moderate measures, while they were on this side of the House, might not unsuccessfully invite Ministers to follow them in more extensive changes if they were sent into Opposition. That was the danger which he apprehended, and it was, in his opinion, a calamity which should be avoided. Therefore it was that it was important that they should know the character of the measure that was to be proposed. Whether the measure was large or small, the House ought to know what was the maximum which the Government were prepared to give and what the minimum which their followers would allow to be carried. When they had once seen the Bill and accepted the second reading, they would be disembarrassed for the consideration of other questions. He felt that of all questions it was one upon which the Government ought not now to exhibit anything like indifference, or to leave themselves open to the suspicion that a Bill was not introduced because it was not ready. If the introduction of the measure was postponed to the 20th February, they might possibly not get into Committee before Easter; in the meantime other important measures would come on to be considered; and he believed there were Members on both sides of the House who would regret a vote that would prevent their seeing this Reform Bill. He had always held the same language, that an early discussion of the measure and an early settlement were now desirable; and it was not so much with the view of raising any discussion as of protesting against delay, which he only did consistently with the opinions which he had before expressed.

MR. J. C. EWART said, he was anxious that the question of reform should be settled as soon as possible, but he had no hesitation in saying that he believed the general feeling of the country at present was more in favour of getting some of the great commercial questions settled than in settling the question of Reform in Parliament. He believed that there were many classes of French wines which, if the duty were reduced, would come considerably into consumption in this country, and that if we should make that concession to France, France would meet this country in reference to the duty on hardwares and other articles. He could not help expressing his anxious wish that Government would take into its consideration the importance of establishing the principle that the flag covered the cargo. When there was a danger of a war with France the Liverpool merchants were obliged to send out orders to India not to bring cargo in British vessels.

SIR DE LACY EVANS wished to put a question to the noble Lord with regard to the period when it might be expected the debate on the Chinese question would be entered upon. He thought the House should have an opportunity, as early as possible and before the operations in China were decided upon, of expressing an opinion as to the extent to which operations should be carried on, or whether they should be carried on at all. Some expressions of the noble Lord, hinting at the possibility of our being relieved from the necessity of any extensive operations, had given considerable satisfaction, but they were of rather an indefinite character. There had been great congratulations expressed in both Houses upon the triumphant success of our diplomatic and naval and military proceedings; but last night it was stated in "another place" that those proceedings were not at all conclusive, and that the present state of affairs was a mere continuation of our operations against Canton. A very important question, which ought to be very early considered, was, whether the proofs of fitness given during recent diplomatic transactions were such as to acquire for the gentleman who had the charge of our affairs in that country, that degree of confidence which justified his being continued in that important position. There was also a personal question upon which he felt strongly, and that was with regard to the conduct of the Admiralty towards Admiral Hope. Admiral Hope was placed in a most peculiar and disadvantageous position in conducting the operations in China. He did not select the place of attack. He was there to escort the Minister Plenipotentiary, and without being allowed any option or the exercise of his own judgment, he was given to understand that he was expected to open by force a way to Peking. He had no option, and that was a rather hard measure of responsibility to put upon any Admiral. Our diplomatic representative who refused any intercourse with the representatives of the Chinese Government at Shanghai, appeared to have been in entire ignorance of the obstacles prepared, and the consequence was that Admiral Hope, having no option, made an attack with an inadequate force. In a cursory discussion like this, he would not enter upon the point whether Admiral Hope had shown all the skill and prudence required in the management of the task imposed on him, but there was abundant evidence that as representative of our naval forces and our naval glory Admiral Hope gave almost the highest proofs of personal heroism of which this country had any record. The French had a small force, and strictly speaking, suffered as much as ourselves. They were unsuccessful. But what did the French Government do? They considered the merits of their officers, and rewarded them accordingly. Although there was the testimony of both French and Americans to the unexampled honour of Admiral Hope, he did not find that either the Admiral or the gallant men whom he commanded had received the smallest particle of distinction or approbation from Her Majesty's Government. There were many Gentlemen who understood the subject infinitely better than he did, and he hoped an early opportunity would be afforded of vindicating in public opinion the conduct of our naval commander in China, and the officers under him, and at the same time of fully elucidating our prospects as to the extent and character of the operations about to be commenced in that part of the world.

MR. BUCHANAN wished to know whether we had ever been at war with China. During the first and second series of hostilities, there was no declaration of war, and trade was going on in the north, so as to supply the Chinese treasury with funds to fight against us in the south. Mercantile contracts all contained a clause, excepting the operations of the Queen's enemies. What he wanted to know was whether Chinese junks, which seized English cargoes, were the Queen's enemies or not?

MR. BENTINCK said, he had the highest possible respect for the opinion of his right hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman). His right hon. Friend felt that any discussion of important questions taking place anterior to the introduction of the Reform Bill would peril that great measure by perilling the position of Her Majesty's Government; but he (Mr. Bentinck) confessed to being one of those who unfortunately recollected all the evils that accrued to this country from the first Coalition Government, and he could not very deeply lament the fall of a second. The point to which he wished to allude particularly was this. His right hon. Friend had said, with great truth, that although a certain number of persons in this country might be anxious for a large measure of reform, and though others might be equally anxious for a much more moderate measure than was at first expected, there was also a large proportion of the country who did not consider the question of Parliamentary Reform an important question at all. Now he quite agreed with this view of the subject, except that, in point of fact, he thought the great majority of the people of this country felt an entire indifference to the question of reform, and his right hon. Friend did not argue with his usual logical force, because he admitted that there was among a certain portion of the people a great indifference to reform, while at the same time he found fault with the noble Lord at the head of the Government for not postponing all other questions to the question of reform. But whatever might be the amount of eagerness on the question of reform, there could be no doubt that in the other great questions referred to in the course of the debate universal interest was felt, and therefore the charge brought against the Government of acting unwisely in postponing a question upon which numbers of persons in this country were totally indifferent, for the purpose of first discussing questions which were of deep interest to all parties, could hardly be sustained. His right hon. Friend had shown that personal zeal in the question of reform which all who knew him gave him the credit of possessing; but at the same time he thought it must occur to the House that there were other questions still more important than this question of reform. The country had been able to get on very well for the last nine years without reform, although it had been repeatedly promised. He could not help thinking that the noble Lord had taken a most satisfactory course in postponing a measure on which there was no general interest manifested throughout the country, for the purpose of discussing measures far more important. For these reasons, he hoped that the noble Lord would not be induced to alter the determination which he had come to respecting the time at which he intended to introduce the Reform Bill.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, that the speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed them showed that delay was the game of the party who wished to obstruct reform, and therefore wished the noble Lord would introduce his Bill at an earlier period than the 20th of February. There could be no great difficulty in laying the Bill upon the table of the House. It might be introduced in an uncommonly short speech, and the country could then form an opinion upon it. There was a great deal of force in the remark of the right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman). It was pretty clear there would be a debate upon the Chinese war, and if the Government were placed in a minority it would be said, "What a dreadfully cruel thing of you Reformers to turn out the Government upon the Chinese question, and so strangle them and their Reform Bill together!"

MR. W. WILLIAMS strongly advocated the immediate placing of the Reform Bill on the table of the House. If the Cabinet was agreed upon it he could not conceive why, after its long process of incubation, the Bill should not at once be laid before Parliament. It was clear that there was to be a great debate upon the Chinese war; and if the Reform Bill were not brought in before, and the Government should happen to go out, they would be charged with stifling the question of reform altogether.

MR. JOSEPH LOCKE denied that the people were not anxious for reform. The opinion of the people had been expressed upon it over and over again. They were most anxious for reform—not only that the suffrage should be extended, but that bribery and intimidation should be prevented. If the Reform Bill to be brought in by the Government should have its shortcomings, or was as distasteful even as the Bill of the late Government, why then it could be thrown out, and the present Government would of course fall with its Bill; but he thought it would be hypercritical for hon. Members to find fault with the Government for not bringing in the measure sooner, for there would be abundance of time after the 20th of February to discuss the provisions not only of the Bill for England but for Ireland also.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON :—I will only trouble the House with a few words. With regard to the observations of my right hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman), as to the time at which the Reform Bill is to be introduced, I beg to remind him that it is impossible for the Government to satisfy the wishes of all Members as to the course of public business. My right hon. Friend and others who agree with him are desirous that the Reform Bill should be the first measure proposed; but others do not think so. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Westminster (Sir De L. Evans), seemed to attach great importance to the early decision of questions connected with China; other Members feel that, whereas a treaty of commerce has been concluded with France, involving the regulation of our commercial system, that that ought to be the first measure taken into the consideration of this House; other Members attach great importance to the general view of our finances, and would prefer giving my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer an opportunity of bringing on his Budget. Thus, it may be at once seen that Her Majesty's Government cannot meet the wishes and opinions of all the Members, but must endeavour to arrange so as to create least disturbance in the course of public business, and to bring the various matters submitted to the House to a satisfactory and useful result. I can assure my right hon. Friend that there is no reason whatever for supposing that the Reform Bill being brought in on the 20th February, there will not be time for discussing all its details, and, as I hope, passing it into law in the course of the present Session of Parliament. My right hon. Friend indirectly intimated that until this Bill be discussed—indeed, I think he said passed; his reasoning went so far—we might not expect anything like a hostile vote from him which would at all affect the existence of the Government. I am very much obliged to my right hon. Friend for that information. I think it would be ungenerous to seek strictly to hold him to the letter of his promise—the Government can only take it for an indication of his intention to give us fair play until the measure of reform is safely harboured in the receptacle of the statutes at large. With regard to China, I think it would be out of place in me to enter into any arguments as to these transactions until the papers be laid before the House, which will be at an early period; and then it will be proper to enter into details, and examine the course which the Government have taken in regard to these operations. But my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Buchanan) wishes it to be explained whether we are at war with China or not. He said, very correctly, that as regards the relations between the Queen and the Emperor of China, we never have been during the late transactions "at war;" that is to say, the Emperor of China has never thought fit to consider the operations at Canton for the purpose of obtaining satisfaction for the outrage there committed upon us a rupture in the relations between the two empires; and accordingly we continue to trade with Amoy, Foo-chow, Shanghai, and the other ports. And such is the position of things at present. If the treaty had been ratified, no doubt the relations between the two countries would be on a more satisfactory footing than they have hitherto stood; but the ratification not having taken place, we are in the same state exactly as before Lord Elgin went to negotiate that treaty with the Emperor of China. It was made known that the Chinese Government did not wish the commercial relations between the two countries to be disturbed on account of what took place in the Peiho River, or of the antecedent proceedings at Canton. If a declaration of war had been issued it would have been impossible for us to have carried on commercial transactions at Shanghai and elsewhere, and which intercourse is now proceeding at those places; and it will be a matter for the grave consideration of the House whether, in consequence of outrageous acts of this sort, those commercial relations should be disturbed as long as they can be carried on consistently with the commercial advantage of the two countries.

ITALY.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY gave notice that he would to-morrow ask Whether any information had been received as to the existence of the negotiations between Sardinia and France, alluded to in the French ministerial journals for the annexation of the Duchy of Savoy and the County of Nice to the dominions of the empire of France; and gave notice that he should raise a discussion on the subject to-morrow. The noble Marquess proceeded to say, that he would take that opportunity of correcting a misapprehension which had arisen, owing probably to the accidental failure of his voice, as to his observations on the affairs of Italy the other night. It was true, as had been reported, that he expressed his opinion that the different countries of Central Italy ought not to be subject to any foreign intervention, either on the side of change or against it. He was supposed to mean that he trusted that England would not interfere forcibly on one side any more than Austria on the other. His noble Friend near him (Lord Brougham) heard him, and could confirm his present statement, that what he did really say was, that he trusted that Sardinia, in reference to anything that touched upon territorial limits, would be considered a foreign country as well as Austria, and that whenever the time came for the different States of Central Italy to be called upon to decide upon their future condition they would be able to act according to the free and independent voice of each State, subject neither to the armed intervention or the secret intrigues of Sardinia or any other Power.

LORD BROUGHAM concurred in the accuracy of the noble Marquess's explanation, as a matter of memory. The noble Marquess held that Sardinia should be taken to be a foreign country as much as Austria was a foreign country, and that Austria should no more be regarded as a foreign country than Sardinia. He (Lord Brougham) by no means admitted that Sardinia was a foreign Power as France was, for all the Sardinian territories were in Italy, whereas Austria and France had the bulk of their territories out of Italy, and could not, therefore, be reckoned Italian. He certainly was decidedly of opinion that the best thing that could happen to the Italians would be, that they should join themselves under Sardinia—under Sardinia—and form a great Italian Power, not a Power of Central Italy, but a Power of Northern Italy, which would not only defend Italy, but resist Austria, and even it might be resist France.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he would not prolong the discussion by inquiring how far his noble and learned Friend's present project was either practicable or desirable. He heard it with some surprise. At the same time he could not concur in the reason given for it, that all the Sardinian territories were in Italy. That is not the case, and would not be so unless the cession of Savoy to France, on which he was about to ask a question to-morrow, was a fait accompli. He was glad, however, again to hear his noble and learned Friend state that he concurred to this extent, that Sardinia should not exercise any influence upon the decision of other independent States.

THE QUEEN'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

The LORD STEWARD of the HOUSEHOLD (the Earl St. GERMAN) brought up the following gracious Message from HER MAJESTY in Answer to the Address:—

MY LORDS,

I thank you for your loyal and dutiful Address.

It will afford Me sincere Satisfaction to co-operate with you in your Endeavours to improve the Law, to extend the Commerce, and to strengthen the Institutions of the Country.

COURT OF CHANCERY BILL.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR presented a Bill for improving the procedure of the Court of Chancery, which had been found necessary owing to one of the greatest improvements ever effected in that Court—namely, the abolition of the Masters in Chancery—a measure first suggested many years ago by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham). Those gentlemen had performed their duties, so far as the system would allow them, in a very exemplary manner; but under that system suitors were kept oscillating between the Lord Chancellor and the Masters, and vast delay and expense were the result. One les of the Masters was that they ver hear a cause for more than at a time, and after the first the hour was almost spent in ting the proceedings which had ce before, so that a cause which ave occupied but a few days arly as many years. A Bill at ased, by which the Masters' ere abolished, and Chief Clerks were appointed who should act under the Judges, and for whose proceedings the Judges should be held responsible. That was found a salutary alteration, and one which had greatly expedited the transaction of business. Some of the functions performed by the Masters, however, such as taking notice of persons committed for contempt of the Court and pauper defendants were not provided for by the measure then passed. The Bill he now presented remedied these omissions. It provided that the Solicitor to the Suitors' Fund should be the officer whose duty it should be to visit the Queen's Prison and examine the prisoners therein confined for contempt, and report to the Lord Chancellor, and to be the ex officio solicitor to pauper defendants, and to lunatic prisoners; It provided also for an additional salary to be paid to the solicitor for the performance of these duties. The Bill provided also for the custody of deeds in the care of the late Masters; and for the appointment of an additional Chief Clerk, and two junior Clerks to the Master of the Rolls, who, however, might be transferred to any of the Vice-Chancellors if business should require it.

Bill, to make better Provision for the Relief of Prisoners in Contempt of the High Court of Chancery and Pauper Defendants; and for the more efficient Despatch of Business in the said Court, read 1st.

House adjourned at half-past five o'clock, till To-morrow half-past Four o'clock.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND SERVICES. QUESTION.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department Whether the Government intend to bring forward any measure for the relief of parishioners in cases where the incumbent of a living holds doctrines and adopts a ceremonial so closely approaching those of the Church of Rome that they do not oblige him to leave the Church of England, yet have the effect of preventing the great majority of his parishioners, on conscientious motives, from attending his ministration of the Services and Sacrament?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: The question of the hon. Gentleman referred, he apprehended, to occurrences that have recently taken place in St. George's-in-the-East.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR: Not only there, but elsewhere.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: No recent case had been brought under his notice except that, and he certainly understood that it was to that case the Question mainly referred. It would be unnecessary for him to state, therefore,—what he thought the hon. Gentleman desired to be informed of—namely, the steps that had been taken in regard to that case. Without, therefore, making particular allusion to that case, he would say he believed that in the great majority of such cases as had occurred—not recently only, but at previous times—the objection had not been so much to the doctrines taught as to the manner in which the rites and ceremonies of the Church had been performed; and certainly in the case which he had particularly in view, so far as he was informed, the objection had been directed exclusively against the manner in which the Church service had been performed, and not to the doctrines preached from the pulpit. He was not aware that it would be possible to lay down by law any such definition as the hon. Gentleman pointed out in his Question, and the Government were not prepared to introduce any such measure as he had described. If, however, the hon. Gentleman himself should wish to propose a Bill upon the subject, he (Sir George Lewis) could only say that he should be extremely delighted to find that, in the exercise of his ingenuity, the hon. Gentleman was able to draw a line that would define what at present appeared to him to be very obscure. Until he saw clearly his way to that end he certainly should not ask the House to allow him to introduce such a Bill.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR: His Question certainly referred in part to St. George's-in-the-East; but that was one case only out of many.

HEAD QUARTERS FOR THE GUARDS. QUESTION.

MR. HENRY BARING asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can state when the Head Quarters for the Guards, in lieu of the Barracks in Portman Street, would be completed?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, the site had been purchased and the land prepared for the building, but it would probably be two years before they were completed.

LORD MELVILLE AND THE RIFLE CORPS. QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO said, The Scotsman of the 19th instant contained the report of a meeting of the quarter sessions of the county of Midlothian, where a discussion arose with reference to volunteer rifle corps. At that meeting Lord Melville, the Commander-in-Chief of Her Majesty's Forces in Scotland, was reported to have thus expressed himself,—“ Lord Melville said, he would much rather see the militia placed on a better and more efficient footing. You can never make efficient these, what I call, loose and useless rifle corps. They can never make an efficient force. The militia, if put on a proper footing, may become efficient, but the rifle corps can never be efficient in the field. They are perfectly useless, and no general officer would command them.” The Question he (Lord Elcho) had to put to the Secretary for War was, whether he approved of a person, in the high position of Commander-in-Chief of Her Majesty's Forces in Scotland, holding language such as this in reference to volunteer rifle corps? He would further ask him, whether any official notice had been taken of this very remarkable speech?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: I confess that I rather regret that my noble Friend should have put this Question. It is difficult to define the exact line beyond which a military man should not tread in speaking upon any question of the day. In this particular case Lord Melville, whom I may describe as being a very outspoken man, and as holding strong opinions which he sometimes expresses in equally strong language, but who at the same time is a first-rate soldier, certainly did attend that meeting, and did use the expressions which my noble Friend has quoted. The Commander-in-Chief wrote to him expressing his opinion upon the subject of his having taken such an opportunity of advancing the views which he held with regard to that force; and Lord Melville has written to the Commander-in-Chief, and frankly expressed his regret at the terms which he used. At the same time, though I certainly do not share in Lord Melville's opinion, it must be recollected that this was not a meeting convened to discuss the question of the volunteer movement, but was a meeting which answers to our quarter sessions, and his observations were couched in reply to a proposal for giving some aid out of the country rates to the volunteer corps.

MANNING THE NAVY.

RETURNS MOVED FOR.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER moved for the following Returns :—

“Returns of the number of Men who entered under the Bounty Proclamation, and of the number who have since deserted; distinguishing those who entered under the Bounty, and those who did not so enter :

“Of the total number of Men who deserted during the year immediately preceding the time of the Proclamation :

“Of the number of Men who have enrolled themselves in the Royal Naval Reserve Corps :

“Of the number of Men now serving who have completed ten and fifteen years' service, distinguishing each.

“And, of the number of Men not serving, who receive the short service pension; and the number of men not serving who are entitled to the short service pension, but who have not claimed it.”

He had been told that these returns would be objected to on the score of difficulty and expense. He was unwilling to incur unnecessary expense, but he thought the returns he asked for were of the very highest importance to the interests of the country, for when the House had voted large sums of money for a particular purpose, they ought to know how far the money had effected the object in view. The Admiralty cost the country £130,000 a year, and there ought to be no difficulty in furnishing the returns.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET hoped his gallant Friend would not persist with his Motion. There was no desire whatever to conceal any of the facts; but to procure some of these returns would involve considerable expense to the public, and even then he did not think they would effect the object his gallant Friend had in view. With regard to the number of men who had entered under the bounty proclamation, and of the number who had since deserted, the total was not difficult to furnish; but to distinguish those who had entered under the bounty and those who did not would involve the sending out to all the different stations, to China, the Pacific, &c., for the purpose of examining the several ships' books. As to the number of men who had deserted during the year immediately preceding the time of the proclamation, that there would be no difficulty in giving. As to the number of men who had enrolled themselves in the Royal Naval Reserve Corps, that he understood his gallant Friend was ready to defer. As to the number of men now serving who have completed ten and fifteen years' service, distinguishing each, that too would involve the sending out to foreign stations; but with regard to the number of men not serving, who receive the short service pension, that he should be happy to furnish his gallant Friend. The last return asked for was the number of men not serving who are entitled to the short service pension, but have not claimed it. Now, it was impossible to state that, because there was no record whatever. Nothing was known about these men. They had left the service and could not claim the pension. He would take that opportunity of stating that he was sure the object of his gallant Friend was the public good; but he could have little notion of the expense to which he put the country by these returns. In June, 1858, the gallant Admiral's returns in reference to deserters caused the employment of no less than six clerks for six months, at a cost to the country of £500.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, that every ship on a foreign station sent home two monthly books, which would give the information he sought. Unless the House knew how many men had deserted after receiving the bounty how would they be in a position to ascertain how the navy was to be manned? He wanted to know whether the Admiralty had used proper means to apprehend and punish these deserters. In his opinion no punishment, not even flogging, was too severe for men who accepted the Queen's bounty of £10 and a suit of clothes for the purpose of deserting. He doubted whether the Admiralty had taken proper steps to bring these men to condign punishment. He had no objection to give up a portion of the returns.

Motion put, and negatived.

PETITIONS OF RIGHT.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. BOVILL moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to Petitions of Right, to simplify the proceedings, and to make provision for the costs thereof. He stated that, according to the present state of the law, great difficulties and inconveniences were experienced by merchants, ship-owners, contractors and others, in every case of litigation with the Government. When a contractor failed in his engagements with the Government, the remedy they had against him was simple, expeditious, and easy. But if the contractor had any cause of complaint against the Government, the proceedings were in the highest degree inconvenient, dilatory, and expensive, and amounted, practically, to a denial of justice altogether. He might inform the House what took place in the case of the last Petition of Right that was brought before a court of law. A person took a contract to supply the Admiralty with naval stores, and afterwards made a claim upon them for breach of contract to the extent of between £2,000 and £3,000, and he insisted that he had fulfilled the conditions of his contract. A dispute, however, arose between him and the Board, and by means of a Petition of Right he brought the question into court, and recovered to the extent of £2,400, which was his original claim. But this was after several months of delay and a large expenditure; and he was compelled to bear his own expenses which amounted to upwards of £1,000. He thought this was a gross and manifest injustice, and the practical result was, that few persons would think of litigating a question where the expenses were likely to be more than the sum in dispute. This was a matter of great importance to the interests of justice. Lord Chancellors, Attorney-Generals, and Judges had all condemned the practice, which was so cumbrous and expensive, and which few persons really understood. The process was this:—if a person desired to obtain a Petition of Right he must begin by presenting his Petition to the Home Secretary, for the privilege of doing which he must pay a fee of about ten guineas, and which he never received back under any circumstances whatever. If that Petition was agreed to, it received the sign manual of the Queen and required to be countersigned by the Home Secretary, and by the Lord Chancellor. Then he was entitled to ask for a Commission, before which he might produce his evidence, and if he could satisfy the jury that his cause was just, then, but not till then, he was at liberty to commence his suit, and all the preliminary expenses were wasted. The result was that enormous costs were necessarily incurred, which few persons were willing to encounter. He thought it was unnecessary to state more to induce the House to agree to his Motion; and as he understood it was not to be opposed, he would not occupy their time longer than by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he would not only offer no opposition to the introduction of this measure, but would consider that the hon. and learned Member was doing a very useful service in bringing it forward. He understood that it was proposed to retain the existing system with regard to Petitions of Right, but to simplify and cheapen the mode of procedure; and if the measure accomplished that end, it should have his cordial support.

Leave given.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS.

COMMITTEE. RESOLUTION. BILL BROUGHT IN AND READ 1^o.

MR. DILLWYN moved that the House do go into Committee on Endowed Schools.

(In the Committee.)

MR. DILLWYN moved a Resolution that the Chairman be directed to move the House, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law respecting Endowed Schools. He did not intend on that occasion to make any statement as to the nature of the Bill, except that he had carefully considered the arguments of the Opposition last year, and had modified the Bill in a way which, he hoped, would render it more generally acceptable. If allowed to introduce the measure he did not intend to press the second reading for a month or six weeks,

FRIDAY ADJOURNMENTS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. BOUVERIE said, the Motion he was about to propose, if adopted, would have the effect of abolishing the custom of moving every Friday "that the House at its rising do adjourn till Monday next," Saturday being thus made, except in unusual cases, a dies non. As there were many Members who had not yet had practical experience in the forms of the House, he would take the liberty of explaining how it came about that, in order to avoid the inconvenience of sitting on a Saturday, an express Motion for an adjournment to Monday was necessary. The rules of the House did not admit of an Amendment to the ordinary Motion for adjournment, nor did they permit any day to be fixed for the next meeting on that Motion; it must necessarily be in the form "That this House do now adjourn." The Motion must be decided "Yes" or "No," and if it were carried, the House stood adjourned at once till the next sitting-day, of which Saturday was technically one. In the early period of our history, Saturday was a sitting-day the same as other week days, and the practice of adjourning from Friday to Monday did not arise, according to Mr. Speaker Onslow, till the time of Sir Robert Walpole, who, being a great hunter as well as a great statesman, was anxious, whenever it was possible, to get the House to adjourn over Saturday, in order to give him a day's hunting in each week. At first the proposal met with much opposition, but by degrees it grew into a regular practice, which had continued to the present day. So long as the Motion for adjournment was a mere formal matter, and so long as it was passed sub silentio, it was not worth while to make any special provision with regard to not sitting on Saturday. But a novel practice had grown up, within his recollection, which he thought had arrived at such a height as in the judgment of many Members amounted to almost an intolerable nuisance. The Motion for adjournment to Monday was made a handle to introduce discussion upon almost every conceivable subject which the imagination of any Member might deem worthy of submitting. If the custom had existed from time immemorial and acquired that halo of antiquity which was involved in a constitutional practice, he should perhaps treat it with respect, as no one less wished than he did to trench upon the privileges of Members of the House. But they must bear in mind that the practice he complained of was an entire novelty; that it had virtually grown up within the last ten years, and that it had gone on increasing until it had arisen to such a pitch, that he trusted the bulk of the House would lend him aid to put a stop to it. The objections were obvious and palpable. It was a most unbusiness-like proceeding. The amount of business which the House had to transact was enormous. No representative assembly ever had anything like the same amount. For the transaction of that business the time was limited. Yet once a week, practically one, two, or three hours were occupied in the discussion of questions upon which they could possibly arrive at no conclusion whatever. He maintained that the true function of that House, as the representative of the nation, was to transact the business of the nation, and to decide, after discussion and debate, the various important matters submitted to it. All financial and legislative, and a great many administrative, matters were submitted to them, upon all of which the practice was to come to a decision after discussion, and pronounce a deliverance; whereas the topics discussed on the Motion of adjournment were topics on which they could come to no decision. With regard to them they were merely a debating society, discussing things upon which they could pronounce no deliverance; and he thought it had a serious tendency to degrade the House in the eyes of the public, and to lower their character as a legislative assembly. Besides, it was most unfair to the Government—he did not mean the present Government, but those gentlemen who for the time being were intrusted with the conduct of the affairs of the country. The Executive Administration were necessarily charged with the greater part of the business of the House. By the constitution they had to initiate all measures of finance, and practically, if not by the constitution, all measures involving intricacy or details. They had the means of knowledge; they had the power of common counsel, which independent Members had not; and it was very well known that no measure of importance could be carried except by Her Majesty's Government. The House allowed the Government two out of five sitting days—Monday and Friday—and kept for themselves Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday. After thus giving up two-fifths only of the time, private Members by this novelty of speaking on the question of adjournment contrived to lessen even that amount, and then at the end of the Session the Government was taxed with the responsibility of not having passed measures which they had not had the means or time to carry. It was calling upon the Ministers of the day to make bricks without straw. It was not fair to the public, whose representative the Government were, and who expected the Government properly to carry on the business of the country. It was also not fair to those hon. Members who were content to take the chance of the ballot for precedence on Tuesdays and Thursdays, and who, having respect for the forms of the House, were unwilling to abuse those forms merely to deliver a speech, of which they were big, in a full House at five o'clock on a Friday. Here was a specimen of the extent to which the practice had grown. On April 8, 1859, the following were the Notices on the Motion for adjournment till Monday:—

“ Mr. Salisbury,—To call the attention of the House to remarks said to have been made by Mr. Baron Bramwell at Bala and other assize towns in the North Wales Circuit; and to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any explanation to offer to the House on the conduct of the learned Judge.

“ Captain Vivian,—To ask the Secretary of State for War a question relating to the appointment of Mr. Cunningham to an Ensigncy in the 13th regiment of Light Infantry.

“ Mr. Hopwood,—To ask the Secretary to the Treasury for an explanation of the recent dismissal of a gentleman who had been employed for two years and a half in the Emigration Office, and had subsequently passed a satisfactory examination before the Civil Service Commissioners.

“ Sir A. Agnew,—To put a question to the Secretary of State for India respecting the late disturbances in Travancore.

“ Mr. G. Clive,—To call the attention of the House to the recent appointment of magistrates for the city of Hereford; and to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what information, and at whose suggestion, such appointments were made; also, whether he will object to the production of any correspondence which may have taken place on the subject.”

[Hear! hear.] He heard hon. Members say “Hear, hear,” as if these were important questions to ask. He did not for a moment wish to convey that all these very miscellaneous matters were not such as might very properly be brought under the notice of the House; but he said they ought to be brought under its notice in a regular and proper manner. They might all be divided into two classes—Questions for information, or subjects on which the opinion of the House might be taken. Questions, that merely sought information, could be put on any evening without a speech. If they involved discussion, proper notice should be given, and the Motion made on a Tuesday or Thursday. He had not read half the list, and this was only for one day.

“ Viscount Castlerosse,—To ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that at the late trial at Tralee, of Daniel O'Sullivan, convicted of being a member of the Phoenix Society, the eleven Roman Catholic jurors (including a gentleman lately appointed a magistrate for the county) who were called and answered to their names, were directed to ‘stand by,’ by the Crown; and, if so, whether such a course was adopted with the approval of the Government.

“ Sir Erskine Perry,—To ask the Secretary of State for India what steps have been taken for removing the political establishment of the India-office to the neighbourhood of the other public offices of Government.

“ Mr. Kinnaid,—To ask the Chief Commissioner of Works whether the Government will have made up their minds by the meeting of the New Parliament (seeing that Berkeley-house is now pulled down) as to making a carriage road by the side of Berkeley-house, from Cookspurstreet and Charing-cross, into St. James's Park.

“ Mr. Monckton Milnes,—To ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in what mode, and to what extent, the Government intend to act upon the recommendations of the Consular Committee of last Session.

“ Viscount Palmerston,—To make some observations on the state of affairs on the Continent, and to ask Her Majesty's Government for information as to the position held by the British Government in the negotiations now going on.

“ Mr. Chichester Fortescue,—To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies when he will lay on the table the correspondence between the Colonial-office, the Hudson's Bay Company, and the Government of Canada.

“ Mr. Liddell,—To ask the Secretary of State for India whether in consequence of the appointment of Mr. Peacock to the Chief Justiceship of Bengal, it is the intention of the Government to recommend that the vacancy thereby created in the Council of Calcutta should be filled up by a person competent, from experience and skill, to superintend and remodel the finances of India.

“ Mr. Beamish,—To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether Sir Samuel Cunard having offered, through a deputation who waited on the Admiralty and Treasury Departments on Monday last, to convey the mails weekly between an Irish port and America for the sum of £500 the voyage out and home, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to persevere in completing a contract for £300 for this service (fortnightly) between Galway and America."

Many of these were perfectly proper questions to be put for the sake of information, but he repeated that they were not put on a proper occasion, or in a proper way. It was very hard upon the different Members of the Government, because they had very little notice of the Questions to be put, and were often prevented from replying by having already answered a previous Question. He had on more than one occasion seen it degenerate into a complete farce—one Member of the Government rising after another to give answers to Questions which were not within their province, prompted by other Members of the Government who were really cognizant of the matters in question, but who could not speak themselves, because they had already addressed the House on the Question before it of adjournment. As an instance of the extent to which the practice had increased he would refer to the Notices for to-morrow. There was no great amount of business on the paper to-morrow, but already hon. Members had given notice that they would make speeches on the Motion for adjournment. Mr. Monckton Milnes was going to ask the Government—

"What measures have been adopted with regard to the Address presented to Her Majesty on the 2nd of August, 1859, by this House, praying Her Majesty to enter into negotiations with the United States of America for the purpose of preventing the assaults and cruelties committed on merchant seamen in American vessels; and to call the attention of the House to some recent occurrences of that nature."

No doubt, the question was one which ought to be brought before the House, but why did the hon. Gentleman bring it forward on the Motion for Adjournment? Why did he not put his name down and take his chance of the ballot like others? No doubt, he was enceinte with a speech of which he wished to be delivered, but why did he choose an evening, and an occasion when his egg must be addled, unless it was that, the Question of Adjournment coming on early in the evening, he would be more likely to have a full House to listen to him? Then Mr. Darby Griffith was to ask the Government—

"Whether it is true, as stated in a French paper, that 30,000 French troops are expected at Leghorn, and whether the French Government has any intention of taking any such steps, for the purpose of preventing the annexation of the provinces of Central Italy to Sardinia, which their Constitutional representatives have voted as their final determination."

And Mr. Edwin James had given notice of his intention—

"To draw the attention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the case of Thomas Smethurst, convicted of the crime of murder on the 15th day of August last, and recently pardoned by Her Majesty; and to ask him whether the Government contemplate the introduction of any measure to give the right of appeal to persons convicted of capital and other crimes."

If hon. Gentlemen thought it was a legitimate thing that there should be such an opportunity as this for making a deliverance of such matter, let arrangements be made for the purpose, so as to get rid of the hardship imposed on those Members who, coming down to advance public business, were compelled to sit and listen for four or five hours to discussions on every variety of subject, which never led to any practical result. The worst of it was, that not merely were questions asked and answered, but every Member who had not already spoken on the Question of adjournment had a right to speak on any particular question; so that very often little debates were got up. He could not conceive what objection would be urged against his proposition. There were a certain number of Gentlemen who seemed to think it the principal function of a Member of Parliament to throw every obstacle in the way of public business; but he hoped that was not the opinion of the great majority. Some would say that it was advisable to have a safety-valve through which hon. Gentlemen could let off their steam; but if the valve were pretty nearly as big as the boiler, and no proper weight put on it, very little work indeed would be got out of the engine. Whether he succeeded in carrying his Motion or not, he had no doubt he should have the support of many Members on both sides, who were anxious to see a stop put to this modern abuse—which was most unfair not merely to the Government, but to the other independent Members, who did not condescend to avail themselves of it. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving,—

"That, whenever this House meets for business upon Friday, it shall at its rising adjourn to the following Monday, unless the House shall otherwise order."

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he could hardly think that his right hon.

Friend had fully considered the bearings of that question; and he hoped that his right hon. Friend, who had not himself been very nice in his language, would forgive him if he stated that his speech was somewhat tinged with official pedantry. His right hon. Friend, when he described the practice of speaking on the Motion for adjournment as an innovation, ought to have remembered that it had grown up solely in consequence of the abolition of the old constitutional custom of speaking on Petitions, a custom which was still adhered to by the other House of Parliament, and which, he believed, existed in every other legislative assembly in the world. After it had been thought right to suspend that power it was only natural that the practice should have grown up of taking advantage of the Motion for the Friday adjournment in order to bring forward incidental matters which could not otherwise be submitted to the consideration of the House. The House was an excellent guardian of its own order, and he could remember but very few instances in which the privilege had been abused; and it appeared to him that the practice carried with it great and palpable advantages. It enabled hon. Members to bring subjects under the notice of the House at the right moment; whereas if the usual form of giving notice of a Motion were adopted, many questions which called for immediate consideration could not be submitted to the attention of the House until the lapse of perhaps two or three months, when no advantage could any longer arise from their discussion. His right hon. Friend had asked why he (Mr. Milnes) had not given notice of his Motion, and stood his chance of the ballot for the day on which it was to be brought forward; and his answer was that he had not done so because the subject with which he had to deal was one of pressing importance and would not bear delay. That was, he thought, a sufficient reason why he should take the earliest possible opportunity of bringing it under the consideration of the House. He believed that those incidental discussions seldom or never occupied more than two or three hours, a period of time which noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Treasury bench and on the front Opposition bench did not scruple to spend in the delivery of a single speech. Now, if Ministers and ex-Ministers would be a little more concise in their addresses, and a little more relevant in the matter of those addresses, he believed the business of that

House would be conducted very successfully, and there would be no necessity for interfering with the privileges of the few independent Members who took any active part in their discussions. He was sure that if the House were to give its sanction to that Motion one of these two consequences would follow—either the public would feel great discontent at finding that hon. Members could not bring forward incidentally important questions, or else Motions for the adjournment of the House would be made, not only on the Fridays, but on the other evenings on which they sat, for the purpose of justifying the introduction of such topics. His right hon. Friend said that hon. Members ought either to put a direct question, or else to raise a debate on any matter in which the public felt interested; but he (Mr. Milnes) said that there were a great number of occasions on which it was not desirable to pursue either the one or the other of those courses, and on which Members wished to preface their Questions with some explanations, although they did not think it advisable that they should conclude their observations with any formal Motion. If it were really desired to save time, let the right hon. Gentleman direct his attention to the Motions on going into Committee of Supply, which really were inconvenient when the Government were pressed for time to carry on public business. He trusted that the House would not consent thus to restrict the right of interpellation possessed by every Member of Parliament.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, that if the right hon. Gentleman had not mentioned his name, he should not have ventured, being so young a Member of the House, to have addressed them on this subject. But as the right hon. Gentleman had alluded to him by name, and as he had not been very strict in his language, but had made use of some rather hard terms, such as "abuse" and "fraud," and as, moreover, he had indulged in a variety of metaphors, he (Mr. Edwin James) thought it right to offer a few remarks. Firstly, he thought the reproach of indulging in flights of imagination came very oddly from the right hon. Gentleman who had himself talked in a most effervescing style, and had dressed out his speech with all sorts of rhetorical metaphors, flying from obstetrical to engineering in the most fanciful way. His Motion having reference to the case of Smethurst was one which deserved consideration; but he had not given notice of it with any idea, as was supposed by the right hon. Gentleman, of bringing it forward in a full House. It was one of those Motions in which, though they did not entail any express decision, the public, the Bar, and, he would add, the criminal jurisprudence of the country, were deeply interested. These would all rest satisfied with the inquiry and discussion which the subject would receive when brought forward upon the Question of Adjournment; and it consequently seemed to him a very proper time for bringing it under the notice of the House. Much inconvenience would arise if every Member, when putting a Question, was compelled to move an Adjournment. He therefore hoped the House would negative this Motion; and he felt sure that the good sense, discretion, and right feeling of the Members, with the desire which they all felt to conduct their sittings with decorum and propriety, would operate as a sufficient safeguard, without the dictation involved in the proposition of the right hon. Member.

MR. DEEDES said, if the right hon. Gentleman pressed this Motion to a division, he should certainly vote with him. He had no wish to repress freedom of speech on the part of any Member, upon whatever subject he might think fit and proper to take up—such a course would be the very last that he would think of; but an improvement might, in his opinion, be effected if the House were to make such arrangements as would admit of those topics being brought forward in a regular manner, and not at a time when they interrupted the business which was intended to be transacted. The only argument which he had heard from the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Monckton Milnes) was that which related to the pressing nature of some of the Motions; but looking to the custom which now prevailed, he thought the difficulties attending it were much greater than would be involved in any alteration. He desired to see the practice amended in the way which was pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman; and if in due course of time it could be shown that any real inconvenience had thereby arisen, the system now existing might be revived, but with some restrictions, which would enable their discussions to be conducted in a more satisfactory manner. He had no wish to use any word which might be considered objectionable, but he had heard it said hundreds of times that the mode in which Questions were brought forward on the Motion of Adjournment amounted to an abuse of the privilege.

Mr. Edwin James

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, that while it was his intention to oppose the Motion, in case it went to a division, he thought his right hon. Friend appeared to have been rather hardly dealt with by two of the Gentlemen who had spoken; for there was nothing in his observations calculated to give offence—and he had certainly not intended to do so. At the same time the right hon. Gentleman seemed to him very much to under-estimate the exertions of independent Members, when he broadly stated that nine-tenths of the business of the House was transacted by gentlemen holding official situations. His own experience might not be as great, but he believed that if the legislation of recent years was dispassionately considered, it would be found that a vast number of useful and valuable measures had emanated from those Members, whose independent action he should be sorry to give any vote to limit or restrict. From the historical sketch which had been given by the right hon. Gentleman, he had fancied that he was about to make a proposal for restoring to them the Saturday of which they had been deprived. But that proposal had not been made; and he wished to point out a consequence which must ensue from this Motion if carried, which was that it would be impossible to continue the practice which of late years had so much tended to the advancement of public business, that of relinquishing Thursdays to the Government towards the close of the Session. Maintaining the metaphor which had been already employed, the House might depend upon it that if the use of the safety valve were abridged the steam would burst up somewhere, and much more frequent recurrence would therefore be made to a practice which he looked on as tenfold more objectionable than the one to which their attention had now been called. He alluded to the custom which the Speaker had endeavoured to check, but which it had not been in his power altogether to abolish, by which, when a Member was otherwise unable to make some observations, which he was desirous of offering, he got some friend to move the adjournment of the House. Friday particularly suggested itself as an occasion suitable for asking questions on matters of importance, as the House was then about to suspend its sittings for two days; and on that very account some latitude ought to be given. On these grounds—for he would not delay the House by stating others—he should strongly urge his right hon. Friend not to press the Motion to a division.

MR. WALTER said, he would take the liberty of adding a few words to the arguments which had been already urged in opposition to the Motion of his right hon. Friend; and he earnestly entreated him not to press this question to a division, as in that event he, for one, should feel it right to vote against it. He believed that he had occupied a seat in that House for about the same number of years as his right hon. Friend, and, like him, he had witnessed the gradual growth of this custom, which, however, had left upon his mind an impression exactly opposite to that which it appeared to have produced on his right hon. Friend. And when he spoke of this as a novel custom, adding that if it were old and venerable he might be induced to treat it with greater leniency, this view apparently led to a conclusion exactly opposed to what his right hon. Friend intended; for he apprehended that this practice had grown up simply from a sense which existed in the minds of hon. Members of its necessity and convenience. Several customs existed in that House which theoretically, perhaps, were not capable of being defended, but which were yet felt to be matters of great practical convenience. The debate on Wednesday had often proved most useful in putting an end to disagreeable and inconvenient questions which could not else be disposed of; and similarly, that on Friday evening gave opportunities for clearing off old scores and getting rid of all the Parliamentary gossip of the week. He believed that the liberty of speech on that particular evening had a very salutary effect in shortening discussions, which would otherwise extend over a great portion of the ensuing week.

MR. DISRAELI:—Sir, my experience in this House has taught me that in the conduct of business we must trust more to the good sense of the Members themselves than to any of our rules and regulations; though no one can for a moment deny the efficiency of those rules, to a certain extent, and the necessity of maintaining those regulations by which our general order is established. I have on more than one occasion opposed Motions similar to that now brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman, but I must say that in the exercise of the privilege to which his Motion refers I have occasionally observed practices of which I cannot approve, and which I must say I have sometimes very much deplored. I remember an instance, I think in the course of last Session, where the clock had reached the hour of ten before the business of the evening commenced. But although that is what I believe may be called, without offence to any one, an abuse of the privilege, I am disposed still to trust to the good sense and to that quality called tact, rather than to a Resolution such as is proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. At the same time I do think that if we retain this custom there ought to be a general, and I would say an honourable understanding on both sides of the House that Questions should not be brought forward on these Motions of Adjournment, unless they are of a pressing and general interest. I certainly think that such an understanding was not observed on either side during the last, or, indeed, during the last two or three Sessions; but, if hereafter it should be arrived at, I feel persuaded that the exercise of the privilege, which, under certain circumstances, might be a very great advantage indeed, need not be viewed in the manner in which it has to-night been represented. The House has lost the privilege which it possessed of speaking upon the presentation of Petitions; and the opportunities of debate have, as regards independent Members, been curtailed by other means. I should therefore hesitate very much before consenting to a proposal such as is involved in the present Motion; but I admit that if, after the experience of next Session, we cannot come to that practical understanding which I have already intimated, I shall consider myself perfectly free from any engagement which I had previously taken, and if any hon. Member should then propose a Motion similar to that which is now under consideration, I should perhaps view it in a different spirit from that which I do at present.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he quite concurred that this was a question to be determined by the circumstances of the time, and that on observation of the manner in which the rules of the House worked from Session to Session a Member might change his opinion without inconsistency. The question was one to be decided according to the general sense of convenience and the prevailing view of the Members of the House. He thought it a mistake to suppose that there was any conflict of interest, or any wish on the part of the members of the Government for the time being to interfere with the rights of private Members of the House. The only question is, what is the most convenient mode of disposing of the business of the House. Judging from his own feelings — and he might appeal to the feelings of hon. Gentlemen opposite when in office — nothing could be less agreeable to members of the Government than to increase the number of nights devoted to Government business. On those nights the principal labour of official Members was discharged ; and those hon. Members were quite in error who supposed that there could be any wish on the part of the Government to increase the time necessarily devoted to the Government business. If ever they wished that increase, it could only be from a sense of public duty, and not for their own personal gratification. Before he sat down he wished to call attention to the way in which their present rules with regard to Government business operated in the interval between the commencement of the Session and Easter. Two nights of the week were devoted to Government business — Mondays and Fridays. The other three nights were entirely devoted to questions brought forward by independent members — Tuesdays and Thursdays to Notices, and Wednesdays to Orders of the Day. On those days no Government Notice or Order was allowed to have precedence ; they must be put at the bottom of the paper, if they were brought forward. But on every night of the week Questions were put by independent Members ; and every one who had been long in the House knew that the number and importance of the Questions put at half-past four had very much increased ; and the time devoted to those subjects had increased accordingly. Every night, therefore, independent Members had the power of putting Questions, and the whole of Tuesdays, Wednesdays, and Thursdays was given up to them. Before Easter, on Mondays and Fridays it generally happened that there were Committees of Supply. On the Motion for going into those Committees, independent Members had the liberty of making two, three, or four Motions, if no division was taken ; so that Members who came down to take part in the discussions on Supply, found that the House did not go into Committee until seven, eight, or nine o'clock. In addition to that diminution of the time given to Government business, there were the discussions raised on Friday night on the

Sir George Lewis

Question of Adjournment. Taking away Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays, the portion of each night occupied by Questions, that occupied by Motions on going into Committee of Supply, and the portion of Friday devoted to discussions on the Motion for Adjournment, there was a considerable subtraction from the number of hours allotted to the public business in the beginning of the Session. It was customary for the Government to bring in Bills for the consideration of the House at the beginning of the Session ; they might lie on the table ; but it was almost impossible for any Government Bill, if opposed, to receive any consideration before Easter. The only nights devoted to the Government business were occupied by Committees of Supply ; and on the other three days they had no opportunity of being heard. The consequence was that a large number of Government Bills were postponed to a late period of the Session. Everybody knew, when the morning sittings commenced in June, how great was the pressure on the time and exertions of Members, as a great portion of the latter part of the Session was occupied with pressing business ; and, after all, many Bills had to be postponed ; much altercation arose as to their postponement, and the order in which they should be brought on ; and, altogether, considerable confusion arose in the latter part of the Session. That was very much owing to the regulations for the conduct of their business in the part of the Session before Easter. He was far from desiring to curtail the time that might be fairly allotted to discussions raised by independent Members. That time was most valuable. It was necessary to the proper working of the House of Commons that there should be a free expression of the voice of the people on subjects on which perhaps no direct Motion could be made. The subjects brought forward on the Motion for Adjournment were chiefly Questions addressed to Government by Members who wished to accompany those Questions with some remarks ; they were not generally in the nature of Motions or proposals. And when the noble Lord (Lord C. Hamilton) said that those discussions facilitated the measures proposed by independent Members, he misrepresented the nature of those discussions. No measure proposed by an independent Member could ever then be brought forward ; therefore it was impossible that those Motions could facilitate such Bills. If he were to make a suggestion, he would rather ask the House to consider whether it might not be possible that on a portion at least of the Thursdays before Easter, precedence might be given to Orders over Notices ; or at any rate to allow some portion of those days to be occasionally devoted to the discussion of Bills. It was also worth consideration whether some limit might not be fixed with regard to the hour of the night at which Motions might be made on going into Committee of Supply, for it was an admitted inconvenience for Members to come down, seeing "Supply" in the paper, and expecting discussions on the Estimates, and to find the House occupied in discussing colonial or Indian questions, or some other matters wholly foreign to the question of Supply. He did not think that any good would result from pressing this Motion ; but some improvement might be made in the distribution of their time before Easter, so as to give more time to the consideration of Government measures. He would also suggest that when a Motion had been brought forward by a Member of the Government, the House had as much possession of this Motion, and as full power of discussing it, as any Motion made by an individual Member. The Government had no control over the subject of discussion when once it was submitted to the consideration of the House. The only question was, whether it was desirable that a greater portion of time should be allotted to the subjects proposed by independent Members, or to those proposed by Government.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON wished to add his voice to those who recommended the withdrawal of the Motion. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman had made it rather impossible for him to support his Motion by one of the arguments he had advanced in its favour. The right hon. Gentleman had cited him (Viscount Palmerston) as an instance of those who had taken advantage of this practice of raising discussions on the Friday Motions for Adjournment. He therefore could not, sitting on that side of the House, endeavour, without great inconsistency, to curtail the liberty which he had taken on the other side. There were occasions on which it might be a great public advantage for Members to have the opportunity, on the Adjournment of the House on Friday, to ask a question accompanied by a detailed statement, which the regulations of the House forbade on another day, and also for the Members of the Government who were interrogated, to have the opportunity of stating at greater length the circumstances of the case referred to. He however hoped that what had been stated in the course of the debate would induce hon. Members to exercise some discretion and forbearance in introducing subjects on a Friday, if the practice were to continue, and that some good would result from this discussion.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he was not of so hopeful a temperament as the noble Lord. If he thought that the result of this discussion would be to deter Members from abusing this privilege, he should be content. But the truth was, it was but a very small portion of the Members—if they were to be counted, a very small fraction—who resorted to this practice, for the majority condemned it. ["No, no."] He believed that those who said "no, no," were of the minority he referred to, and he thought that some regulation of the practice was due to the majority who were now at the mercy of the minority, which would abuse the present rule as long as it existed. He wished to remove the temptation afforded to those Members. When the noble Lord the leader of the House could not resist the temptation, when offered, of making a long speech, no wonder that others fell into the same course.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE was sorry to hear that his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock was about to press his Motion to a division. He admitted there was a great deal of truth in many of the observations of his right hon. Friend ; but he could not vote with him. He should prefer leaving the question on the footing on which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire had placed it. He thought his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock might have introduced the subject in a more cautious manner. It was not usual to single out Gentlemen by name as he had done. A middle course, might, perhaps, be adopted—either the discussions on the adjournment of the House from Friday till Monday should be confined to the business and proceedings of the House, or else the Motion for the adjournment from Friday till Monday should take place after the Orders of the Day, making those Orders terminate at a certain hour. This would give ample time if there was any pressing occasion for discussion. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State appeared to be of opinion that hon. Members should rather give up their privilege of bringing forward Motions on Questions of Supply, and exercise their right of discussion on the Adjournment as much as they pleased. Now, he decidedly protested against that. Motions on Supply were, according to a sound constitutional maxim, the most legitimate means of asserting the rights and making known the grievances of the people of this country, which ought always to be attended to before any money was voted away. He therefore hoped the House would never agree that their powers with regard to Questions of Supply should be crippled or restricted. He hoped if his right hon. Friend pressed the matter to a division he would be defeated. The good sense of the House, he was quite certain, would correct the evils which had been pointed out.

“That in all cases where the Seat of any Member has been declared void by an Election Committee on the ground of bribery, no Motion for the issuing of a New Writ shall be made without two days' previous notice having been given in the Votes.”

COLONEL FRENCH said, he would suggest that the present Motion and one which stood lower on the paper in the name of the right hon. Secretary of State for the Home Department, and required seven days' notice to be given before writs were moved for certain corrupt boroughs, should be combined together, and that seven days' notice should be necessary in all cases of that kind.

GLOUCESTER CITY AND WAKEFIELD WRITS.—RESOLUTION.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he rose to move—

“That no Motion for the issuing of any New Writ for the City of Gloucester or the Borough of Wakefield be made without seven days' previous notice thereof being given in the Votes.”

It would be in the recollection of the House that Committees were appointed last Session to inquire into the Returns for the City of Gloucester and for the borough of Wakefield, and that those Committees had reported the extensive prevalence of corruption in both of those constituencies. In consequence of this an address was adopted to the Crown to inquire into the matters attending the elections in these two boroughs. The Commission in the case of Gloucester had made their report to the effect that corruption had existed extensively during the last two elections in that city. That report was on the table of the House, and would be in the hands of hon. Members in the course of a few days. It was unnecessary for him to detain the House with the details of these circumstances ; but hon. Gentlemen would see when the report was presented that such was the case. With respect to the borough of Wakefield, the report was not yet presented to the Crown, and consequently he did not know what was the result arrived at by the Commissioners ; but he had been informed by the Secretary of the Commission that the report would be ready in a few days, and it would then be laid on the table of the House. As to Wakefield, there was a Committee of last Session which reported the existence of corrupt practices in that borough, and a Commission was issued in consequence. Under these circumstances the House would not think that he adopted an unusual or objectionable course in requesting them to resolve that no writ for a new member to represent the constituencies of Gloucester or Wakefield should issue without a previous notice of seven days being given in the Votes.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to know from the right hon. Gentleman, the Home Secretary, what was the position in which the delinquents at Wakefield and Gloucester stood ; whether the bribers and bribees were amenable to the law, or whether any pledge had been given to them that on making full disclosures they should be indemnified against any prosecution for the offences they had committed. If legal punishment was not to be visited on the heads of those who had been guilty of such flagrant acts of corruption, the appointment of these Commissions was a perfect farce, and only defeated the ends of justice.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: I have already stated that the report of the Wakefield Election Commission has not been presented. With regard to the City of Gloucester, I can only say, as far as Her Majesty's Government are concerned, that they have made no promise whatever—nor has the Attorney General or any other law officer of the Crown made any promise—to any of the witnesses who gave evidence before the Commissioners. Without referring to the report, which is not now before me, I should be unwilling to answer the question of my hon. Friend as to what may have been done by the Commissioners themselves under the powers in the Act of Parliament. If, however, he will repeat his question to-morrow or Monday I will give him precise information as to any steps that may have been taken by the Commissioners.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, that when the Gloucester Commission was appointed, the objection was urged that no result would be attained by its issue ; and, although no understanding was come to or pledge given by the Government that action should be taken upon the report of the Commissioners being presented, there was certainly a feeling among hon. Members that, after the expense attending such an inquiry had been incurred, something should be done to prevent their being nugatory. Commissions had been issued for Galway, Hull, Cambridge, and numerous other places, the records of which slumbered on the shelves of the library as monuments of the impotence of Parliament to deal with the evils they disclosed. The matter ought to receive the serious consideration of the Government, and the law officers of the Crown should have their attention immediately directed to the propriety of commencing proceedings against the delinquents. If that were not done, these investigations would become the laughing-stock of the public. The practice was to give both the bribers and the bribed certificates of indemnification, and it was even doubtful whether the granting of those certificates would not preclude the raising of any question of disfranchisement.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he hoped the right hon. Baronet would do his best to expedite the production of the Report of the Wakefield Commission. It was important that the House should be in possession, at an early period, of the Reports of the Commissioners appointed in the Gloucester and Wakefield cases. With respect to what had just fallen from his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Marylebone (Mr. E. James), he should merely observe that the law officers of the Crown would, he feared, find it extremely difficult to prosecute and attempt to bring about, with any hope of success, the punishment of those persons who had been discovered by the Commissioners to have violated the law, owing to the fact that immunity had been not only offered but promised to those who had so offended. He at the same time hoped that when the Report of the Commissioners was laid before the House, some means would be devised without violating pledges, to visit with the severity which they merited practices such as those which the inquiry before the Commissioners had brought to light.

MR. BRIGHT: If I rightly understand the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just spoken, he thinks the case under our notice is not one in which the Law Officers of the Crown, or even Parliament, can proceed with a view to the punishment of those electors who have been shown to have received bribes before the Commissioners. The point, I may add, is one which seems to me to have been settled some time ago in the case of the electors of Hull, or some other borough, when the House of Commons came—and came very properly, in my opinion—to the conclusion, that after a certificate had been given to certain persons who had been bribed, exempting them from all penal consequences to which they might be liable in consequence of any disclosures which they might make, it would not be strictly just to inflict upon them the punishment of disfranchisement. I therefore am prepared to admit that neither the Government nor the House is in a position to deal with the offences which have been committed at Wakefield and Gloucester by visiting with penalties the voters who have given evidence before the Commissioners in those boroughs. I at the same time feel that we shall still less find ourselves able to disfranchise two towns which possess populations so large and an influence so considerable. There is, however, another course which it appears to me may fairly be pursued both as regards the individuals and the representative rights of even two such large constituencies, and the adoption of which I would recommend to the notice of the Government. That course is, that the constitutional right of the boroughs in question to send representatives to Parliament should be suspended for a lengthened period, so as to mark the condemnation of the Legislature of the practices which have recently been brought to light. Such a step would, I feel assured, meet with the sanction of the country at large. So far as Wakefield is concerned, I happen to possess—for two reasons, which will immediately suggest themselves to the House, the one being that I am connected with the gentleman who was the unfortunate candidate for that borough at the late election, and the other, that I happen to reside in its immediate neighbourhood—an intimate acquaintance with the result of the recent investigation into the existence there of bribery and corruption. That result is, that out of 800 electors 100 appear to have accepted bribes, and I confess it is to me a subject of astonishment that only so small a number should have been guilty of this offence, when I bear in mind, that a single voter could not show his face in the streets of Wakefield without having a bribe offered to him at almost every hour of the day as well as of the night. While, therefore, we are shocked at the corruption of 100 electors, we must not shut our eyes to the fact that 700 others, to the great majority of whom £30 or £40 was a matter of some consequence, resisted the temptations which lay in their path. Now, in speaking thus, I may appear to be about to argue that it would not be fair to disfranchise a borough in which, out of 800 electors, there are 700 who are innocent of the offence of receiving bribes. The fact is, however, that these 700 voters are not so free from blame as may seem to be the case. I lay down this proposition, because no corruption can, in my opinion, take place such as that which has been proved to have existed in Wakefield and Gloucester without the leading men belonging to both political parties—~~men belonging to both political parties~~—being cognizant of, and ~~connected with those transactions.~~ with those transactions.

In the borough in which I happen to reside, an election took place in the year 1835, or 1837, I think it was, and upon that occasion—hon. Gentlemen opposite may perhaps suppose that I am not speaking impartially in saying so—there was a very profuse expenditure of money on the part of the Conservative candidate, while upon our side, on the days of polling and nomination, there was a good deal which I could not deem right, not exactly in giving bribes but in keeping open the public-houses in the town. Fortunately for us, however, our candidate was defeated, and after the election was over a meeting was held at which a considerable number of the influential members of the Liberal party in the borough were present, and we there pledged ourselves to a resolution, under no circumstances whatever, to take part in an election, or to invite any gentlemen to come into the town for the purpose of being a candidate at an election, which was to be conducted upon any other principles than those which were strictly legal and moral. I recollect myself having said at that meeting, “You may bring forward any candidate you like, but I for one will never go across the street again to assist any man unless an agreement is entered into that not one shilling will be laid out in the contest the expenditure of which will not bear the test of being scrutinized by Parliament and the country.” The result was most satisfactory, and I am strongly of opinion that if a dozen, or even half-a-dozen, of the leading men belonging to either political party would come forward in Wakefield or Gloucester, or any other borough, and adopt a similar resolution, the corruption of which we complain would soon cease to exist. The fact is, however, that, instead of taking this course, everybody at Wakefield and Gloucester seems to have winked at what was taking place. I should be glad, therefore, if those influential persons who cannot be held to be totally blameless in the matter should be made to feel that the country regards their conduct with something like horror, for nothing can be more prejudicial to us as a nation than that transactions such as those which we are discussing should continue to prevail. Parliament, then, in order to mark its sense of the enormity of such proceedings, would, in my opinion, act wisely if it were to deprive those boroughs for a considerable time—say for some period not exceeding ten years—of their right to return Members to this House. I would have them, in short, debarred from the exercise of that privilege for a period so long that the whole country might be able to point to them as black spots—not, perhaps, spots in reality one bit blacker than others, but more unfortunate in this respect, that their blackness had been found out. I am not one of those, whatever may be my feelings with regard to individuals or to particular constituencies, who can for one moment countenance such disgraceful proceedings as those to which I am adverting. They are a disgrace to this House as well as to the nation at large, and I trust the right hon. Gentleman, the Secretary for the Home Department, may take into his serious consideration the suggestions which I have thrown out, with a view to putting an end to this system of corruption at elections as far as possible. He cannot, as I said before, punish particular individuals, or completely disfranchise entire constituencies, but then he may, by taking the course which I have indicated, do all the good that can be done until this House has passed into a law the only measure that can be really effectual in such cases—I mean a measure bestowing the right to vote by ballot.

MR. CLAY said, that with regard to the observations which had fallen from the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), it had never been proposed to disfranchise the electors of Hull. A Bill of the nature referred to had indeed been brought in with regard to the town of Galway. He must decline to express an opinion as to the legal construction of that portion of the Act relating to bribery which granted an indemnity to those persons guilty of that offence who happen to give evidence before a Commission, but he contended that the Act in no way deprived Parliament of the right to disfranchise, if it should deem fit to do so, any portion or the whole of the electors of a borough in which extensive corruption had been proved to have taken place. He concurred with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bright), in the expediency of suspending the right of exercising the franchise for a time in such cases. That right had for a considerable period been suspended, in the borough in which he had the honour to represent, for as long a period indeed as a year and a half. He had the satisfaction, however, of being in a position to state that anything like direct bribery was now unknown in that borough, and that the expenses of a contest for it were not one-sixth of the sum to which they used formerly to amount.

MR. MELLOR said, he would express a hope that the Government in dealing with the cases of Wakefield and Gloucester would feel themselves completely unembarrassed by any consideration leading to the supposition that the Commissioners had the power to enter into a pledge that Parliament should not disfranchise, either as a whole or in classes, the electors of those constituencies in which the existence of corruption on a large scale had been brought to light. The object of a Commission would be a farce if it were not issued for that very purpose. The certificate they had the power to give only protected those who gave evidence from the pains and penalties attached to bribery.

MR. MALINS said, that he was one of those who protested against the issuing of these Election Commissions. A great deal of expense was incurred without leading to any practical result. If it were really intended to take any effective measures for putting down bribery, what a ridiculous thing it was to send three Commissioners to Gloucester and three to Wakefield, for the mere purpose of preparing another blue-book, upon the production of which no proceedings were to be taken. He confessed he could not understand the object of the Home Secretary in moving that the writ be suspended for seven days. If, indeed, the right hon. Gentleman had proposed the suspension of these writs until he and his colleagues had read the reports of the Commissioners, and considered what measures they should adopt in consequence of them, his course would have been intelligible; but the present Resolution was without meaning. If it were true, as the hon. Member for Birmingham said, that only 100 voters at Wakefield, of which he seemed to know a great deal, out of 800 were bribed, he would ask where was the justice of punishing 700 innocent men for the misconduct of 100, who perhaps from their poverty were more exposed to temptation than the others? Unless the Government were prepared to bring in a measure that would effectually detect and punish the bribers, he repeated it was most absurd to have issued those Commissions. He would ask the Government if, in the forthcoming Reform Bill, or by any other means, whether they really intended to go to the root of the evil? If the leaders of a party, as was suggested, had been guilty of sanctioning the practice of bribery, let them be visited with the proper meed of punishment. He should certainly rejoice

if he lived to see the day when the abominable practice of bribery was effectually put down. This he was satisfied of, that the nostrum of the hon. Member for Birmingham would never put it down. The ballot would never have the effect of extinguishing this evil. He trusted therefore the House would make up their minds to a measure that would have some practical result.

MR. BRIGHT said, he wished to state in explanation that the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Clay), was under a mistake in saying that he (Mr. Bright) was in error in what he said as to the course taken by former Governments in relation to bribery. He found by reference to Hansard that in 1854 the Attorney General of that day moved for leave to bring in a Bill directed against Canterbury, Barnstaple, Hull, and Marlborough. The House, however, did not feel disposed to concur in the objects of that measure.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he wished to remind the House that it was only by moral evidence of the most doubtful and delicate character that they could arrive at a suspicion of who were the bribers at an election. In the recent cases he did not think that more than a glance of suspicion had fallen upon the leaders of parties. Some slight suspicion had attached to the right hon. Member for Wells (Sir W. Hayter), but all who knew the character of that right hon. Gentleman must be persuaded that that suspicion was entirely without foundation. But if the House were to proceed to inflict punishment upon persons taking bribes they would have to proceed in the ordinary courts of law, and he believed it would be impossible to get any jury to convict upon such evidence as could be produced. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Malins), talked about going to the root of the matter—but it appeared to him that the root of the matter was not the guilt of either briber or bribee. It lay in the fact that the franchise had been extended to people who were so poor that they were liable to be bribed. The elective privilege was enjoyed by a great number of persons who had no proper sense of its value, and, therefore, sold it for the highest price they could get. Some people seemed to think that if they could prevent the passage of a bribe from the hands of the canvasser to those of the voter all would be accomplished that could be desired; but supposing that a man was willing to take a bribe if he could get it, would the prevention of its receipt make him a patriotic, intelligent and enlightened citizen, fit to elect Members of Parliament? Nothing of the kind. The recent inquiries had thrown considerable light upon the ballot. He was one of the Members who sat on the Election Committee with respect to Gloucester, and it was proved before them that in almost every case the bribe was given to the elector before he voted, and in some instances the recipient voted contrary to his promise—a clear proof that for the suppression of bribery the ballot would be an entirely inefficacious nostrum. For himself, he regarded this matter with despair. Bribery was the result of legislative steps which could not be retracted, and they must make up their minds to the existence of an evil which no human forethought could remove.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he trusted that the statements just expressed by the noble Lord would have no weight in that House when the Reform Bill was introduced. He would remind the noble Lord, however, that every voter must occupy a £10 house, and that therefore electors could not be persons in very inferior circumstances. He believed that there were cases in which persons in what were called respectable positions had been bribed.

MR. COLLINS said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would consider the remarks of the hon. Member for Birmingham with reference to the suspension of these writs. At Wakefield, which he knew well, the electors, especially the poorer classes, were now ardently longing for a new election; and should such an event occur without the introduction of new blood, which would result from the suspension of the writ for five or ten years, he believed that corruption would prevail there to as great an extent as it did at the late contest, and the longest purse would carry the day. He would suggest that in future the expenses of an election petition should fall, not upon the petitioner, who was almost invariably the rejected candidate, but upon the borough or upon the country at large. If upon the borough, the electors who had accepted bribes would come to be regarded as nuisances by their fellow townsmen, and bribery would soon cease to be practised. Meanwhile he hoped the recommendation of the hon. Member for Birmingham, in the cases of Gloucester and Wakefield, might be adopted, and the writs suspended at least till the end of the Session.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS :—I hold in my hand a printed copy of the report of the Gloucester Commissioners, and I trust that printed copies of the same document will be distributed to hon. Members within a few days. Inasmuch, however, as the report in a printed form has not yet been circulated, I intentionally abstain from making any allusion to its contents, thinking that any discussion upon it should be postponed until the House has been put in possession of the entire Report, and has had an opportunity of perusing it with the attention which it deserves. I confine myself, therefore, within the bounds of the limited Motion which I have made—namely, to suspend the writs for Gloucester and Wakefield until a notice of seven days has been given. It is not desirable to go into any questions as to what the House might be disposed to do with respect either to Gloucester or to Wakefield. The Report on the latter borough has not yet been presented to Her Majesty. I may state, however, that I had been informed by the Commissioners that their Report would be ready before the meeting of Parliament. It has not yet been received, but I presume it is in a state of forwardness. As the House as thought fit to go into a discussion upon the general question of bribery and of the Corrupt Practices Act, I may say that the Report of the Gloucester Commissioners condemns in very strong terms, and with a statement of very forcible reasons, the provisions of that Act. The Commissioners find that its main provisions—those respecting an election auditor and the return of expenses by candidates—are altogether nugatory and inoperative. I do not wish to discuss that subject at present. Two hon. and learned Members have already announced their intention to bring before the House measures for the amendment of the Corrupt Practices Act and dealing generally with the law respecting bribery at elections. I may state that the Government has under consideration a measure on that subject. We are preparing, and hope to be able to introduce a Bill for materially altering the Corrupt Practices Act, and also, if possible, for amending the procedure for the trial of election petitions. However, I do not desire to interfere with the discussion of measures that may be proposed by private Members. I merely wish to show that the Government has not overlooked the important questions which have been and will be raised by the Gloucester and Wakefield Reports.

CONSOLIDATED FUND.—SAVINGS-BANKS COMMITTEE.

RESOLUTION.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed,—

(Queen's Consent signified.)

MR. HANKEY said, he wished, before the right hon. Gentleman left the Chair, to know whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended to ask the Committee to pass his Resolution that evening, and if so, whether he did not think it would be expedient to make a preliminary statement before going into Committee? His own opinion was that the passing of the Resolution, which affected very important interests, should be postponed till a future day, inasmuch as hon. Members had an opportunity of seeing the terms of it only that morning. The propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer might be right, or they might be wrong, but he wanted time to consider them maturely.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hoped the hon. Member would allow him to pursue what was the invariable practice upon such occasions—namely, to withhold his statement until the House had gone into Committee, when hon. Members would have the power of speaking as often as they pleased, and thus obtaining the fullest information on the subject before them.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he should be glad to hear an explanation from the right hon. Gentleman before they proceeded further. He had not stated whether or not he intended to ask the Committee to pass his Resolution. It appeared to him that the House was placed in an extremely difficult situation as regarded the important principles involved in the Resolution of which the right hon. Gentleman had given notice. That Resolution was at once important and intricate, for it involved the whole question of Savings Banks. The House, however, had no information before it upon which the Resolution appeared to be founded. Hon. Members had not had an opportunity of seeing its terms until that day; they had been unable to take the opinion of competent authorities upon it, and yet they were called upon at once to go into Committtee on the Consolidated Fund, in order to afford the right hon. Gentleman the opportunity of moving his Resolutions. It was true that even if he passed his Resolution he must bring in a Bill upon the subject: but what was the meaning of being compelled to proceed by Resolution unless the House was to have some safeguard in regard to making those financial changes. By passing the Resolution they would bind themselves to the declaration that it was expedient to deal at once with £36,000,000 of money, and to give power to the Commissioners of the Treasury to cancel and create stock as they pleased. They should recollect that they were about to deal seriously with the principles laid down by the 9th George IV., and to set some of them altogether aside. He thought therefore, the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to give a clear explanation of his intentions on this subject. A similar Resolution was proposed in 1854. It was passed, and a Bill founded upon it was introduced. What was the fate of that measure? It was repudiated by the directors of almost every bank in the country, who prayed the House not to legislate without a preliminary inquiry, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer was eventually compelled to abandon his Bill. A Committee of that House had taken a great body of evidence on the subject, and had reported a number of Resolutions, but among those Resolutions he found none like the Resolution now proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. He thought that at least a week's notice should be given of such a Resolution, and that the House should not be suddenly called on to exchange and alter the entire nature of the securities of the savings banks.

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, that though it might be inconvenient to take the Resolution that day, it was still more inconvenient for the House to enter upon a discussion of it before hearing the Chancellor of the Exchequer's explanation. He felt some interest in the subject, but he confessed that the Resolution, without explanation, was totally unintelligible to him, and he conceived he was only making a reasonable request if he asked the right hon. Gentleman, after explaining the meaning of the Resolution, to give the House an opportunity, on a subsequent day, of voting upon it.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished the Chancellor of the Exchequer would add to the present Resolution words affirming the expediency of repealing that Act of Parliament which gave to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt the power of chopping and changing the vast amount of savings-banks' money to Exchequer bills or 3 per cent Consols, just according to their opinion of the necessity of sustaining the money market. It was well known that a vast amount of money had been lost to the public by such transactions.

MR. SPOONER remarked, that the most convenient course for the House to pursue, was to resolve into Committee, and hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer's explanation. Afterwards, if it should be deemed desirable, the decision on the Resolution might be postponed till some subsequent period.

COLONEL SYKES said, he must maintain that in such a thin House as the present, and with some £36,000,000 of money at stake, hon. Members ought not to be called upon all at once to bind themselves, by passing a Resolution, embracing a variety of important points. The suggestion to hear the explanation now and to defer the decision to some future period, therefore, appeared to him reasonable.

Question put and agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I hope, notwithstanding what has been stated by some hon. Friends of mine as to the expediency of postponing the vote on the Resolution I am about to propose, the Committee will now come to some definite opinion with respect to it; and it is not for any purpose of my own, but for the advance of public business, that I wish to induce the Committee to adopt the Resolution to-night. I will briefly state the general objects of the proposition, and then the Committee will be in a better position to judge whether it would be desirable or not to pass the Resolution. It has been said, and truly said, that it is difficult to gather the meaning of the proposition from the Resolution, and the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir H. Willoughby) lamented that he had had only one day to consider it, though from a subsequent part of his speech it appeared that he had had five years to consider it, because he said that the present Resolution was the same in effect as one proposed by me five years ago. It must be obvious to any one who takes the most cursory view of the matter, that it is difficult to frame a Resolution of this preliminary kind in a satisfactory manner. It is desirable to frame it so fully that it may cover in letter and spirit the whole of the objects requiring a preliminary Resolution; while at the same time it is impossible to make it completely explain a measure of this kind, which will be found not too easily understood when introduced with all the details in the shape of a Bill. A preliminary Resolution drawn up with the same detail as a Bill would obviously defeat the object intended, which is, that the principle of a measure should in every case be first discussed, and afterwards the provisions. The present Resolution has been drawn up by persons of experience, and I am not aware that it could be better drawn up for its purpose; but it is quite impossible to make it a satisfactory vehicle of conveying to the House any clear idea of the meaning of the measure, and if hon. Gentlemen are anxious—legitimately anxious—to obtain a clear idea of its meaning, the only way of doing so, beyond listening to the few words I have to state, is to adopt the Resolution and permit the Bill to be brought in; and then, when they have the Bill in their hands, and have read it a first and second time, and put it into Committee, they will know what are the objects of the measure, and in what manner it is proposed to attain them. The adoption of a Resolution like the present binds the Committee to no greater extent than the expression of an opinion that they think the general objects of the measure desirable, and are ready to consider in Committee upon the Bill the means by which they may be carried out. The hon. Member for Evesham, who takes a lively interest in the position of the depositors in savings banks and friendly societies, has frequently complained in this House that that position was unsatisfactory, declaring that their property has been impaired and diminished by the financial management of their funds in the hands of the Government. I, certainly, for one, hold that the depositors in those savings banks and friendly societies have an honourable claim on the public for the full and absolute restitution of every farthing placed, through the means of those banks and societies, in the hands of the Government, entirely irrespective of what might be the management or mismanagement of the funds, or what might be the literal conditions of the law. At the same time, I must admit that, in point of mere dry law, the title of the savings banks, and, I believe, of some friendly societies, to the full restitution, principal and interest, of the money lodged in the coffers of the Government is, in part at least, and as the law now stands, an imperfect title. I think that is a state of things which calls for a remedy; and I propose to give, by the Bill to be founded on this Resolution, a perfect and absolute title to every friendly society and every savings bank to the whole sum which it may have placed in the hands of the Government, principal and interest, according to the stipulated terms. I ask the Committee to consider whether that is not a desirable object to attain; and then, if they think it be a desirable object, to allow me to lay before the House a measure calculated to give practical effect to it. Well, now, I come to the next point. I have not the slightest doubt that every hon. Member believes that every farthing of the funds which the Government receives from those parties ought to be held secure and harmless. But if the principle of the restitution of every farthing to these institutions is admitted, it is clear that the real debt of the State to savings banks and friendly societies is not to be measured by the amount of stock which the Commissioners hold, but by the amount that has been actually paid into their hands by those banks and societies. But, unfortunately, under the present law, the public official statement of the national obligations and the public liability in this particular is an untrue statement, because we owe to savings banks and friendly societies a very considerable sum which nowhere appears in the statement of the public debt. I may say that it is in round numbers about £2,000,000; and the second object of the Bill is, that instead of having a statement of the public debt untrue in that respect, we shall have, as each year comes round, a statement which shall be true, and shall represent the exact amount which we owe to those institutions. Another object I have in view, is to economise the management of those moneys; but the particular way in which I propose to do that I can hardly make intelligible on the face of the Resolution, and I would rather, for the present, defer entering into details on that part of the subject. The next and principal object I have in contemplation is to limit the powers which are now held over those moneys by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Somebody said, in the course of the preliminary discussion, that my object was to get hold of £36,000,000 of money. It is rather more than that; it is £39,000,000. Get hold of £39,000,000! Why, I have got a most complete hold of it already. The hold of the Finance Minister over this money is a larger and more absolute power than is required for the public interest, and I ask the Committee to afford me the opportunity of limiting that power. That is another of the objects which I have in view. I should wish, however, to state the practically important point on which I desire to effect that limitation. The hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams) has said that it is in the power of the Commissioners of the National Debt—and that means it is virtually in the power of the Finance Minister—to convert Exchequer bills of particular descriptions which they may buy from the Government into stock, and thereby to create a new permanent National Debt without the consent of Parliament. That is perfectly true. I do not enter now into the question about the conversion of Exchequer bills, which form part of the regular Funded Debt. That is an entirely different matter. I speak of the conversion of what are termed deficiencies, and of what are termed Consolidated Fund and Ways and Means bills. These are means by which a temporary provision is made for the balances in the Exchequer. It is well known that by means of the conversion of those bills into stock it is in the power of the Minister of Finance, when there is a deficiency in the public revenue, to turn over that deficiency into permanent public debt. I proposed by this Bill entirely to abolish that power; and the last object I have in view is to bring the whole transactions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, through the medium of the National Debt Commissioners, regularly and periodically, under the view of Parliament. It is requisite, in my opinion, that considerable powers should be left in the hands of the Finance Minister. Though I am rather sceptical as to all that has been said as to the ill uses to which these funds have been put, there have been occasions on which uses have been made of these powers which I am not prepared to justify; very considerable discretion, however, must remain in the hands of the Finance Minister. It is for the public interest that it should be so; but there has been no adequate public provision made for bringing his proceedings regularly under the view of the House of Commons. I propose to enact, for the first time, that the whole of his transactions shall be, at the commencement of every Session, submitted to the view of Parliament. Nor will I stop with the mere presentation of a return. A Committee of this House, appointed about three years ago on the subject of the public monies, by my right hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir Francis Baring) made, among other recommendations, a very valuable and judicious one, to the effect that the public accounts in the various Departments should regularly, at the commencement of every year, be submitted to a Committee, and that not an ordinary Select Committee, but one invoking in its constitution the aid and discretion of the highest authority in this House—namely, that of the Speaker himself. That is an admirable suggestion; and I do not consider this House, as the guardian of the public money, has discharged its duties, unless it reviews those accounts regularly from year to year, and sees how the Supplies have been appropriated. Looking forward to that review of the public accounts, I propose that you should extend it regularly from year to year to the management of those public monies which the Chancellor of the Exchequer holds in deposit. These are the general objects I propose to attain by the measure which, if permitted, I shall ask leave to introduce. On a former occasion, in December, 1854, when Parliament was summoned for the purpose of considering exclusively certain subjects connected with the war in the Crimea, I asked for leave to pass a Resolution of a similar character, in order that I might be enabled to introduce a Bill. Some hon. Member objected to passing a Resolution of the kind at that time; but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) rose in his place and said, it was evidently for the convenience of the House that that preliminary Resolution, which committed no one, should be disposed of in order to the plan being put into an intelligible form; and with the unanimous approval of the House that was done, and the Bill was printed. If the Committee is still of opinion, after what I have stated, that a postponement is desirable, I shall not offer any opposition. My wish, however, is to be permitted to pass now this Resolution to report it to the House, and then to bring in my Bill, which will be printed in three or four days, and there will be ample time given to every Member to consider its provisions and understand its object before I ask the House to read it a second time.

Resolution moved :—

That it is expedient to create a charge upon the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in respect of the sums due to Savings Banks and Friendly Societies, and to provide for the payment of interest thereon to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt; and also to make provision out of the said Consolidated Fund, or by Exchequer Bills or Exchequer Bonds, for any difference which may now or hereafter exist between the assets in the hands of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt in respect of Savings Banks and Friendly Societies, and the liabilities thereon, and for the interest on such Exchequer Bills or Exchequer Bonds; and also to authorise the cancelling of such amounts of the several capital stocks of annuities held by the said Commissioners for Savings Banks and Friendly Societies respectively as may appear to the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to be expedient, and for the creation of like amounts of capital stock bearing a lower rate of interest than the capital stocks so cancelled, and for paying the interest on the stock so created.

MR. H. HERBERT said, he rose to express his satisfaction at the clear statement made by his right hon. Friend on this important subject. He regretted, however, that he had omitted to deal with one essential part of the question. On a former occasion, when bringing in a Bill on this subject, his right hon. Friend observed, that if it could be said that any public creditor lost a farthing the state of public finance could not be considered a satisfactory one. He now felt disappointed that his right hon. Friend did not propose to deal with the whole question. The mode in which the money of these institutions was managed before it got into the hands of the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt was in the most unsatisfactory condition. The depositors, however, ought to be protected from any loss on the amount they lodged with the Banks. It ought to be made impossible that there should be any loss prior to the money getting into the hands of the State. If this could not be done it was the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to bring in a measure to sever altogether the apparent connection of the State with these Banks. There was just at present sufficient interference by the State with these Banks to give the public an idea that they had Government security, and if they imagined that they were entitled to every farthing that passed into the hands of the Government there ought to be some machinery to protect the money of depositors before it got there. The Chancellor of the Exchequer came forward, and told the House and the country that he wished to bring in a measure for dealing with this matter. If it were beyond the power of the right hon. Gentleman to produce a really good measure which would remedy the present state of things, the Government should get rid of all connection with these banks. Formerly the Trustees and Managers were legally liable to the depositors, but in 1844 they were absolved from all responsibility for the moneys deposited. He did not complain of this, for it was unreasonable to make private individuals responsible for so large an amount as the deposits of the savings banks; but surely their being absolved from that responsibility created a necessity for providing some other machinery by which depositors might be protected from loss before their money reached the State. He did not expect that his right hon. Friend would mix up this question of the losses of depositors with the one he had now introduced, but he might be permitted to express the hope that he had made up his mind to grapple with that important branch of the subject, and to put the money of depositors in such a position as to render loss to them impossible.

MR. AYRTON said, that on reading the Resolution, he had found it rather obscure, and now that he had heard the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he had been singularly disappointed with it, for he did not know much more than he did before. The object of going into Committee was to inform the House how, and in what manner, the Resolution on the table was to be carried out. But the right hon. Gentleman with great adroitness then said, that he could not make them understand what he wished to effect until they had seen the Bill. There was no alternative, therefore, but to accept the Resolution and wait patiently till the Bill was before the House. It was rather hard to be compelled to take so important a preliminary step in the dark; but if they had to do so he protested against being held responsible for anything whatever. As one of the savings-banks Committee he had gone into the matter very fully, but he had not arrived at the same conclusions as the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the relations that existed between the Government and the savings banks. It seemed a very sound proposition to say that the savings bank should receive back the amount which had been received by the State, but the right hon. Gentleman kept out of view an important phase of the question, which was this, that the moneys were paid to the Commissioners, who were charged with a special duty under a special Act of Parliament, and that they were to be invested in a particular manner for the benefit of savings banks. These investments were very different to the cash received by the Government. If, however, they had been fairly dealt with by the Government as trustees for depositors, instead of there having been a deficiency, there would have been a large surplus, or a sum of consols beyond the amount of cash received by the Government. It could not be denied that the duty undertaken by Government was not truly fulfilled. It would be found that a large amount of the invested money had been taken from time to time to make good the interest which the Government came under an obligation to pay, irrespective of the capital fund. The Government having, from time to time, applied the capital fund for the purpose of making good the interest, at last brought the savings-banks accounts into this position, that the deficiency was so large that the question was raised whether it could continue to pay even the rate of interest that would have been received had the capital account remained intact; so that the people who now invested were to be called on to receive a smaller rate of interest in order to make good the deficiencies of former years. How this state of things was to be remedied they had received no information; but he trusted the Bill to be brought in would be more satisfactory than the one introduced last Session, and which the Government were compelled to abandon. There was one remark of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that somewhat alarmed him, as he was afraid from its tenor that they were to have the continuance of a system that had entailed much inconvenience as well as much loss on this fund. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had intimated that it would still be necessary for him to exercise considerable power over this fund which ought to be held as a sacred deposit for the working classes. He could not conceive that there was any necessity for the Chancellor of the Exchequer exercising any such power; if it was necessary that he should operate in the market as a "bear" or "bull" he must say he did not think the funds of the savings banks were legitimate funds for that purpose. If such a power were necessary, let there be some proper statute to sanction it. The present practice was productive of great inconvenience, and could not be defended on any principle. The Committee on Public Moneys were all agreed that for the time to come the administration of the savings-banks funds ought to be placed upon a solid basis, and that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer wanted resources for financial operations, he ought to come to the House and obtain them by some means which the House might distinctly sanction.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he doubted whether the Committee would discuss this subject to advantage until they saw the Bill. He would, therefore, merely say that the objects proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to be good, but whether the details were such as ought to meet with the approbation of the House they ought not to judge too hastily. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he proposed to deal with the other recommendations of the Public Moneys Committee. He understood him to propose that the administration of these funds should be subject to the control or audit of a Committee of that House, probably nominated by the Speaker. The Public Moneys Committee recommended a kind of appropriation audit, and that some check should be exercised upon the expenditure of the money that had once been voted. If he had rightly understood the right hon. Gentleman the recommendation of the Committee with regard to savings banks was only a portion of the suggestions made by them which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to adopt.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY remarked that, having heard the ingenuous speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he felt bound to say that, like the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), he was not a bit the wiser for it. In 1854 he took exception to a financial Resolution thus suddenly produced. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he had previously agreed to the same Resolution. Now it was one inconvenience of bringing forward these sudden Resolutions that he had not had time to refer to the Resolution to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had alluded. But this portion of the present Resolution was, at least, entirely new:—

"And also to authorize the cancelling of such amounts of the several capital stocks of annuities held by the said Commissioners for Savings Banks and Friendly Societies respectively as may appear to the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to be expedient, and for the creation of like amounts of capital stock bearing a lower rate of interest than the capital stocks so cancelled, and for paying the interest on the stock so created."

This was not in the original Resolution, and it was very important. The Resolution of 1854 ended in nothing. A Bill was introduced making a certain proportion of the savings-banks money chargeable on the consolidated fund, and leaving the remaining third to be still dealt with by the Executive. He believed that what had occurred in 1854 would be repeated now. The trustees and managers objected then to the mode in which it was proposed to deal with their funds, and in like manner they would, he felt persuaded, resist the change now proposed, and entreat the House to adopt the recommendations of its own Committee. That Committee recommended that the investment of these funds should be treated as a bona fide trust, by Commissioners appointed under a law duly framed for the regulation of their proceedings, and that the saving banks should receive such interest for their money as the sums invested would bring. It appeared to him that the present Resolution struck at this principle, and only dealt with a single portion of the recommendation of the Savings Banks Committee. If, however, it should be the wish of the Committee to see the right hon. Gentleman's Bill he would not stand in the way of its introduction.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he was glad to hear that the hon. Baronet would not press his objection to the passing of the Resolution. It was true that the Resolution was not a clear exposition of the whole subject. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was compelled by the rules of the House to frame a Resolution which covered all that part of the Bill affecting the Consolidated Fund. The House would not, however, be committed by the Resolution to carry out all the words of the Resolution in the details of the Bill, and hon. Members who objected to any portion of the Bill were equally at liberty to object to it, whether the Resolution were agreed to or not. The objects proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer appeared to him to be most beneficial and proper. No one could doubt that in point of equity the depositors in savings banks had a claim to every sixpence of capital and interest for the money which had been placed in the hands of the Government. He had sinned like other Chancellors of the Exchequer, in exercising the power which he possessed over savings-bank moneys, but he did not hesitate to say it had been done before, and was perfectly legal, that Chancellors of the Exchequer, in so doing, exercised a power which ought not to have been placed in their hands. He had employed these moneys, and, as a financial operation, he was prepared to justify what he had done. He did not wish to fight the battle of 1841 over again. In a financial point of view he had made the best arrangement in his power; but looking at the matter in a constitutional light, it was a power which the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to be deprived of, and he would vote for any measure that took it away.

MR. BARROW said, he wished it to be understood that in not dividing against the Resolution he did not pledge himself to its details, or to imply that he was in favour of empowering the Treasury to alter the investment of the moneys deposited in the hands of the Commission. He differed however from the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) in this, that he believed it to be a perfectly desirable and legitimate arrangement that banks should be provided in which the poorer classes might deposit their savings and receive a reasonable interest for their money, and as the amount of interest paid to them did not exceed the average interest on other loans, the tax-payers had no reason to complain. He hoped that the power of reducing the rate of interest proposed in the latter part of the Resolution did not imply any present intention of altering the present rate. He was anxious that the funds of the depositors in savings banks should be transmitted to the Government, to be employed for their benefit, and that depositors should be secured from loss by the institution of a bona fide Commission, but thought the Government should have no power of "stock-jobbing" with these moneys. He therefore felt bound to say that he acceded to the Resolution only with the full privilege of reserving any objections to any clause of the Bill which might carry out the purposes to which he objected.

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, he believed they were all agreed that, whatever might be the shortcomings of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the depositors in the savings banks ought not to be the sufferers; that the accounts of these banks should be presented annually to the House, and that a Committee ought to be appointed to examine these accounts. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had not, however, been sufficiently explicit as to the functions he was himself to exercise in regard to the savings-banks funds. If the right hon. Gentleman was to have any control over them whatever, it was quite certain that he would make them subservient to financial purposes, and what had been done before would be done again and again. The same objections would then arise as at present existed. When he read the Resolution, he felt he should be unable to speak upon it until he heard some explanation regarding it, and then having heard the explanation, he was still unable to give an opinion until he had seen the Bill. Neither was sufficiently intelligible. But so far as he had understood the explanation as to the objects of the Bill, those objects were desirable achievements. He should, therefore, not oppose the Resolution. But he should like some description to be given of what the functions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to be.

COLONEL SYKES said, that as the passing of the Resolution did not pledge any hon. Member to the details of the Bill he should withdraw his opposition. He should object to the Chancellor of the Exchequer having any power under the Bill to deal with the funds for the purpose of propping up the public credit. The whole question, moreover, could never be in a satisfactory position until the depositors at large were fully assured that their funds were properly secured in the transit from the Bank to the Commission.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said he could assure his hon. Friend the Member for Kerry (Mr. H. Herbert) that he should be glad to have the opportunity of introducing a Bill for the better management of savings banks with a fair prospect of carrying it. He had not abandoned the hope of such a measure, and it was a subject that would receive his most anxious attention. With regard to the question of the hon. Baronet (Sir S. Northcote) as to the Report of the Public Monies Committee, the saving-bank funds came not at all within their operations. Those funds were public monies on deposit, and in no way allied to the public money forming the revenue of the country, which alone formed the subject of that Committee's deliberations. He had, perhaps, been misunderstood in the allusion he made to that Committee, but what he meant to say was this—that the recommendations made by that Committee were equally applicable to the savings-bank funds as to the revenue, and he proposed, therefore, that a Committee should be appointed to discharge the same functions with regard to those funds that the Public Monies Committee did with regard to the revenue. He wished to relieve the mind of the hon. Member for Nottinghamshire from the apprehension that the Bill would empower the Government to alter the rate of interest paid to depositors in savings banks. The two subjects were entirely distinct; and the rate of interest ought to be fixed in a Bill for the management of savings banks, because the depositors would then see in one view all that portion of the subject which concerned them. He quite admitted that the rate of interest ought not to be left in the discretion of the Government, except as the law might fix it. He had been asked to describe the functions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer under this Bill. He had not entered into that subject at large, because he took it for granted that it would appear from what he had said—namely, that those functions were to remain as they were, except that they were to be based on certain limitations and restrictions. It might be the opinion of some hon. Members that savings-banks funds should not be subject to the operation of any discretion on the part of the State as to the use to be made of them. He differed from that proposition entirely. He believed, if such a course were adopted, it would be found injurious and detrimental both to the public interest and disadvantageous to the depositors themselves. In point of fact, the question was, whose ought those monies to be? They ought to be the monies of the public, and used for the public benefit, but held at call, and liable to be restored to those who were originally and ultimately entitled to them. If, then, they were to be used for the public, it would be absolutely impossible to exclude the Government from all discretion in the management of them. In the Bill he proposed to limit those powers that were considered principally objectionable, and to enlarge those to which the recommendations of the Committee should point. But these were matters of detail. Finally, however, he proposed to bring all those powers regularly and periodically under the strict review of a body acting for and to be appointed by the House of Commons, and in whom the House will have confidence. Such were the main principles of the measure, but it was open to any hon. Member to propose any changes he might deem expedient.

DISTRIBUTION OF INDIAN PRIZE MONEY. QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH regretted that two years and a half had elapsed since the capture of Delhi, and he was still compelled to put the Question of which he had given notice—namely, Whether any Measure has yet been adopted with a view to the Distribution of the Property captured by the Army in India during the War of the Mutiny; and upon what Principles such Distribution, if intended, is to be made?

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL replied, that a proposition had been sent over by the Indian Government before the rising of the House in the last Session, in reference to this subject; and a reply had been sent back by the then Secretary of State for India, approving of the principle which was there laid down. The principle was that all the property taken by the army being property of mutineers, or belonging to the State which had been seized by the mutineers, should be given to the army as prize money; but there was a reservation, and he thought a very proper one under the circumstances, in the case of property taken by the army which belonged to individuals who could prove their loyalty to the State, that such portion should be given up to the owners. The question was of a most anomalous and complicated nature, and had given rise to a great many questions which had prevented the Indian Government from computing the whole amount of prize money due to the army. The Indian Government were now taking steps with a view to ascertain the whole sum disposable, and there was every disposition to hasten the matter forward, and to give to the army their share of the prize money, which they had so well and so nobly earned.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH still wished to know upon what principle the distribution was to proceed? It was not necessary to ascertain the total amount, for money might be given on account, as was often done. He wanted to know whether the prize money was to be awarded for actual service or for service of a constructive character? To those only who were actually engaged in the capture, or to those also whose co-operation being essential to success were, though not actually present, present to all practical purposes. He thought it a great hardship that the army should have to wait so long before they received that to which they were so justly entitled.

COTTON AND SLAVERY.

RETURN MOVED FOR.

LORD BROUGHAM, in rising to move, according to notice, for returns relating to the importation of cotton, said he understood there would be no objection on the part of the Government to granting them. He thought it would be most satisfactory to all to know that since the repeal of the duty there had been such an enormous increase in the importation of cotton, from 63,000,000 lb. to 1,024,000,000 lb., or sixteen-fold on all cottons, and an increase of thirty-two fold on the importations from the United States alone, which had risen from 23,000,000 lb. to 830,000,000 lb. This enormous increase in the importation of cotton—so advantageous to our manufacturers and the community at large—had been accomplished at the trifling cost of about £500,000, which was the amount of the duty upon cotton previous to its remission. He hoped the fact would be an encouragement to repeal duties without any regard to what was called the reciprocity system, but to repeal them simply because we wished to get rid of the burden imposed upon ourselves by those duties. There were now no less than 480 articles upon which Excise or Custom duties were levied, to the great obstruction of trade and the injury and vexation of those who dealt in the articles, while the total product to the revenue was under £1,000,000; indeed, he believed it was only about £700,000, or not above £1,500 per article. He rejoiced in the benefits which had resulted to the people of the United States, as well as to ourselves, from our repeal of the duty on raw cotton, but he expected to see those kinsmen of ours suffer greatly by a falling off in the cotton sales ; for it should not be forgotten that some of our own colonies presented great facilities for the growth of cotton, and he hoped that in British Guiana, Jamaica, and in Africa every encouragement would be afforded by the Government to the cultivation of this most important material. Above all, he trusted that a trade in cotton would be opened on the east coast of Africa, in the districts explored by Dr. Livingstone ; for upon the high lands of that country cotton to any amount, and of the best quality, might, with a slight encouragement, be raised. He was told that a capital of £20,000, judiciously directed, there would be sufficient to secure this very great advantage ; and he did hope, that if it were inexpedient for the Government to interfere in such matters, his wealthy as well as worthy friends at Manchester and Liverpool would lend a hand to promote that in which they had so great an interest, and would help to raise the money. Let us consider how this change would operate in the United States. There they have what they call the domestic institution, though we might rather call it an offence than an institution, except that, not many years ago, we were ourselves offenders. So the slave-trade as well at slavery, was defended by referring to its antiquity, and here again we had little to say, having been, till of late years, ourselves culprits. That the Americans had not ceased to offend when we did is deeply to be lamented, although their Government appears well disposed to put down the traffic ; but they have, in parts at least of the Union, now committed an offence in which we never at any time had any share—an outrage so atrocious as almost to exceed belief, and to make one hope that the accounts of it which have reached this country have no foundation. They have declared all the free people of colour slaves, unless they instantly go into banishment. It is supposed that this may be only a threat in Maryland, but in Arkansas and Missouri it has been carried into execution. Many persons have been driven from their homes, and those who refused to go have been reduced to bondage. All this enormity is grounded on the inability of the State to control those poor people from the defective condition of its police. That such a crime should be perpetrated in the middle of the nineteenth century—nay, in any age, or by any civilized people—seems altogether incredible, and one hopes to see the whole statement contradicted. A wholesale massacre of the unhappy race would not be much more shocking to our feelings ; and might be justified by the same kind of reasons as are used to defend this monstrous proceeding, the convenience of the State in getting rid of a troublesome part of its subjects, and the high antiquity of the crime ; for certainly murder dates from the very beginning of the world, the first man who was born having murdered the second. All these things, however, belong to the internal affairs of the United States, and we have no right to complain ; but we have a right to feel ; and it is impossible to restrain the feelings of reprobation, nay, of horror, from finding vent in the accents of indignation. If, however, we have no right to complain of our kinsmen in the Southern States, so will they have no right whatever to complain of us if we take every course most likely to increase our supply of cotton from other quarters than their grounds, although the effect of that change may be not only to secure the benefits to our own manufacturers, but to shake the “domestic institutions,” which it most assuredly will, as our markets take seven-eighths of all that the Southern grow. He should be glad to learn from the noble Duke that these accounts from the United States can be contradicted ; and also, that if no direct encouragement can be given to cotton-planting in our own colonies, and in Africa, at least all obstacles to it will be removed, and these on the west coast as well as the east. But without further pursuing the subject at present, he should be satisfied with moving—

“That there be laid before this House, Account of the Quantities of Cotton imported into Great Britain during the Years 1814, 1815, 1844, 1858, 1859 ; distinguishing the Countries from which such Quantities came.”

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, the Government, of course, had no objection to the production of this Return, and he assured his noble and learned Friend at the same time that the Government had a deep sense of the importance of extending, as much as possible, the growth of cotton. Great efforts had been made and would every way be encouraged by the Government to promote the cultivation of cotton, by means of free labour. In Jamaica, as his noble and learned Friend knew, attempts were being made to introduce the cotton plant; but both there and in Guiana and other colonies the great difficulty was not so much in the soil as in the want of sufficiently cheap labour. It was not the practice of the Government to enter into commercial speculations, which in this country were properly left to private enterprise; but so far as the Government could assist and even stimulate the efforts now being made to further the growth of cotton they would certainly do so. Thus, on receiving information that in Ceylon lands could be brought into cultivation for this purpose, the Government, departing from their usual custom of not parting with Crown lands except by sale, granted certain of those lands for the period of five years, in order that the experiment might be tried. In the new colony of Queensland, in Australia, he had given instructions to the Governor to encourage the introduction of the cotton plant, and he earnestly trusted that both there and in other of the British dominions this experiment would be successful. His noble and learned Friend was aware, that on the West Coast of Africa the Lieutenant Governor of the Gold Coast had instituted a Society for improving the cultivation of cotton, and had made arrangements for facilitating its conveyance from the interior.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he had heard with satisfaction what had fallen from the noble Duke. It was quite true that it was not the custom of the British Government to engage in direct speculations to promote the trade in any article; but with regard to the growth of cotton, the British Government had rendered great assistance in another way—namely, by making the highways of the great continent of Africa—the rivers—accessible to English merchants, so that cotton might be cultivated on each side of them, and the traders have a safe passage up and down. The difficulty which was experienced in other countries of obtaining free labour to produce cotton did not exist in Africa, where there was an abundant native population, whose cultivation of cotton would be attended with the additional advantage of introducing a wholesome and lawful commerce, which would absolutely destroy the slave trade; for the only way by which that trade could be ultimately destroyed was by teaching the African chiefs that the employment of their dependent people in the production of the raw material of cotton would be more advantageous than selling them into slavery for transportation to other parts of the world. He therefore earnestly trusted that the attention of the Government would be directed to the maintenance and even to the increase of efforts for opening the great rivers in Africa, especially the Zambesi, the opening of which he believed the Government was about to aid, and the Niger, which for years the Government had assisted in opening.

LORD OVERSTONE believed that a question of more importance than that relating to the extension of the sources for the supply of the raw material of cotton could not be brought under the consideration of the Legislature. He had therefore heard with satisfaction the statement of the noble Duke, that the attention of the Government was directed to this subject, and that every encouragement, consistent with sound principles, would be afforded to extend and vary the sources of the supply of cotton. The noble and learned Lord (Lord Brougham), had stated that within a short period the importation of cotton into this country had multiplied thirty-two fold, and when their Lordships considered how extensive was the demand for cotton goods throughout the world, and how vast the number of our population depending upon that manufacture for their daily subsistence, they would at once perceive that it was a serious matter to have for the supply of the raw material only a single source, liable to be affected by the uncertainties of climate, to say nothing of the obstacles which any unfortunate state of political relations might raise up in the way of our merchants applying to that source. He trusted that no efforts would be omitted by the people of this country to promote every rational enterprise for the supply of cotton from every quarter where it could be obtained—and as there seemed a reasonable prospect of getting a supply from the West Coast of Africa—he hoped that all the encouragement, which the Government could legitimately give, would be afforded.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, that their Lordships were, no doubt, aware that the attention of several Administrations had been given to the important point of opening up the rivers of Africa; and two expeditions with that view were now actually in progress, one on the Niger, and the other on the Zambesi. From both very satisfactory information had been received with respect to the supply of cotton; and he would read a short extract from a recent despatch of Dr. Livingstone, dated May

“ Cotton is cultivated largely, and the further we went the crop appeared to be of the greater importance. The women alone were well clothed with the produce ; the men being content with goatskins and a cloth made of bark of certain trees. Every one spins and weaves cotton. Even chiefs may be seen with the spindle and bag, which serves as a distaff. The process of manufacture is the most rude and tedious that can be conceived. The cotton goes through five processes with the fingers before it comes to the loom. Time is of no value. They possess two varieties of the plant. One, indigenous, yields cotton more like wool than that of other countries. It is strong and feels rough in the hand. The other variety is from imported seed, yielding a cotton that renders it unnecessary to furnish the people with American seed. A point in its culture worth noticing is, the time of planting has been selected so that the plants remain in the ground during winter, and five months or so after sowing they come to maturity before the rains begin or insects come forth to damage the crop.”

On May 31, Dr. Livingstone again wrote :—

“ Only two or three of the Portuguese have planted cotton, the people of the Shire on the contrary, brought several bags of cotton for sale on our second visit, though no time had elapsed to allow of planting since we informed them of the existence of a market. The cotton trade is quite ready for development among them by agents such as Sierra Leone supplies to the Niger. The inhabitants are quite independent of the Portuguese, but unless a late ordinance of the Government of Portugal allows foreigners to settle in the country neither cotton nor sugar will be collected.”

Reports had at the same time been received from the Niger, stating that a very great increase in the produce of cotton had taken place, but the extension of the supply in certain districts was mainly dependent on the suppression of the slave trade. He wished he could state that that great object—the suppression of the slave trade—was near accomplishment. He was sorry, however, to say that the slave trade, on the contrary, had increased, and he feared tended to a still further increase. He concurred with the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford) in thinking that the extension of industry and legitimate commerce among the natives of Africa was the ultimate means of extinguishing this most deplorable and execrable trade ; and as the cultivation of cotton was a most important branch of industry, the supply of the demand of this country for that article would coincide in a marked degree with the suppression of the slave trade. He was not prepared to discuss the matter referred to by the noble and learned Lord relating to the internal affairs of America, but as regards the slave trade, the United States had, by a recent measure, shown their disposition to suppress it ; so that he trusted the people of that country would never encourage that accursed traffic, much less recur to a principle they had repudiated as a nation.

EARL GREY said, he quite agreed with the right rev. Prelate and his noble Friend as to the importance of encouraging the growth of cotton in Africa. It was quite true, as stated by the noble Duke, that in our own colonies the want of labour must for many years be an obstacle to any sensible increase in the production of cotton ; but in Africa there was an immense territory fitted for the cultivation of cotton with a population sufficient to carry it on. In many parts of that continent the inhabitants already cultivated cotton to a considerable extent, and beyond doubt this might be increased with infinite advantage both to them and to us. He was sorry to hear that the slave trade had increased, and he was afraid that its increased activity was mainly owing to the assistance it derived from the American flag. To the infinite and eternal disgrace of the United States, that country allowed its flag to be prostituted for the purpose of enabling the slave traders to defeat the efforts made for the suppression of the trade. He believed that if that went on America would incur the reprobation of every man of right feeling throughout the civilized world. She would place herself under the ban of humanity. It was impossible that their Lordships could express too strongly the indignation they must feel at such disgraceful conduct on the part of a great country. But, besides America, he should have been glad to hear from the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Lord Wodehouse) that another powerful nation, which was deeply to blame in the matter of the slave trade, had seen the error of her ways, and had adopted a wiser policy. He should have liked to hear from his noble Friend what was the position of France with respect to the slave trade. Their Lordships knew what France had done. While she had nominally abolished slavery in her dominions, her Government had directly authorized the purchase of what were in mockery called “ free emigrants ”—of men brought down in chains to the coast and shipped as “ free emigrants ” to French colonies. Their Lordships were told last year that this atrocious system had been put down on the east coast of Africa. He wanted to know what was going on at present on the west coast. There, he was informed, the system still continued, and under the name of dépôts d'industrie, the French Government had slave-markets—established places to which the slave trader might bring his goods and be certain of a market. To pretend to have abolished slavery in the French colonies and the slave trade while these markets were open for slaves was a mockery and a delusion. Every one knew that the receiver of stolen goods was the main promoter of theft, and was a more dangerous person than the actual thief. So with respect to the slave trade. The Under-Secretary of State had told their Lordships that the growth of cotton in certain parts of Africa had been stopped by recent slave-hunts. For what purpose were these slave-hunts undertaken? Were they or were they not undertaken for the purpose of obtaining victims to supply the contract authorized by the French Government? That was a circumstance which their Lordships ought to know. England, of course, had no authority to dictate to France. France might do what she thought right; but if she continued to encourage the accursed traffic in slaves, she must expect to have Members in both Houses of Parliament freely expressing their opinions of her conduct, and to find that conduct condemned throughout the civilized world.

LORD WODEHOUSE regretted to be obliged to concur in the statement of the noble Earl that the American flag had been prostituted for the protection of the slave trade; but, on the other hand, it was some consolation to know that the United States' Government had acknowledged that their squadron on the coast of Africa was ineffective, and had increased it by some small vessels. The proposed addition had not been as fully carried out as he trusted it would be; but, still, what had been done showed the determination of the American Government to maintain the purity of their flag, and to prevent the exportation of slaves from Africa. He was likewise obliged to concur in the remarks of his noble Friend upon the French emigration scheme, but he was happy to say that the French Government had put an end to the system on the east coast of Africa, and had expressed its intention, when the existing contract had terminated, to abandon it on the west coast also. Negotiations were commenced by the late Government with the Government of France for the emigration of coolies from our territories in India to French colonies. Those negotiations had been continued by the present Government, and he trusted they would be brought to a successful termination, in which case the French Government would, doubtless, fulfil its promise to put an end to the unhappy emigration of blacks from Africa, an emigration which, however humanely conducted, under whatever precautions, must tend to perpetuate the horrors of the slave trade.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY inquired of Her Majesty's Government, pursuant to notice, whether they have received any Information as to the Negotiation stated by the Ministerial Journals in Paris to exist between France and Sardinia for the Annexation of the Duchy of Savoy and the County of Nice to the Dominions of the Emperor of the French? As he had stated when he gave his notice, it was not his intention to call the attention of their Lordships to the political effects of the annexation of Savoy and Nice to the French Empire, or to the probable consequences of an arrangement which was in direct violation of a treaty which England and the other Powers of Europe were bound to maintain; but he wished to state why he thought the question had now reached a point which rendered it necessary that the Government should be asked what was the present state of their information on the subject. His question, it would be observed, was founded upon a statement which had appeared in the French newspapers, and he might be told that he ought to be able to adduce some higher authority than one or two journals in Paris. When he recollected, however, that we had recently been subjected to a succession of surprises, and that the policy of some other countries had been changed in conformity with—he would not say in obedience to—the suggestions of newspaper paragraphs and anonymous pamphlets, he submitted that he was entitled to call the attention of their Lordships to the annexation of Savoy and Nice to the Empire of France, even though he based his remarks upon articles in French newspapers. The statements to which he had alluded had appeared in the two principal and habitual organs of the French Government. It was first published in Le Pays, the most careful and prudent of the Ministerial journals; but what had chiefly attracted the attention of Europe was its circulation in the columns of L'Indépendance Belge, a Brussels paper in the enjoyment of Imperial favour, and possessing, perhaps, the most general circulation of any European journal. Subsequently it reappeared under the shape of a manifesto in La Patrie, the most adventurous of all the Imperial organs, a journal which had even been chided for being in too great a hurry to publish certain matters to the world. Nevertheless, what was stated by La Patrie was pretty sure to be near the truth. Last autumn Le Pays announced that it was the intention of the Emperor to adhere strictly to the programme which he had laid down for himself in the engagements taken at Villafranca. La Patrie threw some doubt upon that statement, and La Patrie was undoubtedly the more correct of the two. Such was the journal which published the manifesto to which he wished to call the attention of their Lordships, and which was transferred to L'Indépendance Belge on the 22nd instant. This article said that France was now determined by counsel, by her soldiers, and by sacrifices of every kind to substitute for the hereditary arrangements of Vienna the truthful policy of nationalities; and the writer went on to say that it was evident the day was drawing nigh when the superstructure raised by diplomatists must disappear before the power of logic and the course of events. He was not aware that there had been any diplomatic declaration to this effect, but the dangers contingent upon the adoption of such a principle by the powerful Government of a great nation were much greater than any which could arise from the annexation of the Duchy of Savoy. Could it for a moment be imagined that England had no interest in the assertion of such a doctrine? Why, let us look at our own possessions, scattered over the face of the globe, and then see how far we could recognize the principle of nationality. How could England stand this test? How would it apply in the Mediterranean, or the Ionian Islands? How affect Gibraltar? How might it be brought to bear on Aden or the Empire of India, or our dependencies in another hemisphere? Why, if such were to be admitted as a valid ground there would not be a single country in Europe the foundation of whose title would not be shaken. Such a doctrine would be quite subversive of those treaties and of that order and regularity which forty years' peace had brought about. Russia, indeed, prided herself upon her nationality. Nor, as regarded Poland, did he think they could collect the scattered remnants of a national existence. The restoration of Poland to nationality would almost remind one of Mr. Canning's expression regarding the repeal of the legislative union with Ireland: "Repeal the union—restore the heptarchy." Well, then, as to Prussia and this doctrine of nationality—see how it worked from Posen to Aix-la-Chapelle. Again, witness its application to Austria. And here he must say that he looked upon the stability of Austria as one of the main elements of European security; and he wished that some one who had the same conviction, and had more opportunity of making his opinion known in the proper quarter, would urge how important it was to grant what was just and reasonable in the demands of Hungary. He hoped and believed that, as regarded her Hungarian dominions, the loyalty of the Hungarian people was not yet shaken. Another of these journals eulogised the disinterested motives of France, and urged the desirableness and expediency of annexing the County of Nice, for which the writer said the reasons were more satisfactory and conclusive than even in the case of Savoy. The two did not, in fact, stand upon the same footing; for the truth was that Nice was far more Italian than even Piedmont itself. Nor could he at all perceive any reason there existed for confounding Nice with Savoy. All who were acquainted with the politics of Europe knew that the Indépendance Belge was a paper which was in direct communication with the French Government, and had a Paris correspondent who received his inspiration from the Foreign Office. In the résumé politique of that journal there had appeared a statement from its Paris correspondent, stating that it was understood that the desire of England to see the extension of Piedmont to the Marches, and her satisfaction with the commercial treaty just negotiated, would lead her to observe a strict neutrality while the Duchy of Savoy and the County of Nice were consulted as to their desire to be united to France. He did not believe that his noble Friends opposite would be actuated by any such motives, or would form their decision upon any grounds but those of their public duty; but he should like to ask his noble Friend what was the state of these negotiations. He could not suppose that the answer would be that the Government knew nothing upon the subject, because, after the publication of the article to which he had referred, the natural course would be for our Minister in Paris to communicate with the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and obtain from him a categorical explanation of its meaning. This was the course which he adopted with the nine Ministers with whom during six years he had to deal. It was that which he pursued with regard to the Swiss matter during the last few months of the reign of Louis Philippe, when he obtained from M. Guizot the most full and ready explanations; and also with reference to the expected invasion of Savoy by the Provisional Government in the year 1848, when M. Lamartine admitted to him that the disposition of the people was opposed to annexation with France; and he did not at all suppose that our present Government would have any difficulty in obtaining explanations from a Government with whom it was on such close and intimate relations. It might be worth while, for their Lordships and Englishmen generally, when they were anxious to apply those admirable constitutional principles which they valued so much at home to other States, to recollect that that country, which had not enjoyed a liberal system of government, but only the form of government under which it had lived for centuries, was so averse to part with its institutions in the year 1848, that it actually rose unassisted to resist any invasion by a French revolutionary force; and that in consequence of the introduction of that which we called the model system of Government, of late years established in Sardinia, the loyal feeling of that ancient appanage of the House of Savoy had become so weakened that the whole population was now positively stated in all these journals to be desirous of parting with the blessings of that constitutional monarchy, which we so much lauded and of uniting itself to the imperial régime of France. It was to be hoped, therefore, that our countrymen, who were apt to be led by a generous impulse into advocating the adoption in other countries of the principles of Government which they so justly prized for themselves, would pause and consider whether they were so sure that they understood the real sentiments of the people in whose behalf they spoke. He would be very glad if the noble Earl opposite could state that Her Majesty's Government had ascertained that no ground existed for imputing to the French Government any such intention as had been ascribed to it. If, however, the answer given to his question should be, that the Government were at present unable to afford any information to Parliament on the subject, of course that discussion must now close, though he trusted it would not close for ever; indeed, if the question were not brought before their Lordships by some Member of the distinguished political party behind him (the Opposition), he should take the liberty as an independent Peer, unconnected with any party, to introduce it to the notice of the House himself. The noble Marquess concluded by asking whether Her Majesty's Government had received any information as to the negotiations stated by the Ministerial journals in Paris to exist between France and Sardinia for the annexation of the Duchy of Savoy and the County of Nice to the dominions of the Emperor of the French?

EARL GRANVILLE:—My Lords, I regret very much that I was not in my place yesterday when the noble Marquess gave notice of his Question. But, on inquiring of my Colleagues, I was informed of the nature of that notice, and also of the fact that the noble Marquess had announced his intention to put the Question without raising any discussion in this House. I was, therefore, not quite prepared for his very long and interesting speech, entering into the political literature, the geography, and the different nationalities of Europe, opening up also some of the most important principles of politics and of international law which it is possible to conceive, and ending with agreeable personal reminiscences and autobiographical details of what happened to him during his embassy at Paris. I do not think it necessary to follow the noble Marquess at equal length, and I must likewise decline to give him an answer in either of the formulas which he was kind enough to suggest to me. I shall content myself with simply replying to the Question which he has placed on the paper. Her Majesty's Government have received no information "as to the negotiation stated by the Ministerial journals in Paris to exist between France and Sardinia for the annexation of the Duchy of Savoy and the circumstances that had occurred. First of all, the other French journals had been desired not to copy the paragraph. This was an exercise of power on the part of the French Government which they were very much in the practice of resorting to, and in his opinion it was extremely significant. It was clear from that fact that the French Government were aware of the existence of the rumour, and that they were desirous of suppressing it. Another significant circumstance was, that a number of English newspapers which contained the statement — The Morning Herald, Daily News, Globe, and others — had been seized and confiscated by the French Government. Again, an ordinance of the Minister of War appeared on the 23rd of January, in the Moniteur de l'Armée, the official organ of the Government on military matters, giving orders which would enable the equipment of the army to be provided immediately upon the occurrence of any emergency. Not less than 100,000 uniforms were to be kept in store, and regimental arrangements were to be made by which 60,000 uniforms would be made in a month. The Moniteur de l'Armée said, —

“The result during peace will be in reality an excellent investment. Rumours of war and war itself may then arise; it will no longer be necessary to apply for extraordinary credits, and thus uncover one's game, when it is requisite that the greatest secrecy should surround the first preparations. Europe has not beheld without astonishment the rapidity with which the French army passes from the peace to the war footing. It has been decided to apply this principle to the regimental workmen, who will be able in case of need to turn out 60,000 uniforms per month.”

A letter from the private correspondent of an English paper also stated : —

“I am able to confirm in every point the important news I sent you yesterday respecting a portion of the Imperial Guard having received its campaign equipment. The regiments at Versailles are ready to march at four hours' notice. The officers are puzzled, but, of course, anticipate Italy.”

Taken in connection with the rumour in question, these changes were sufficiently significant and were sufficient to justify the first part of his Question. If he were asked what justified the second part of his Question, and the imputation of the intentions there mentioned to the French Government, it might be sufficient in reply to review the proceedings of that Government since the House last met. On the 11th of July the treaty of Villafranca was signed, which contained that sagacious

project of a confederation of Italy under the presidency of the Pope. That plan had been brought forward on many occasions, and whether it was even now abandoned might almost seem doubtful. At any rate it was entertained up till a very recent period. But the second, the most important feature of the treaty of Villafranca was, that the two emperors, who had just terminated a sanguinary war, entered into a deliberate engagement to restore the Grand Dukes to their possessions in Italy. This certainly justified Austria in the expectation that their forces were to be employed in obtaining the restoration. On the 22nd of July a question was put to the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in that House as to the intentions of the French Government. The noble Lord gave a satisfactory answer to that question on the part of the French Government. The engagement then given, which was the only cable that had held firm amid all the changes that had taken place, was, that no interference by force of arms in the internal affairs of Italy would receive the sanction of the English Government, or would be attempted by the Emperor of the French. He must in honour declare that the French Government, and particularly the remarkable man at the head of that Government, had faithfully observed that pledge. While, however, there had been no armed interference in Italy, every endeavour had been made to turn the flank of that engagement, so to speak, and to induce the populations of Central Italy to accept some other solution of the difficulty than that which they proclaimed to be their deliberate election. M. Pietri was despatched to Italy, and after him Prince Poniatowski, and deputations were received by the Emperor of the French from the Italian populations. On the 10th of September a remarkable document came out in the Moniteur, to the publisher of which it was sent direct from St. Saviour. The concluding paragraph was as follows ; — “But let not Italy be deceived. There is but one Power in Europe that wages war for an idea. That Power is France, and France has accomplished her task.” On the 9th of September the Constitutionnel, a semi-official organ of the French Government, scolded The Times for being adverse to the claims of Prince Napoleon, but shortly afterwards the Moniteur rebuked the supposition that the French Government desired to see Prince Napoleon King of Etruria and Central Italy gard to that part of the Report in which the Board of Trade was specially concerned—namely, the recommendation that Parliament should be asked to confer additional powers on the Board of Trade for the investigation of railway accidents, he might state that they had not found railway companies at all backward in affording facilities for investigating such accidents, and therefore it was not thought necessary to ask Parliament for any increased powers to the Board of Trade for that purpose. There was accordingly no intention at present on the part of the Government to introduce any measure on the subject.

DELHI AND LUCKNOW PRIZE MONEY.

QUESTION.

MR. TURNER said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether any and what steps have been taken towards effecting the payment of the prize money due to the troops engaged in the capture of Delhi and Lucknow, and when it is probable that the money will be forthcoming?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, with regard to the Delhi prize money they had not yet received from the Indian Government a statement of what the amount would be. A question had been raised, as to certain property which had been taken, whether it legitimately came under the description of prize money or not. Till that was settled the Indian Government were unable to tell what was the amount of prize money to be distributed. As soon as this was known, however, the necessary measures would be taken for declaring the prize. With regard to Lucknow, information had very lately been received of the amount of prize money captured there, and formal measures were now in progress for making the usual application to Her Majesty.

LAW OF LANDLORD AND TENANT IN IRELAND.—QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he rose to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he could say when it is the intention of the Government to introduce their promised measure for a more equitable adjustment of the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland?

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD replied that he was not able to specify the day on which his right hon. Friend the Secretary for Ireland would ask for leave to introduce this Bill; but as he knew that his hon. and learned Friend felt considerable interest in the subject, it would be gratifying to him to learn that the Government plan on the subject was matured, and his right hon. Friend proposed to take the opportunity of bringing in the necessary Bills some time before the approaching assizes.

PROMISSORY NOTES IN INDIA.

QUESTION.

MR. R. CRAWFORD said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he has under his consideration any plans or proposals for authorizing and regulating, by means of a bank or otherwise, the issue of promissory notes payable on demand in India?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the question was one which had been for some time discussed in India, and last year a despatch was received from thence making some suggestions on the subject. Those suggestions, however, were not exactly such as he could approve of, and before adopting any measure of the kind it was determined that nothing should be done till a report is received from Mr. Wilson, than whom no one is more conversant with the subject, and who has recently been sent to India for the purpose of giving his able assistance in all financial and commercial matters. He could not, therefore, say that he was prepared with any measure for the purpose of establishing a paper currency in India, although he readily admitted that it was exceedingly desirable to do so.

On Motion that the House at its rising do adjourn till Monday next:—

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is true, as stated in a French paper, that 30,000 French troops are expected at Leghorn, and whether he has reason to believe that the French Government has any intention of taking any such step for the purpose of preventing the annexation of the provinces of Central Italy to Sardinia, which their constitutional representatives have voted as their final determination? The statement to which he referred appeared in The Salut Public of Lyons, a French paper of good repute, and it had received corroboration by many circumstances that had occurred. First of all, the other French journals had been desired not to copy the paragraph. This was an exercise of power on the part of the French Government which they were very much in the practice of resorting to, and in his opinion it was extremely significant. It was clear from that fact that the French Government were aware of the existence of the rumour, and that they were desirous of suppressing it. A letter from the private correspondent of an English paper also stated:—

ion with the rumour in changes were sufficiently ere sufficient to justify a Question. If he were lied the second part of the imputation of the mentioned to the French might be sufficient in re-proceedings of that Go-vernment House last met. On the treaty of Villafranca contained that sagacious Irish project of a confederation of Italy under the presidency of the Pope. That plan had been brought forward on many occasions, and whether it was even now abandoned might almost seem doubtful. in these words: "To refute these rumours it suffices to remind the public of the acts and words of the Emperor before and after the treaty of Villafranca." On the 28th of September, Lord John Russell made his speech at Aberdeen, in which, if correctly reported, he laid down the proposition, which appeared to him (Mr. Griffith) of rather too broad a character, that subjects had a right to rise against their rulers, and also repeated his pledge that no interference would be permitted in Italy to contravene the wishes of the people of that country. The Constitutionnel of the 6th of October affirmed that "France offered advice, but would not dictate orders." On the 17th of October the treaty of Zurich was signed. A few days afterwards the Emperor of the French said at Bordeaux, that in his opinion "the temporal power of the Pope was not incompatible with the liberties and independence of Italy," an opinion which he had apparently since had occasion very considerably to modify. The Emperor added, "But French troops cannot remain indefinitely at Rome." On the 29th of October appeared the letter from the Emperor of the French to the King of Sardinia, in which a proposition was made whereby the fortresses of Peschiera and Mantua were to be federal fortresses, although he had never heard that Austria had assented to that arrangement. The Emperor went on to say, — "So far as the interests of France are not opposed to it, I shall be happy to serve the cause for which we have combated together." The Emperor thus acknowledged that the cause for which they had combated together might be adverse to the interests of France. On the 10th of November Prince Carignan was elected Regent. That election was peremptorily stopped by an order from Paris, and the Moniteur of the 12th of November set forth that the election of the Prince tended to prejudice the decision of the Congress. On the 16th, Buoncompagni was substituted malgré France. On the 29th of November the invitations to the Congress were sent out, which the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) thought it well for his own part not to refuse. He did not intend to question that decision. He was opposed upon principle to a Congress to settle the affairs of Italy, which ought to be allowed to work out her own freedom without being indebted to any other Power. When, however, the noble Lord was told that if he obstinately refused to give the Italians the benefit of his protest against interference the Congress would go on without him, the noble Lord perhaps had no resource but to accept the invitation; and if he had been in the noble Lord's situation he should, no doubt, have done the same thing. On the 13th of December, Rome and Naples gave in their adhesions to the Congress. On the 22nd of December appeared that most remarkable pamphlet, Le Pape et le Congrès, bearing all the marks of official inspiration, advocating the separation of the Provinces of the Legation from the Holy See, and enunciating principles very dissimilar to those contained in the Emperor's speech of the 11th of October. Immediately after that Count Cavour was appointed to represent Sardinia in the Congress; and on the 31st of December was published the letter of the Emperor to the Pope, which fully confirmed the supposition that the pamphlet on the Congress had expressed his views. The Pope did not hesitate to denounce the pamphlet as a "signal monument of hypocrisy and an ignoble tissue of contradictions." Count Walewski resigned, and the Congress was postponed. On the 17th of January the Pope refused to cede the Romagna, and on the same day Count Cavour had been reinstalled as the Minister of Sardinia. The policy of that statesman was notoriously at variance with that of the Holy See; all prospect was therefore at an end of establishing an Italian Confederation under the presidency of the Pope. To show the uncertainty that prevailed in the councils of the Emperor, he might mention that only the day before yesterday he had received deputations from the Marches and Umbria, and gave thereby his apparent adhesion to the policy of taking away other Provinces besides the Legations of the Romagna from the Holy See. With these facts before them, he thought that was sufficient justification for anxiety as to the intentions of the French Government, and he was confident the House would see how desirable it was that Italy should be relieved from the uncertainty of the last five or six months, and that the Emperor of the French, if really bent upon conducting himself as the Liberator of Italy, should carry out the principle of non-intervention and at once withdraw his troops from Italy. There would then be an end to the apprehensions which now prevailed that Leghorn was to be occupied by French troops, like Milan and Genoa, and that England, unwilling to resort to war, would find remonstrance ineffectual before the fact of actual possession.

APPEAL IN CRIMINAL CASES—QUESTION.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he would not detain the House many minutes, while he directed the attention of the right hon. Gentleman who was at the head of the Home Department to one or two facts connected with the case of Thomas Smethurst, who, it would be in the recollection of the House, was tried for and convicted of the crime of murder in the course of last year, and subsequently pardoned by the Crown. He was sure he need not apologise to the House for bringing it forward on account of the deep importance of the case, and the serious way in which it was calculated to affect the criminal jurisdiction of the country. In the few remarks he was about to make he begged to say that he had not the slightest desire to cast any imputation on the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary on account of the pardon which he had advised Her Majesty to grant to Thomas Smethurst, in which he believed the right hon. Gentleman was actuated not only by motives of humanity, but by those of the strictest and most impartial justice. But he wished the House to consider what would be the effect of this anomalous system of reversing a sentence, after a public trial, on private and ex parte evidence, which the public had no opportunity of knowing, and on which the verdicts of juries were reversed without the public or the jury knowing on what grounds they were reversed. If these proceedings were allowed to go on, and no public court of appeal were established, juries would become careless and indifferent as to the verdicts they gave, and the mode in which they discharged that most anxious duty of coming to a decision in trials for murder. For those simple reasons he wished to direct the attention of the Secretary of State to one or two facts which occurred after the trial of Thomas Smethurst. These facts were simple. On the 15th of August Thomas Smethurst was convicted of the crime of murder and sentenced to be executed. The trial was conducted before the Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer, one of the most humane Judges who ever adorned the bench, and from the range of his attainments singularly well qualified to deal with a case which depended very much upon a close scrutiny and careful analysis of the medical testimony. After the conviction, however, the attention of the country and of the press was directed to serious doubts that were raised as its propriety, and representations were made to the Secretary of State on the subject, the result of which was that, at his request, as he (Mr. James) collected from letters in the newspapers, a most able and elaborate report was drawn up by the Judge who presided at the trial, containing probably an expression of his opinion of the case. Various statements by other parties with regard to the case were made to the Home Secretary, and on the 15th of November there appeared in The Times a letter from the right hon. Baronet who held that office to the Chief Baron, which, he had authority to say, was not sent for publication by his Lordship. The letter of the Home Secretary was to the effect that the Chief Baron's report upon the trial, together with the whole of the medical evidence, had been referred to Sir Benjamin Brodie, who had given it as his opinion that, though the facts were full of grave suspicion against Smethurst, there was not absolute evidence of his guilt; but that his (the Home Secretary's) advice to Her Majesty to grant a free pardon to the convict did not arise from any defect in the constitution and procedure of the legal tribunals, but from the difficulty of ordinary citizens dealing with matters which puzzled the most experienced medical men. The jury who had given their anxious attention to the subject during the five days of the trial thus found their verdict set at nought; but though the evidence upon which the jury arrived at that decision had been fully published, neither the report of the Lord Chief Baron nor the report of Sir Benjamin Brodie had ever been revealed. In point of fact, the public had had no opportunity of judging of the medical testimony upon which the verdict of the jury had been reversed and the convict pardoned. In making these observations he was not blaming the Home Secretary, who, under the existing system, could hardly have done otherwise than he did; but he felt that the responsibility of acting under such circumstances was too great to be thrown on any single individual; and he hoped to prevail upon the right hon. Baronet to introduce some measure for the purpose of removing so great an anomaly. He was far from wishing to trench on the prerogatives of the Crown in the right of granting pardon. That prerogative might well consist with the existence of a criminal court of appeal, because there might still be good reason to preserve to the Crown the right of granting pardon on evidence which would not be admissible by a court of law, on a motion for a new trial. He thought the question was one well deserving the attention of the House and of the Government, and he would press it upon the Government that if they were not themselves prepared with any measure on the subject, they might at least accede to some rational and well-considered measure proposed by others for some court of appeal where pardons might be granted in such a way as would make patent to all the grounds on which the sentences were pronounced. In conclusion then he wished to ask, whether the Government contemplate the introduction of any Measure to give the Right of Appeal to persons convicted of capital and other crimes ?

OUTRAGES IN AMERICAN SHIPS ON THE HIGH SEAS.—QUESTION.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, his noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office would not be surprised at his rising to ask him what effect had been given to the Address presented by this House to Her Majesty in August last, in respect to the cruelties and murders committed with impunity on board American ships engaged in the traffic between the United States and this country. He would ask the House to allow him to state one or two additional facts which had occurred since this Address was presented. The picture, he regretted to say, had been considerably darkened since that time, and acts of gross and cruel murder had been added to the catalogue of crime. A few days after the Address was presented an American sailor, named Antonio, died in the Liverpool Hospital from the effects of the cruel treatment he had received. An inquest was held on the body, when a solicitor appeared on the part of the American Government, who denied altogether the jurisdiction of the court, and stated, not without considerable acuteness, that it was an American transaction, committed on board an American ship, and with which nobody but Americans had anything to do. If, he added, he had died on board, the case might have been one of murder or of manslaughter ; it would have been a case for American jurisdiction. But as he had died in Liverpool in consequence of injuries inflicted in the course of the voyage, the jury could find no other verdict but "Found dead," and that verdict was returned accordingly. There were other cases with which he would not trouble the House, but he must advert to the case which was probably fresh in all their recollections, as it occurred only on the 14th of the present month. Two American mates of the barque Anna were brought before the magistrates of the Isle of Wight on a charge of having done to death no less than six sailors in the course of a voyage between America and England ; for having put to death, under circumstances of great cruelty and violence, the half of the whole crew of the vessel. With the two men there appeared before the bench of magistrates a solicitor of the name of Stokes, who represented himself as an agent of the American Government, and who questioned the jurisdiction of the Bench. He claimed these men as American subjects, with whom the British magistrates had nothing to do ; that the murders which were alleged to have been committed were done on the high seas, the only death on which a question could arise having occurred more than a league from the British coast. The magistrates had been blamed, but he thought very unjustly, for discharging the prisoners ; but in point of fact they had no jurisdiction. It was wrong to say that the mates were guilty of the horrible crimes charged against them, but it was a very significant fact that a smile passed over their faces when the nonjurisdiction of the Court was established. Surely the state of the law required alteration, and he should be rejoiced to hear that in the considerable interval that had elapsed since the Address was presented her Majesty's Government had done something to remedy so great a scandal. There was no doubt that the impunity with which these grave crimes were committed were telling most detrimentally upon our own merchant service. In a case of great violence the other day it was given in evidence that the captain said, "How I regret I am under English law ! If I were under American law I could do anything I chose to my men." He hoped, therefore, that something had been done to remedy this state of things, which he was sure was felt to be a scandal, not only in this country, but still more by that great community across the Atlantic. The American Chamber of Commerce, he knew, had made strong representations to their countrymen at home on the subject. Great interest was felt upon the subject in America, and no doubt the American Government would co-operate with the English Government in trying to find a remedy for a grave and growing evil. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was not one likely to lack zeal in the cause of humanity. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department was no tyro in matters of international legislation, and between the two he trusted something would be accomplished. He therefore wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign affairs what measures have been adopted with regard to the Address presented to her Majesty on the 2nd of August, 1859, by that House, praying Her Majesty to enter into negotiations with the United States of America for the purpose of preventing the assaults and cruelties committed on merchant seamen in American vessels.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL:—With respect to the question put to me by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Darby Griffith), he will not, I think, expect me on this occasion to enter upon a discussion of the affairs of Italy. But with respect to the questions which he has asked, I will only say that I do not believe there is any truth in the statement which he has seen in a French newspaper, to the effect that 30,000 French troops are expected at Leghorn. I have certainly no reason to believe that the French Government has any intention of taking any such step for the purpose of preventing the annexation of the Provinces of Central Italy to Sardinia. On the contrary, I consider the statement is highly improbable. My hon. Friend (Mr. M. Milnes) has asked me a question upon a subject of great interest and importance, with regard to which he brought forward an Address last year, which was adopted by this House. When that Address was agreed to I immediately communicated with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and I believe it was his opinion that it would be of advantage if the negotiations were conducted in this country with some lawyer of experience from the United States. Accordingly, I wrote to Lord Lyons, and he received an answer that it was the opinion of the American Government that the negotiations could not be entrusted to better hands than those of the able and enlightened representative of the United States in this country, Mr. Dallas. My right hon. Friend has therefore had interviews with Mr. Dallas on the subject. They felt anxious, as every man in this House, and I have no doubt in America also, must feel, that some remedy ought to be found for a state of things so shocking, and that an attempt should be made to punish the authors of these acts of outrage and cruelty which take place on board American vessels. They were agreed as to the principle upon which that remedy should be applied, and there is now drawing up the draft of a convention with a view to carry their views into effect. I think it would be premature to enter into the details of that convention at the present moment; but when it is agreed to and ratified, as I trust it will be speedily, no time will be lost in bringing in a Bill to obtain the object which my hon. Friend has so properly advocated.

THE DIVORCE AND COMMON LAW COURTS.—QUESTION

MR. BOVILL said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose any alteration in the constitution of the Courts of Probate and Divorce? The subject was of importance, no so much to the legal profession as to the public at large. In the last Session of Parliament, in order to facilitate the operations of the Court, an Act was passed authorizing two Puisne Judges to make with the Judge Ordinary a full Court for Divorce, in substitution of the previous provision, which required the Judge Ordinary, a Chief Justice or Chief Baron, and one senior Puisne Judge to constitute a full Court. The consequence of the withdrawal of two Puisne Judges to sit frequently in the Divorce Court had been seriously felt, and the suitors in the Courts of common law had during the last term suffered great inconvenience. In the Court of Error, where there should be a large attendance of Judges to decide appeals from the Courts in which they were not Judges, there were very seldom more than five or six Judges; so that in the case of a division of opinion they might have had three Judges, or a majority, overruling the unanimous decision of five Judges in either of the three common law Courts. The inevitable result must be to increase the number of appeals to the House of Lords. But there was the further difficulty that, as the Court of Error was prevented from disposing of the business before it in December, and the Judges would be summoned to the House of Lords now that Parliament was sitting, it would take many months to clear off the arrears which had been created. Amongst other cases which were in consequence postponed, was the important case respecting the Shrewsbury estates. Unless some remedy were speedily applied arrears would increase, and the greatest inconvenience be caused. Considerable inconvenience also arose from the constant changes of Judges in the Divorce Court. It was not possible to have any settled practice, and two Judges coming fresh into the court might overrule the decisions of the Judge Ordinary, who sat there regularly. In consequence of the great increase of business in the common law Courts of late years the demands on the time of the Judges had greatly increased; and though it was immaterial to them where they sat, the interests of the public necessarily suffered. It was not for him to point out what was the proper remedy for the evil; but it was clear that the subject was one which called for the consideration of the Government, in order that they might effect some improvement in the existing system.

MR. BOWYER said, before the right hon. Gentleman announced the question he wished to make one or two observations on another great evil attending the Divorce Court. The operation of this Court had justified all the apprehensions expressed at the time of its creation. The reports of the proceedings were a standing scandal to the country. They polluted the columns of the newspapers to such an extent that it was really difficult to allow a newspaper to lie on the table in any decent house. If the principle on which the Court was formed were persevered in, and the business went on increasing at its present ratio, it would very shortly be necessary to give the County Court Judges power to grant divorces, a result which would be most deplorable in its effect on the morality of the country. But what he wished more particularly to direct the attention of the Government to was, the system of gross collusion which went on in that court. Proceedings were taken there which had been arranged beforehand, and the Judge had neither power nor machinery to prevent them. Unless some remedy were applied the court would become in a short time a sort of Encumbered Estates Court for the transfer of women. The name originally intended to be applied to it was the "Court of Marriage," but really a far more applicable title would be the "Court of Adultery." Some steps ought certainly to be taken for the prevention of this collusion.

In his opinion, the only way of meeting the evil was by the appointment of an officer with a competent staff, whose duties it would be to see that all suits were properly defended—to support the validity of marriages, and to prevent divorces being improperly granted. In every other country where there were courts for the dissolution or voiding of marriages there was an officer of the sort, whose duty it was to prevent collusion. Without some such official the Judge of the court might be made the instrument of doing much that was unjust and improper. His objections to the court and to divorces à vinculo matrimonii, which he considered contrary to the law of God, still continued unchanged; but if the court was to exist some steps ought to be taken to render it as little injurious to the morality of the country as its nature would permit.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: The House is no doubt aware that by the constitution of this Court a portion of the business is transacted by the Judge Ordinary alone, and for the other portion, the presence of two Judges from the common law Courts is necessary. On the establishment of the Court a new official was created—namely, the Judge Ordinary—but with regard to the associated Judges, reliance was had upon the attendance to be obtained from the Courts of common law. The business of that Court has been considerable—probably greater than was anticipated at the period of its formation, and demands have been made upon the common law Judges to a greater extent than is altogether consistent with the convenient despatch of business at certain times, more particularly when it is desired to form a Court of Error, where the presence of a number of Judges is necessary. To a certain extent, therefore, there is doubtless ground for the complaint made by the hon. and learned Member for Guildford. The matter has been under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor, but acting on his advice, the Government are not prepared to recommend an increase in the number of the common law Judges, or the appointment of a new Judge for the Divorce Court. They think that it may be practicable to enlarge the class of business to be disposed of by the Judge Ordinary alone, and to render unnecessary the presence of other Judges except in cases of peculiar difficulty and importance. With regard to what has fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer) respecting the expediency of enabling the Judge to exclude the public from the Court in certain cases, a noble Lord opposite (Lord John Manners) has given notice of his intention to introduce a Bill for this purpose, and it would therefore be prematurely taking up the time of the House in the miscellaneous Friday evening's debate to enter into the subject. I must decline, also, to enter into the general policy of the Divorce Act, unless some specific Motion be made on the subject. With regard to what fell from the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. M. Milnes), I hope it will be distinctly understood, both in the House and in the country, that the Courts of England have no jurisdiction in regard to offences committed in a foreign ship on the high seas, however grave that offence may be, or however excited may be the feelings of the people of this country when the persons who have committed the offence land here. Our tribunals are utterly powerless in such cases, and I do not believe there is a single case in which any criminal Court here can take cognizance of such offences—except the case of treason may be considered an exception. The only way, therefore, in which an English magistrate or policeman can deal with such offences is under an extradition treaty. We have such treaties only with France and the United States, and I am happy to be able to inform my hon. Friend and the House, that this very day I have signed an order under the extradition treaty for the delivery to the proper authorities of the two mates of the ship Anna, in order that they may be sent to the United States, to take their trials before the tribunal of the country, which alone has jurisdiction over them. Turning now to the question of the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. E. James), I will just remark that a Bill was the other day introduced into this House with reference to criminal appeals. I believe that Bill has not yet been circulated, but an early day has been fixed for its second reading. When it comes on for discussion, I shall be ready to express my opinion upon the whole subject. With regard to the particular case of Thomas Smethurst, the hon. and learned Member admits that he does not wish the prerogative of pardon to be abolished, but he speaks of the anomalous proceeding of pardoning a criminal without the knowledge of the jury who found him guilty, and upon a private and ex parte examination. The course which I followed in this case was precisely that which has been taken, time out of mind, I may say, by the Secretaries of State for the Home Department who have preceded me; therefore the term "anomalous" can only be applied with reference to some new system of practice which the hon. and learned Gentleman wishes to introduce. The course which I adopted was to call for the shorthand writer's notes of the trial, to hear everything which could be alleged on the part of the prisoner by his friends or legal advisers, and to refer all the papers which were brought before me to the learned Judge who tried the case, and it was not until the learned Chief Baron, after long consideration of the subject, made a very full report that I took any steps in the matter. In that report the Judge recommended that the matter should be referred to some eminent medical practitioner; and I accordingly placed his report in the hands of Sir Benjamin Brodie, whose eminence and fitness will, I think, be universally admitted. In a conversation which I had with him, in order to obtain his permission to the reference, he assured me that he had but a superficial knowledge of the subject, and had formed no opinion whatever with regard to the case; and therefore I believe that it would be impossible for me to find a more impartial referee. After full consideration, given, I can assure the House, with the utmost attention of which I was master, and after hearing an infinite variety of opinions from different persons, I came to the conclusion that the proper course for me to adopt was to advise the Crown to grant a free pardon; and I can only say that nothing which has occurred since I gave that advice has made me entertain any doubt as to its rectitude. I think it right to state that the Chief Baron expressed an opinion that the prisoner ought not to be executed, and he subsequently made the suggestion that Smethurst did not administer drugs to Miss Isabella Banks with a view of taking her life, but possibly with a view of procuring abortion. That was the hypothesis which a consideration of all the evidence had suggested to him, but it was a hypothesis wholly different from that which was adopted by the prosecution at the trial, or from that which was submitted by the Judge to the jury, and it is impossible for me to say whether, if that view of the evidence had been submitted to them, they would have found a verdict of guilty. I think the House will be of opinion that, consistently with the opinion of the learned Judge which was formed after the maturest consideration, this was not a case in which Her Majesty could have been advised to commute the capital sentence into one of penal servitude. The hon. and learned Gentleman succinctly stated the course which was taken with regard to the published letter; and I am glad that he does not propose to move for any document on that subject. I shall be ready to give, in general terms, any information which the House may desire, but, with reference to the Royal prerogative of mercy, I must be allowed to express my opinion that great inconvenience and great embarrassment would arise in the exercise of an extremely delicate and painful duty if confidential papers of this kind were called for.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR observed, with regard to the question which the right hon. Gentleman had previously answered, that he had lately seen an extract from The New York Times from which it appeared that during the last year there had been no less than forty-nine complaints by seamen against captains and officers brought in the American courts, and only in one instance had there been a conviction. The great majority of these cases had broken down for want of evidence. He begged to remind the House and the right hon. Gentleman that, by one of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, any captain of a vessel was competent to call upon the captain of another vessel to take on board a person accused of an offence of this description, and to carry him to a port where he might be tried, under a penalty of £50. He would suggest that, under the extradition treaty, this provision might be extended to American ships. It was a provision which might well be adopted by the American Legislature. At the same time he might add that the same Act contained provisions for taking the depositions of witnesses who could not attend at the place of trial.

PROBATE AND ADMINISTRATION (INDIA) BILL.

FIRST READING.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he rose to ask leave to introduce a Bill, which was very simple in its character, and consisted of three clauses, applicable to India. The first of these had reference to Indian Stock, of which a great amount was held in this country, and it had become a question whether, when the holders died, their legal representatives were not bound to take out probate in India as well as in England. Such a proceeding would, of course, be very inconvenient to the parties; and the object of the Bill was to declare that probate, if taken out in this country, should be deemed sufficient. A similar law had been passed some years ago with reference to Scotch and Irish railway stock falling into the hands of persons in this country, and great benefit had been experienced from that Act. The next provision of the Bill which he proposed was one by which the necessity of sending bonds to the India House to be examined and registered would be obviated. At present they were passed from hand to hand, and great inconvenience and delay were thus occasioned. Under the new method of transfer which it was intended to establish it was expected that the character of the stock would be improved. The provision would entail a small expense on the revenue of this country, but not more than £90. By the third clause he proposed to extend the powers taken by the Act of last Session to Indian Bonds; this would render them repayable in this country, if the payment were desired. The powers taken by the Act of last year had proved most successful.

MR. BAILLIE observed that the Law of Property and Trustees' Relief Act of last Session contained a clause empowering trustees to invest trust-money in India Stock, but when an application was made to the Lord Chancellor to give authority for trust-money to be so invested he declined to do so, upon the ground that the Act was passed just at the close of the Session, and that the clause was introduced at the last moment, contrary to the wish of the promoter of the Bill, who had expressed his intention to bring in a Bill this Session to repeal that clause. He wished to ask the right hon. Baronet whether the Government intended to have that clause repealed, because, as it appeared to him, such a clause looked very much like taking the first step towards making this country responsible for the Indian loan, which was very objectionable.

MR. CRAWFORD asked, whether the effect of the Bill proposed by the right hon. Secretary for India would be that parties could take out probate of wills either in this country or in India?

MR. MALINS said, he wished to correct a mistake into which his hon. Friend (Mr. Baillie) had fallen. No Lord Chancellor would have refused to administer the law according to an Act of Parliament because it happened to have been passed at the close of the Session. In the case referred to nothing more was decided than that the stock, authority to purchase which was applied for, did not fall within the definition contained in the clause in the Trustees Relief Act. He hoped the Government would be very cautious how it pledged itself to repeal the provisions of the Act; he believed it a wise one. It was the duty of trustees to manage the affairs of their wards, as prudent men manage their own; and he could not imagine anything more absurd than a law compelling men who were continually investing their own money in Indian Stock to buy any trust money into the Three-and-a-half per Cents. As to the power given by the Trustees Relief Act being the first step towards obliging this country to adopt the liabilities of India, he could not see what connection it had with them. Indian Stock was secured on Indian revenue alone, and if that failed parties purchasing such securities would only have their own want of foresight to blame; but that they could consider the revenue of this country bound to make up any loss he could not understand.

MR. GREGSON said, he wished to know why the powers of the Bill proposed by the Secretary for India were extended to some kinds of Indian securities and not to others. Why, for instance, were they not extended to the Rupee Loan?

MR. AYRTON said, the object of the Bill, as he understood it, was a very necessary and simple one. The Government of India issued promissory notes, which constituted the public debt there. The interest of those notes was formerly payable in some part of India, but within the last year it had been made payable in this country, so that in one sense the property was Indian, and in another it was English. In order to get rid of that anomaly the right hon. Gentleman (Sir C. Wood) proposed to make notes, so circumstanced, subject to probate in England. There could be no reasonable objection to that, and he (Mr. Ayrton) thought the Bill would prove a very useful one.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he considered it of great importance that no misapprehension should be permitted to exist as to the nature of the securities in Indian loans, which were not of the same nature as Indian Stock. From the fact that the machinery of the Bank of England was used in regard to both, great misapprehension had arisen in the public mind as to the nature of the securities. It would be a great misfortune if Parliament had not made up its mind whether it would or not give a material guarantee in regard to the securities for the Indian loan—that a misapprehension should exist. He did not wish to express a premature opinion upon the Bill, but he certainly thought that, with respect to the Act of last Session, the nature and value of the securities should be clearly defined.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he apprehended there could not be the slightest question as to the construction of the Act of last year. The Lord Chancellor had held that the recently created Indian Stock did not come under the same denomination as the original Indian Stock. He decided that the expression used in the Act of last Session, applied to the old Stock of the East India Company, and not to Indian loans. The Government had no intention at present of interfering with that Act. The sole object of the Bill he (Sir C. Wood) now proposed was to relieve the executors or trustees of the holders of East India Stock from the necessity of taking out probate in India.

Leave given.

Bill to regulate Probate and Administration with respect to certain Indian Government Securities; to repeal certain Stamp Duties; and to extend the operation of the Act of the twenty-second and twenty-third years of Victoria, chapter thirty-nine, to Indian Bonds, ordered to be brought in by Sir CHARLES WOOD and Mr. Baring.

Bill presented and read 1^o.

HIGHWAYS.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill for the better management of Highways in England. The House was aware that highways, according to legal phraseology, meant roads which were not included in Turnpike Acts, and which still remained as parish roads. In order to show that the Bill he asked to introduce dealt with an interest of great magnitude, he would state the amount of money raised and expended in England in the maintenance of those roads. The House was aware that those roads were chiefly maintained by a highway rate, which was levied substantially on the same class of property as the poor rate, aided by some other slight sources of revenue. The expenditure was divided, on the one hand into highways in rural parishes, and on the other to highways in the nature of streets in towns. In 1850 the expenditure on the ordinary highways amounted to £1,026,000, and on streets in towns, under local Acts, to £828,000, making a total of £1,854,000. In 1857, the last year for which there was a return, the expenditure on the ordinary highways amounted to £1,148,000, and on streets in towns to £970,000, making a total of £2,118,000, which was more than £200,000 greater than that of 1850. It was, therefore, not only a large, but a growing expenditure. The Bill he asked to introduce was substantially, with one exception, identical with that introduced by the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Hardy) when he held the office of Under Secretary for the Home Department. That Bill itself was not only framed in a great measure on the model of previous Bills which had been submitted to the House, but it appeared to him (Sir George Lewis) to be arranged in a very convenient form, and to be expressed in unambiguous terms, and he had, therefore, taken it as the model of the one he now sought to introduce. Under the operation of the existing general Highway Act, the justices of quarter sessions had the bare option of uniting together a certain number of parishes into a district for the maintenance of highways and the appointment of a paid surveyor, and might, if they thought proper, make an order to that effect. The power thus possessed was, however, one to which they scarcely ever had recourse, inasmuch as their action depended in the first instance on the decision of a single parish. The system had, in consequence, been found to be for the most part inoperative, and his noble Friend the Member for Pembrokeshire (Lord Emllyn), in order to remedy the defects of that system, had a few years ago introduced into Parliament a Bill the object of which was the compulsory establishment of a series of districts for the maintenance of highways in the six counties of South Wales. That Bill had become law, had been in operation for some time, and he (Sir George Lewis), being a resident in one of the counties to which it applied, could bear testimony to the satisfactory manner in which it worked. It had, in fact, brought about a most efficient repair of the highways in those counties without, at the same time, creating any increase of expenditure which could afford reasonable grounds of complaint to a class of ratepayers who were on the average considerably less wealthy than the majority of those who were resident in England. The principle, then, he might briefly state, upon which the Bill which he held in his hand was framed was, that the magistrates of quarter sessions should be empowered to divide counties into districts of parishes for the repair of highways; that they should form districts and appoint the number of way-wardens which each should return; that the board of way-wardens should be elected by the ratepayers in a manner similar to that in which the Poor Law Boards were constituted, and that the resident magistrates of the district should be entitled to have a seat at those boards. He might add, that when the Court of Quarter Sessions should have made the order to which he had alluded they should be considered as functi officio, and neither possess nor exercise any further interference in the matter. Local Boards having been called into existence in the way which he had described would have the power of appointing paid surveyors, and selecting the other officers whose services would be required. The machinery by which their proceedings would be directed would be of a most simple character—quite analogous, in short, to that which had been in operation for some years for the relief of the poor. There was every reason to hope, therefore, that it would work in an efficient and satisfactory manner. With respect to boroughs, he proposed that the town-council should have the same powers as he would confer upon the magistrates at quarter sessions in counties. Such was an outline of the Bill which he was about to ask the House for leave to introduce; but before he sat down he might observe that it differed in one material particular from the Bill which had been brought in last Session upon the same subject, and which he trusted would facilitate its adoption in the present Session. The House could not fail to observe that the construction of railways had to so great an extent altered the comparative importance of former lines of communication throughout the country, that some of the main lines of turnpike roads had sunk into a position of inferiority in that respect to some of the parish roads. Now, it happened that there was no law in existence which provided for the due repair of those great highways, and considerable inconvenience was in consequence experienced in different parts of the kingdom. That inconvenience would, he believed, be removed by means of the machinery which the present Bill would bring into operation; but while he was of that opinion, he was, nevertheless, alive to the fact that there were certain counties in which a strong opposition to the passing of any such measure was manifested. To the want of unanimity which prevailed upon the subject was, indeed, to be attributed the obstacles to the success of any legislation with regard to it with which it was surrounded. What he proposed, therefore, to do—departing in that respect from the Bill of last Session—was to make it optional with the magistrates of each county whether or not they would set the machinery which he had provided in motion in that county. He proposed, in short, that the justices of quarter sessions should, in the first instance, be enabled to make a provisional order; that the consideration of that order should be postponed until the following quarter sessions; that if it were then confirmed it should be taken to be a compulsory order, but that its sanction should be the voluntary act of the magistrates and the town-council. If, then, the inhabitants of any part of the country desired to avail themselves of the provisions of the Bill they might do so without difficulty, while, upon the contrary, the machinery which it provided would not as a matter of course be brought into action in those counties where there was an objection to its introduction. Having made these observations it simply remained for him to express a hope that the scheme which he had shadowed out would meet with the sanction of the House, and to move for leave to introduce a Bill for the better management of Highways in England.

MR. BRIGHT said, that a Bill similar to that which the right hon. Gentleman asked for leave to introduce had, Session after Session, been brought forward in that House, and yet that no Minister had ever informed the House what was the real reason of its introduction, or who it was by whom such a measure was required. He had, indeed, been told that the predecessor in office of the right hon. Gentleman had been under some pledge to certain Gentlemen to bring in such a Bill, but that not having remained long enough on the Treasury Bench to redeem that pledge he had left the promised measure in some pigeon-hole and had entered into an engagement with his successor to proceed with it. Now, whether that statement was strictly accurate or not he (Mr. Bright) could not say, but he could assert with perfect truth that he had never seen a petition in favour of such a Bill, nor heard outside the walls of that House a single human being complain that he was aggrieved by the system by which highways were at present regulated, or that he wished to see a departure from that system. The right hon. Gentleman had begun his speech by dwelling upon the magnitude of the interest concerned in this question, and he had pointed out that a sum amounting to more than £1,000,000 per annum was expended upon the highways not connected with towns, while upon those which were so situated not less than £800,000 was annually laid out. The right hon. Gentleman had, however, drawn no inference from these facts, and he had not endeavoured to argue that in the expenditure thus incurred any waste of money was involved. The fact indeed was, as the right hon. Gentleman must be aware, that in the various towns in which the outlay which he had mentioned took place there existed the most perfect system of local government which could be devised, while in the case of parishes unconnected with towns the whole management of their highways was vested in the individual occupiers, who appointed annual officers, by whom the £1,000,000 in question was expended. It was under those circumstances but natural that there should be no petitions laid before that House in favour of the Bill. Speaking generally, indeed, and leaving out of the question a few individuals who might be possessed by some crotchet on the subject, he believed no single ratepayer throughout the kingdom had asked the right hon. Gentleman to make any such proposal as he had that evening submitted to their notice. As for himself, he had in a former Session protested against the introduction from a Government office of any such scheme tending to disturb ancient arrangements. He had repeatedly protested against such a disturbance of ancient arrangements in a case in which no single individual asked for the change; and he should unhesitatingly assert, without fear of contradiction, that there existed in any part of the country no demand for the present Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had informed the House that under the operation of the law as it stood there existed a power to unite parishes for the purpose of providing for the repair of highways, and had adduced that fact in support of his Motion, although he was obliged to admit that so little desire had been evinced on behalf of the inhabitants of the country to avail themselves of the power which they possessed, that the law was totally inoperative. Now, he (Mr. Bright) was aware that he would not be taking a proper course in that House in describing the Gentlemen who presided at quarter sessions in unfavourable colours, and he should refrain from adopting that course, because he did not think it was altogether justifiable, or that they deserve to be so depicted, but he might at the same time be allowed to observe that those gentlemen were not the persons in whom the ratepayers in counties had the greatest confidence. They were appointed by somebody who was appointed by the Crown; the fact being that their appointment lay, in the county in which he lived, in the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and that in his neighbourhood a whole batch of them had, for political reasons, been nominated to the offices which they held. Every owner of land, in short, to the extent of 1,000 acres, was generally appointed a county magistrate, and those were the gentlemen to whom the right hon. Gentleman proposed to give the power of making all the parochial arrangements for the repair of highways upon a principle analagous to that which prevailed in the case of the Poor Law Boards for the purpose of doing that which nobody asked for, and remedying grievances of which nobody complained. What was the state of things at the present moment? In some of the unions in England the magistrates formed an equal number with the elected guardians. In the parish where he lived there was, he believed, a majority of one, but on what side he did not know. If, however, they put into any Board a close body like the magistrates, who were not elected by the ratepayers, and only an equal number who were elected by the ratepayers, the principle of election and representation in that Board would be virtually destroyed, and that system would be put an end to which had existed for centuries without complaint and without any reasons being assigned for the change. All the right hon. Gentleman said was that some one had brought in a somewhat similar Bill for South Wales, and there had been no complaint; it had not been productive of greater expense or a worse administration. But that was not enough; some stronger reason should have been given. He ought to have shown that it had given a better administration, and at less expense. Who asked for this change? It was just this, neither more nor less—the transference of a power which had existed for many generations in the hands of the ratepayers of parishes to take care of the repair of their highways to a body of magistrates not appointed by the ratepayers, and in no way responsible to them. That was a direct contradiction of every principle which the House ought to hold dear in legislating on matters of that kind. Then the right hon. Gentleman said he was going to make it a much better Bill than that of the hon. Gentleman opposite, by making it optional—not optional with the ratepayers, or the population of the parishes who have the greatest interest in the maintenance of the highways and the expenditure of the money, but optional with the gentlemen of the quarter sessions: it was to be optional with them whether they would take more power than they had hitherto enjoyed, of diverting, changing, repairing, or letting go out of repair the highways of their parish, just as it might best suit them, and it was precisely for qualifications of that kind that this Bill seemed intended to provide. He appealed to Gentlemen opposite, who were loth to make changes that were not asked. Now that the highways were better maintained than ever why should they this Session, when they had so much before them, be troubled with a measure so offensive and unnecessary, so needlessly innovating as this? He did not think the right hon. Gentleman had the smallest affection for the measure; indeed, he could very well suppose, when he found it consigned to his care by his predecessor in the Home Office, language must have trembled on his lips—though he might not have uttered it—excessively uncomplimentary both to the Bill and to the person who drew it. Why, in the name of common sense, bring forward this Bill again? Let the right hon. Gentleman for one Session free them from its consideration. Some such measure seemed by a kind of fatality to be brought forward year after year, and having undergone almost endless discussion was in the end rejected. But its life could not seemingly be destroyed, and it was revived the next Session. The right hon. Gentleman, he had no doubt, would have occasion to be glad if the Bill were rejected; and, although he did not like to object to the first reading—that would be considered not very courteous to the right hon. Gentleman and the Government—he would unite with any Gentleman opposite in opposing the Bill on a future occasion.

Mr. SLANEY said, he thought the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) had unnecessarily cast some degree of condemnation on magistrates at quarter session and had misunderstood the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. His proposal was not that the magistrates should assume the powers described, but that the way-wardens elected by the parish should be the Board to manage, entirely separate from the magistrates, except that in the first instance the quarter sessions were to scheme out and fix the different districts. There would still be the way-wardens elected by the different parishes, to look after the expenditure and say if the improvements proposed were necessary. The hon. Gentleman must allow him to say that he did not understand the management of the roads in the country, though he might be well conversant with matters relating to towns. For the most part, the separate parishes now had, instead of a surveyor, a person who was changed every year, generally a farmer ignorant of the mode in which roads should be made; in very many instances he was changed just as he became acquainted with the duty, and the consequence was the roads were neglected, ways, it was of the utmost advantage to have roads made as feeders to the railways at important stations, and, as these went through parishes having in some instances eight or ten townships, each township with a separate surveyor of roads, it was of the greatest consequence that they should have a larger area and properly qualified surveyors.

Mr. HARDY said, that he could not help noticing the imputations which had been thrown by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) on those who had charge of Highway Bills as having some concealed motive,—some occult desire, in taking them out of the pigeon-holes at the Home Office, to gain some advantage for themselves. For himself, he begged entirely to disown such an intention. The hon. Member for Birmingham stood forth in a new character to-night. Who could have expected to see him appealing to them stare super vias antiquas? He only hoped, when the Bills came to be discussed which the hon. Member had alluded to, and to which he wished this measure should give way, he would still appear standing on the old paths. It was not for him to defend the gentlemen at quarter sessions. He would only observe that the duties committed to magistrates by this Bill were simply of an administrative character, and did not destroy the power of the rate-payers. The hon. Gentleman, who had spoken from his knowledge of the towns in Lancashire, must be well aware, that in a great number of instances where the roads were well attended to, the duty was not performed by parish surveyors appointed year by year, but by Boards elected by the ratepayers, having paid surveyors under them. In this way repairs were carried out efficiently; but when the hon. Gentleman told them that the highways of the country were repaired efficiently, economically, and in consonance with the wishes of the ratepayers who used them, he told them what no man in the House who knew the facts could bring himself to believe. This was not a Bill that was likely to cause any great outcry pro or con in the country; but the Members of the House generally knew the opinions of those who lived in their neighbourhood were in favour of such a measure. When he was in office he brought in the Bill to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred, and since that time he had been constantly asked by people in the country whether nothing was to be done for the better management of the highways. Those who really used the roads were most anxious for a change, and he believed that the farmers themselves were of the same way of thinking. In the districts where a system of management by Boards such as those provided for in this Bill was acted upon, the rates had been reduced and better roads formed, roads being made for the public advantage, and not for the benefit only of the surveyor. He had an objection to the alteration in the Bill proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, because he thought the House,—if in a position to give an opinion that the country ought to be divided into districts for the maintenance of roads,—ought to dictate to the quarter sessions, and not leave the quarter sessions to dictate to others. He would give the quarter sessions a merely ministerial duty to do, and so leave the matter as it stood in the former Bill. If the hon. Member for Birmingham looked into the subject, he would find that there were small parishes burdened with forty miles of roads. Those small parishes would be greatly benefited by being associated with others, as they would thus be enabled to stop up a great many unnecessary roads. The hon. Member for Birmingham spoke of this Bill having been taken out of a pigeon-hole in the Home Office. There was no one who had a better right to take the Bill out of a pigeon-hole than the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Lewis), as in 1849 he was the first to take the subject into consideration. If he now pressed the Bill firmly on the House he believed the House would go cordially with him, and that the result would be a better and more effective administration of our highways.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, although seated on the Opposition side, he was in respect of the present Bill a reformer, and nothing had surprised him more since his entrance into this House as the strong terms of Conservatism he had just heard from the lips of an hon. Member who was supposed to be the essence of Reform. He believed that the ratepayers in the counties had confidence in the magistrates who act in quarter sessions, though it is possible there may be a different feeling among the ratepayers in borough towns. There is no Bill of this Session which, if it passes into a law, is likely to be of more benefit to the agricultural population, and the agriculturists ought to be much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for bringing it in. Hon. Members cannot be aware of the state of the roads in his neighbourhood, and it is to be feared if they travelled over them, they would both lose their tempers and break their carriages. The hon. Member for Birmingham said the ratepayers were anxious to appoint their own surveyors, but that was against his experience, for out of nearly fifty surveyors in his district, not above five were elected by the parishioners, the rest being appointed by the magistrates. He cordially trusted that this Bill would be carried.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS, in reply, said he was always reluctant to treat a debate on the introduction of a Bill as if it were a debate on the second reading. The hon. Member for Birmingham had in his speech subjected him to this inconvenience, and had made it necessary that he should answer arguments applied to the principle of the Bill, when the Bill itself was not before the House, and hon. Members were consequently not in a position to judge whether the objections were valid. He would, however, confine his remarks within the narrowest possible space, reserving much that he had to say for the second reading. His hon. Friend had raised a sort of constitutional objection to the Bill, and argued that it was an unnecessary deviation from ancient customs and institutions, and, if not a dangerous, at all events a vexatious and uncalled-for innovation. He was afraid that his hon. Friend's constitutional studies in this branch of our laws had been somewhat limited. If he had looked into the nature of the Turnpike Acts passed since the middle of the last century, which abolished the ancient constitution of highways, he would have found that the very essence of the turnpike system was that it repealed the old laws with respect to highways, abolished the rights of ratepayers, and placed the management of highways under certain trustees, not appointed by popular election, but designated in the Acts of Parliament, being generally magistrates resident in the district. All the important roads of the country were placed under local Turnpike Acts, and, with regard to all the main lines of communication, the old constitutional system of highways was entirely repealed. And what he (Sir George Lewis) asked to introduce now was a system not less popular, but more popular than that which now existed. Nothing could be more accurate than the statement of the hon. Member for Shropshire (Sir B.

Leighton) that the surveyors of highways were practically appointed by the magistrates, and that the ratepayers did not exercise their functions in that respect. He proposed to constitute a Board formed of elected representatives from the parishes comprising the district, together with the resident magistrates of the district. The constitution of Boards of Guardians had been found to work in a satisfactory manner with a mixture of nominated and elected guardians; but if the hon. Member thought the magistrates should be omitted from the Highway Boards which he proposed, that was a question which he could raise in Committee. He maintained, then, that there was nothing in the Bill that sinned against the popular principle. But his hon. Friend said that there was no practical grievance. It was certainly true that the table was not covered with petitions on the point, but he (Sir George Lewis) could appeal with confidence to the experience of any person who lived in the country, and ask whether the present mode of repairing the highways was not in the highest degree unsatisfactory. Where a line of road passed through different parishes, and had different surveyors, there was great inconvenience experienced in keeping it in proper repair. The surveyor was usually a farmer, unskilled in road making, and very frequently it was found that the surveyor took special care of the roads near his own house to the neglect of those at a distance. This was not the popular system that his hon. Friend's imagination had conjured up, for a more imperfect, rude, and unsatisfactory mode of administration than was exhibited in the management of highways it was almost impossible to find. That was a practical grievance, and the remedy provided by the present Bill was wholly unobjectionable. If he had proposed to intrust the operation of the measure to certain Commissioners in London, or to the Secretary of State, he would have been told that he wished to introduce a system of centralization, to which many objections would be taken. He proposed, on the contrary, to make the Bill local in its operation, and to intrust it to the county magistrates who had no interests hostile to those of the ratepayers, and who were, in fact, interested in the economical management of the rate, since the highway rates were practically a deduction from their rents. The hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Hardy) said, it would have been better to adhere to the Bill he introduced, and not to make the adoption of the Bill optional with the magistrates of the county. If the House chose to make this alteration in the measure, he had no objection. He should himself prefer a compulsory Bill; but he feared it might be found very difficult to pass such a Bill, and he thought it would facilitate the passing of any measure if its adoption were left optional with the magistrates. It was true, as the hon. Member (Mr. Hardy) had remarked, that he had proposed a Bill on this subject many years ago. He believed that the Bill was founded on a sound principle, that it would produce a more efficient repair of the highways, at less cost than at present, and he trusted that the House would give its assent to the measure now brought forward.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATION MORTGAGES, &c.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to make further provision concerning Mortgages and other dispositions of Property belonging to Municipal Corporations in England and Ireland, said that at present under the Municipal Act, a Municipal Corporation could not mortgage its property without the consent of the Treasury, which had no power to require a sinking fund to be set aside, or to make arrangements for the intermediate investment of the money and other matters. It would be for the convenience of the public and the advantage of Municipal Corporations that the powers granted by the present Bill should be conferred upon the Treasury, which was at present compelled to resort to circuitous and troublesome contrivances to effect its object. The Bill was not likely to meet with objection, and its details could only be understood when it was before the House.

Leave given.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir GEORGE LEWIS and Mr. CLIVE.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Monday, January 30, 1860,*MINUTES.] Sat First in Parliament.—The Earl of Minto—after the Death of his Father.PUBLIC BILLS.—1^a Criminal Statutes Repeal; Accessories and Abettors; Malicious Injuries to Property; Coinage Offences; Forgery; Larceny, &c.; Offences against the Person.2^a Law of Property.

CONSOLIDATION OF STATUTE AND CRIMINAL LAW.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR presented several Bills having for their object the consolidation of the statute and criminal law, and said that, as he had had little share in preparing the measures, he might say without scruple that he could strongly recommend them to their Lordships' favourable regard and consideration. So long ago as 1833, a Commission was appointed with the view of codifying the criminal law; and he joined in the hope that such a proposal was practicable, although he never thought that the whole law could be so codified. The Commissioners were most assiduous in the performance of their duties, and in successive years presented eight Reports, which embraced the whole of the criminal law of England. Before the result of their labours could be presented to Parliament, however, it was thought advisable to have a Commission of revision. Such a Commission, composed of learned men, did sit accordingly, and presented five Reports; and the sanguine hope was entertained that what they recommended might be reduced into Bills and become law. One or two Bills were, therefore, prepared under the superintendence of his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) during the time he held the Great Seal, and were introduced by him into this House. One respected the law of offences against the person, and was read a second time, and referred to a Select Committee. He (the Lord Chancellor) had then the honour of being Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, and attended the meetings of the Committee, which sat eleven days; but at the end of that time it found that it could not agree upon a definition of the crime of murder—a result that was certainly very discouraging. His noble and learned Friend who succeeded to the Great Seal (Lord Cranworth) consulted the Judges on the general subject; but their opinions were by no means auspicious. If it were, then, impossible to codify one law so as to have the whole common and statute law put together in the same way as the Code Napoleon it would, of course, be a great matter to consolidate the statute law. The Statute Law Commission was accordingly appointed, and had been most zealous in performing their duties. Bills had been prepared with that object, and had been submitted to, and had received the approval of Lord Chief Justice Jervis, Mr. Baron Parke, now Lord Wensleydale, and other most learned men; but various circumstances intervened to prevent their passing into law. The last attempt that was made towards consolidating the law was to assimilate the law of Ireland and the law of England, when Mr. Whiteside, for whom he (the Lord Chancellor) entertained the most sincere respect, not only as a great orator, but a very learned lawyer, laid upon the table of the House of Commons some Bills for that especial purpose. But before those Bills could be considered, a dissolution of Parliament took place. The object of consolidating the statute law, and assimilating in all respects the criminal law of Ireland with the criminal law of England, was a most laudable one; and he thought all their Lordships would agree that it was capable of accomplishment. During the last vacation the law officers in each country had been most assiduous in devoting themselves to the question, and he believed that it was now in a shape fit for legislation. He had not read every line in the Bills himself, but he had spent much time in examining them along with the gentlemen employed to prepare them, and he really believed that in their present state they would meet with the approbation of both Houses of Parliament. To show their Lordships the difference which existed between the criminal law in Ireland and in England he might mention that, by the law in Ireland, conspiracy to murder was a capital felony, whilst in England it was only a misdemeanour. He thought, then, that the time had arrived when such anomalies ought to be swept away, and the law made uniform in all parts of the kingdom. If their Lordships would give the Bills a first and second reading, he would then move that they be referred to a Select Committee.

His Lordship then presented the following Bills:—

A Bill to repeal certain Enactments which have been consolidated in several Acts of the present Session relating to indictable Offences and other Matters (Criminal Statutes Repeal Bill.)

"A Bill to consolidate and amend the Statute Law of England and Ireland relating to Accessories to and Abettors of indictable Offences. (Accessories and Abettors Bill.)"

"A Bill to consolidate and amend the Statute Law of England and Ireland relating to malicious Injuries to Property. (Malicious Injuries to Property Bill.)"

"A Bill to consolidate and amend the Statute Law of the United Kingdom against Offences relating to the Coin. (Coinage Offences Bill.)"

"A Bill to consolidate and amend the Statute Law of England and Ireland relating to indictable Offences by Forgery. (Forgery Bill.)"

"A Bill to consolidate and amend the Statute Law of England and Ireland relating to Larceny and other similar Offences. (Larceny, &c. Bill.)"

"A Bill to consolidate and amend the Statute Law of England and Ireland relating to Offences against the Person. (Offences against the Person Bill.)"

LORD CRANWORTH sincerely rejoiced at the course which his noble and learned Friend had taken with regard to the assimilation of the Irish statute law with that of England. His noble and learned Friend would do him the justice to recollect that a large portion of that was done when he (Lord Cranworth) had the honour to hold the Great Seal. He would express no opinion with respect to the present Bills, but he did hope that this attempt to assimilate the Irish and English law might not give rise to such discussions in Parliament as would lead to the rejection of the Bill altogether.

The said Bills were then severally read 1^a.

ST. GEORGES'S-IN-THE-EAST.

QUESTION.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON wished to put a question to the noble Earl (Earl Granville) with regard to any orders which might have been given by the Government for the preservation of the peace in the parish church of St. George's-in-the-East. His attention had that day been drawn to the fact of a serious riot, threatening danger to property, having taken place in that church last evening; and it must be obvious that all persons who are so much disturbingly aware of the duty of the Government to justice, and the things continuing for the clergy, authorities generally, their part:—for we had been vainly impossible to make any change in the services, even those which were desirable, because, of course, it was not desirable that that which was right in itself should be conceded to violence and to riotous, disorderly clamour. He was bound to say that as the matter then stood nothing could be more unsatisfactory. Some changes had been introduced into the manner of performing service at that church, but they had not as yet met the wishes of the people, who had chosen the present mode of expressing their disapproval of the manner in which the services were performed. It was impossible that anything further could be done while these disorders and riots disgraced the parish night after night. It would be satisfactory, therefore, if the noble Earl could state that the police had received orders to put a stop to these disorderly proceedings. He was bound to say that nothing could exceed the kindness and courtesy with which the authorities at the Home Office had gone into the matter hitherto. Steps had been taken, which it was hoped would have put an end to these disgraceful scenes; but after a time the Home Secretary communicated to him that it was not thought expedient that the presence of the police in a parish church should be continued. It seemed, however, that the right hon. Gentleman's anticipations of peace had not been realized; and it would be satisfactory to know, therefore, what steps he now proposed to take in the matter. He believed that an idea existed that it would be easy to put a stop to these disturbances by refusing admission to any but parishioners into the parish church; but it was very doubtful whether that would be a legal course. He was afraid, also, that if none but parishioners were admitted, many persons would be excluded who were at present desirous of preserving order there; and from all that he could gather many of those who had caused disturbance were themselves residents in the immediate locality of the church. He did not wish to express any opinion as to the original cause of these discontents. That seemed to him to have nothing to do with the present question. The question was simply this—whether disturbances could be allowed to take place in a parish church which would not be tolerated in any other place of worship in the kingdom; and he now earnestly put it to the noble Earl to consider carefully whether such steps could not be taken as would quell those riots for the future. The experience of past times taught that these things were contagious, and the foolish zeal of uninstructed persons, if unrestrained, might lead to the destruction of property, and to the greatest injury not only to religion but even to the civil welfare of society.

EARL GRANVILLE: I am not surprised that the right rev. Prelate should address me a question upon a subject so interesting to him and to the public. Your Lordships will all agree that the events which have occurred in this church are a very great scandal. As far as my opinion goes, I must say that I think that the present state of things is not creditable to any of the parties concerned. I am, however, hardly in a position to give an exact answer to the right rev. Prelate, as I have not yet seen the police report of these occurrences made to the Home Office, and only know the facts as they are stated in the morning papers. It may, however, be satisfactory if I state what has been the course of the Government up to the present time in relation to these matters. When these disturbances first occurred, there was a difficulty in ascertaining the law by which magistrates could punish offenders in such cases, and it was found that the only Act giving such power was one of Philip and Mary, respecting which a question arose whether it applied to Protestant churches, it having been originally passed with a view to Catholic churches. It was held that the law applied in the present instance; but there were still difficulties in carrying it into effect. Several parties were brought before the magistrates upon summons; but in a short time the disturbances rose to such a pitch, that a large body of police were ordered to occupy the church; and that state of things lasted for several Sundays. At the end of the year, it having been represented to the Home Secretary that great inconvenience had been experienced from having so large a number of police engaged in that special duty—and it is obvious that it is impossible to maintain as a permanent institution and establishment a large number of policemen in a church for the suppression of such disturbances—and they were accordingly withdrawn. It was thought that during that time there had been ample opportunity for the clergy to make such alterations in the service as would meet the wishes of the congregation, and, on the other hand, for the congregation to cool down in their feelings towards the clergy. Yesterday's proceedings, however, show that that has not been the case. But although the police were not in the church on that occasion, there was a sufficient force in the neighbourhood to clear the church, and to maintain the public peace, and it was by their intervention that the disturbance yesterday was quelled. I am not able to state what particular steps will be taken in future, but I fully admit that it is the bounden duty of the police to preserve the public peace in that parish as elsewhere.

CHURCH RATES.—PETITION.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, he had to present to their Lordships a petition of a very important character indeed. It had originated at a very large meeting of the clergy and laity of the rural deanery of Wrexham, in the diocese of St. Asaph, which was presided over by the Archdeacon. In that diocese an association had been formed of clergy and laity for the protection, as far as in them lay, of the interests of the Established Church, and for endeavouring to secure that, whatever changes were effected, the Established Church should still remain in its full efficiency and purity. The petitioners suggested that the fact that some hundreds of parishes had refused to pay church rates was no plea whatever for their entire abolition, when so many thousands of parishes did not object to pay them. They stated that they did not propose anything in the nature of a compromise; because it was not a compromise but utter abolition, and the entire overthrow of the Established Church, that the enemies of church rates required. They also suggested for their Lordships' consideration some very important points which they conceived would tend greatly to remove the existing grounds of contention and complaint. They suggested that it would be necessary to have pointed out what was considered indispensable for the performance of Divine service, and properly chargeable to the church rate. Also, that the law relating to district parishes should be amended. There was much to complain of in this respect. The inhabitants of such parishes not only paid for their district church, but were required also to pay rates for the parish church, which they never frequented; and this called for a legislative remedy. The petitioners suggested further that easy means should be provided for compelling payment of a rate lawfully made. Therefore he felt it to be his duty, not simply to present a petition of this kind, which loudly called for consideration, but to do it that justice which the importance of the subject commanded. The noble Viscount then presented a Petition of Clergy and Lay Consultees of Wrexham against the Abolition of Church Rates.

Petition read; and ordered to lie on the table.

CHURCH-RATES.—SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, it would be remembered that a Committee of their Lordships' House was appointed last Session to inquire into the operation of the law and practice respecting the assessment and the levy of church rates. On closing their labours last year the Committee recommended that they should be re-appointed, in order to complete the evidence which was forthcoming on the subject. It would be improper for him at present to enter upon any of the subjects there touched upon; but the evidence was of so important a character as fully to justify the re-appointment of the Committee. In submitting a Motion to that effect it was not his wish that the Committee should prolong its labours to an indefinite time, so as to interfere with any decision which might be come to by their Lordships respecting church rates. In a short time the labours of the Committee would be completed, and then their Lordships would have an opportunity of considering its report, and of arriving at a decision upon this much-vexed question. The noble Duke concluded by moving for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the present Operation of the Law and Practice respecting the Assessment and Levy of Church Rates.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed; and the Lords nominated to serve on the said Committee.

BRIBERY AT GLOUCESTER AND WAKEFIELD.—QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to ask whether any engagement had been entered into by the Government, or on their behalf, or by the Commissioners for investigating the cases of bribery and corruption at Gloucester and Wakefield, or either of them, whereby the parties who have given or received bribes are to be indemnified, or are not to be proceeded against, for any illegal transactions in those Boroughs at the last or any other Elections?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the hon. Member was no doubt aware that the Act of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, laid down certain conditions with regard to witnesses making a true disclosure of the matters on which they should be examined, upon which the Commissioners were bound to give them a certificate of indemnity. Assuming that the witnesses made a true disclosure, the power of granting certificates of indemnity was invested in the Commissioners alone, and the Government had no concern in the matter. Having received full information as to the manner in which the discretion invested in the Commissioners by the Act had been exercised by the two sets of Commissioners, he would state to the House what he was in possession of. With regard to Gloucester, the Chief Commissioner, on opening the proceedings, made a short address, and stated that the Commissioners were empowered by the Act of Parliament to give certificates of indemnity to such witnesses as, in the opinion of the Commissioners, should make a full disclosure of all matters upon which they should be examined. This certificate was granted to all who applied for it, with three exceptions. About 500 witnesses were examined, and about 200 applied for certificates of indemnity. In one case the certificate had been pleaded before Mr. Justice Keating in certain proceedings taken before him, who thereupon stayed proceedings, and made the plaintiff pay the costs. The Wakefield Commissioners had followed a similar course. About 140 witnesses examined before that Commission received certificates, and in thirty-eight cases the certificate was refused. He held in his hand the Report of the Wakefield Commission, which would be laid upon the Table that night. When the Report was printed the hon. Member would see a schedule of the witnesses examined, and the names of those who had received the certificate.

SIR FITZROY KELLY:—Will the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to lay before the House the form of the certificate granted by the Commissioners?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS:—Not the least.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would beg to ask whether witnesses examined before Committees of that House could not receive certificates of indemnity?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS:—The Act of Parliament limits the power of granting certificates of indemnity to the Commissioners, and does not extend the power to Committees of this House.

REPUBLIC OF GUATEMALA.

QUESTION.

MR. R. CRAWFORD said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with reference to the Convention recently concluded between Her Majesty and the Republic of Guatemala relative to the Boundary of British Honduras, to state out of what fund it is intended to defray the expenses of the proposed Survey, and the cost of constructing the Road to connect the capital of Guatemala with the Atlantic coast.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL:—Sir, in answer to my hon. Friend I have to state that it was justly considered very important by Lord Malmesbury that the boundary between the British territory and the Republic of Guatemala should be thoroughly defined, and, accordingly, instructions were given to Mr. Wyke to negotiate for the settlement of that boundary. Mr. Wyke succeeded in that negotiation, but it was found that the Government of Guatemala were very desirous to have some assistance towards surveying the country for the purpose of making a road, that road being entirely in the district within the boundary of the Republic of Guatemala. According to the Convention between the two countries it was agreed that officers should be sent out for the purpose of marking out the boundary of our colony, and at the same time surveying the country for the purpose of making this road. The expense of the survey by the officer sent out, and six others who accompanied him, will be borne by the British Government. It is supposed that the operations in which they are engaged will take about eighteen or twenty months; and with regard to any further expenses beyond the survey they will be defrayed by the Government of Guatemala. The whole of the expenses of the construction of the road will be borne by the Government of Guatemala, it not being intended that the British Government should be at any expense for that purpose.

INVESTMENTS IN EAST INDIA STOCK.

QUESTION.

MR. A. MILLS said, he rose to ask Mr. Attorney General, Whether any measure will be introduced in the present Session to amend so much of the Act 22nd and 23rd Vict. c. 35, as related to investments by Trustees in East India Stock?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the section of the Act to which the hon. Gentleman referred was introduced into a Bill that came down from the other House. It had, however, from the construction put upon it by the Courts been reduced to a dead letter. Lord St. Leonards, the author of the Bill, had introduced another measure into the House of Lords, and the probability was that it would come down to that House, and that hon. Members would then have an opportunity of discussing the subject.

FAIRS AND MARKETS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. DAWSON said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any measure during the present Session for the regulation of Fairs and Markets in Ireland, and if so, whether such measure will be introduced upon an early opportunity?

MR. CARDWELL said, that the subject had been considered by the Government, and he should be glad when the state of public business gave him an opportunity of bringing in a measure. He was not, however, at present able to say at what time of the Session he could introduce the Bill.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE.

QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI:—Sir, I wish to make an inquiry of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in reference to the rumoured annexation of the Duchy of Savoy and the County of Nice to the Empire of France. The Chief Minister of the Crown, in "another place" has stated that Her Majesty's Government have made a communication of their opinion on the subject of this annexation to the French Government. I wish to know whether this communication will be found among those Italian papers which have been promised, and which we await with great interest, and if not, whether the noble Lord will have any objection to lay it upon the Table?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL:—Sir, the communication to which my noble Friend referred in "another place" was made in July last, and arose from a communication which the British Ambassador at Paris had received from our Minister in Switzerland, in which some alarm was expressed on the subject. As to the production of these papers, I would rather take a day or two to consider whether it can be done without inconvenience to the public service.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS. QUESTION.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he would beg to ask the noble Viscount at the head of the Government Whether, considering the very important matters now pressing upon the attention of the Board of Works, it would be convenient for the Government to fill up the office of First Commissioner of Works, vacant by the death of Mr. FitzRoy, without delay.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—Sir, it is the intention of the Government to fill up the appointment, and I trust to be able to do so very soon. In the meantime, if there are any matters of pressing importance to be disposed of, I apprehend the ex officio Commissioners ought, for purpose of that sort, to be competent to act; but I have not heard that there are any such matters to be attended to, or that any inconvenience has been caused by the temporary vacancy in the office.

ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE EAST. QUESTION.

MR. BUTLER said, he wished to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department with respect to the lamentable proceedings which had taken place in the parish church of St. George's-in-the-East. The Question he had to ask of the right hon. Gentleman was, Whether Her Majesty's Government intended to introduce any measure for the relief of parishioners, in cases similar to that which had arisen in the parish of St. George's-in-the East? and whether he was taking, or intending to take, any steps for the purpose of enabling the parishioners in that unfortunate district to attend Divine service in their own parish church?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Perhaps the House may wish to know precisely the steps that have been taken with regard to the church of St. George's-in-the-East. That church was closed for Divine service for some time during the summer and autumn. Upon its re-opening application was made by the Rev. Bryan King, the clergyman, to myself and Sir Richard Mayne for protection, in the event of any disturbances taking place within the church. After a full consideration of the law on the subject, I found that there were considerable difficulties in the way of the interference of a police-constable in the case of any noise or disturbance within a church, not amounting to a breach of the peace. The law of brawling in a house of prayer is altogether inapplicable to such cases, and, being merely a remedy to be enforced by a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court, arms the police with no authority whatever. There are other modes, defined by the Act of Uniformity, whereby any person who disturbs a church can be summoned before a magistrate; but neither does that enable a police-constable to interfere summarily in the matter. After full consideration we found that there was an Act of Philip and Mary more or less applicable to the subject; but I must admit there is considerable difficulty in interpreting the statute law in regard to this class of offences, because it is one, fortunately, which has been so extremely rare that it has not of late years been made the subject of distinct enactment. Under these circumstances, after a conference with the clergyman and churchwardens, I agreed to authorize the stationing of a body of police, in their uniform, inside the church during Divine service, and the churchwardens undertook to assign places to them. The police, accordingly, attended on successive Sundays, and to a certain extent succeeded in preventing any open disturbance or breach of order during the services. At the same time, I am bound to admit that, owing to the state of the law, very scandalous interruptions of Divine worship took place, notwithstanding the presence of the police. At the end of the year Sir Richard Mayne represented to me that it was impossible permanently to continue the system of guarding any of the metropolitan churches by a body of police, and that at the beginning of the new year some change in the practice should take place. I therefore sanctioned the withdrawal of the police, who had been stationed in the church for six successive Sundays. I regret to say that the presence of the police has had no lasting effect, and that on their withdrawal the disturbances have been greater than previously. Yesterday, after the termination of the evening service, which is one in which certain rites and ceremonies are introduced by the Rev. Bryan King, which appear to be very distasteful to the parishioners, a very decided exhibition of disapprobation took place, which ended in a riot and tumult. I should have stated that when the police were withdrawn from the interior of the church, a large body of them were constantly stationed in the vicinity during Divine service, so as to be within call in the event of any open breach of the peace. As soon, therefore, as the riot broke out yesterday evening, intelligence was conveyed to the Inspector, who at once entered the church with a strong force of police, put an end to the riot, and cleared the church; and I believe that no further breach of the peace took place. I have to-day had an interview with Sir Richard Mayne, who has learned from Mr. Bryan King the plan which that gentleman proposes for the maintenance of order on Sunday next. That plan has been acceded to, and is that a body of police should be stationed outside of the church, and that persons who appear to be entering it with the intention and design previously conceived of creating a disturbance during Divine worship, should not be admitted into the church. I confess I am not aware of any other means of preventing a breach of the peace during the services; and I think the House must see that these interruptions are, to say the least, of a most unseemly and scandalous nature. I make no remarks upon the religious opinions or sentiments which may be involved in the controversy. I look at the question simply as one concerning the maintenance of the public peace; and I conceive I should be wanting in my duty if I did not take some steps to prevent the recurrence of such disturbances as occurred yesterday at the evening service. In reply to the question of the hon. Member, I have to say that it is not the intention of the Government at present to introduce any measure with the view of meeting such cases as that of St. George's-in-the-East;

but we will, of course, be quite ready to consider any measure which any Gentleman may think appropriate to the subject. I may state thus much—that it appears to me that no remedy would be effectual in this or similar cases which merely provided for the removal of the clergyman on the ground of heresy. I do not understand that any of the doctrines promulgated by the Rev. Bryan King or any of his curates are heretical or contrary to the Articles or canons of the Church of England. What is objected to is the ceremonial which he has introduced, upon his own discretion, in the Divine service as performed in his own church; and it is not denied that an incumbent has a discretion in such matters. If the Legislature thought fit to deprive the incumbent of all discretion, and to give the Bishop the absolute power of prescribing rites and ceremonies which are in themselves indifferent and not defined by the Articles of the Church, and if the incumbent were obliged to yield to such authority, I think that would afford, practically, a complete remedy for such cases; because it seems to me very improbable that the unfortunate want of discretion and judgment that appears to distinguish some of our parochial clergymen, would be found upon the Episcopal Bench; and therefore I should look with great confidence to the success of a remedy which was left to the discretion of the Bishops. I may add that, personally, I am of opinion that great advantage might arise if power were given to the Crown by an order in council, upon proper ecclesiastical advice, to modify the rubrics of the Common Prayer-book. That is a subject, however, which is much litigated at the present moment, and which requires great consideration. In saying so, therefore, I merely express my own individual opinion, on which I have no intention of acting, and which I mention only as part of the difficulties of this question.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR moved the adjournment of the House, and expressed his opinion that the disturbances yesterday at St. Georges-in-the-East, and similar disturbances, no less important, which had taken place in other parishes in England, were of a more serious character than the right hon. Baronet seemed to suppose. He then read the following passage from the account of the riot in The Times:—

bances which have taken place, everything which has previously occurred sinks into insignificance when compared with the terrible scene which was witnessed there last night. At the evening service it was such as it would be impossible for any language adequately to describe. The conduct of the congregation was, to use the only phrase at all applicable to it, 'devilish.' A considerable amount of Church furniture has been destroyed, the cushions in the galleries were torn up and thrown into the body of the Church, Bibles and Prayer-books flew about in all directions, and many of the altar decorations have been injured."

He was sorry that, with such a state of things existing, the Government did not think proper to bring in some Bill by way of remedy. But as he was at present advised, such a Bill would be introduced. He hoped, unless the Government took it out of his hands, to be able himself to introduce a measure which, if it did not pass both Houses, might raise discussions which would prevent incumbents bringing about such an unfortunate state of things in their parishes as had been witnessed in St. Georges-in-the-East.

MR. HADFIELD said, he rose to second the Motion. The people of England had borne this nuisance long enough. The fact of Protestant clergymen receiving their income from Protestant sources, and having in their hearts inclinations towards the Church of Rome, had tried the public patience long enough. This was a very grave question. It affected more than members of the Church of England, because, if some remedy were not devised, the people of England would take the law into their own hands; and then the clergy would hear of it in a form not very agreeable to themselves. The Nonconformists agreed in doctrine more than the members of the Church of England; there was not, in fact, more dissension between the different Nonconformist bodies than existed in the Church of England. Was there a member of the Church of Scotland who was not interested in the question? It was therefore high time that the Government took the matter into their own hands. If the Church of England was so crazy and so infirm that if a single brick were taken out of the edifice the whole would come down? If that were the state of the Church, the sooner the people of England knew it the better. He thought the Government had too long trifled with this subject. In former times people had made fortunes and been enobled by pandering to Church power; but it would be a bad speculation now-a-days to attempt to make political capital out of the Establishment. But public opinion was rising—it had risen, and at present the Nonconformists outnumbered the members of the Church of England. ["No, no."] He said Yes. Such was the dissatisfaction which was felt with the Church of England, that, as was proved on Census Sunday, the number of Nonconformist worshippers was greater than those belonging to the Church. Look at the number of members of the Church compared with the population of the United Kingdom—what was their proportion? Not one-third of the whole country. But without counting numbers, he believed that the Protestant feeling of the country was sound, and every attempt to carry them over the line, and land them in the Church of Rome, he was confident, would fail. Hon. Gentlemen opposite might try to bolster up the Church as much as possible, but they would fail in so doing unless by a reform of the Church of England such as no Government had yet ventured to attempt.

Motion made, and Question "That this House do now adjourn" put, and negatived.

THE FRENCH TARIFF.—THE BUDGET. QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD rose to ask a question, of which he had given notice to the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer, and which was a matter of great interest to the whole commercial world—he alluded to the anticipated changes in the French tariff and in our commercial intercourse with the French nation. If there was any time more convenient than another at which these changes could be brought into operation it was at the present time; for the House was probably aware that the first week in February was the time when the buyers proceeded to lay in their stocks of French goods. The Question he wanted to put was, whether these changes in the tariff would accompany the financial statement which the right hon. Gentleman was about to make on Monday next, or in any other form? and whether these changes would take effect, as was usually the case, as soon as the Resolutions were passed by the Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER:—As I intimated with a less degree of certainty upon a former occasion, I now beg to say, in answer to my hon. Friend, that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government that the financial statement for the year shall be made on Monday next. The ratification of the treaty of commerce with France, we have reason to believe, will be exchanged within the next few days. The House of Commons, we presume, would not wish to entertain the subjects which that treaty opens without likewise being made acquainted simultaneously with the whole proposals of the Government with regard to the financial year. On Monday next, therefore, it will be my duty to submit the whole proposals of the Government, including such as are related to the commercial treaty with France. I am well aware, as has been stated by the hon. Member, that this is a season of the year which is a critical one with respect to many branches of trade, and that it is of extreme importance that when the announcements are made the decision of the House should be taken at the earliest possible moment. It is, therefore, the desire of the Government, if they are permitted to do so by the House, to ask the House, after hearing the statement I shall make on Monday next, to proceed with the consideration of the subjects on the following Thursday; for, if we trusted only to that portion of Friday which by present practice of the House is left for purely public business, I am afraid the progress would be so slow as to be unsatisfactory to the British public. Of course, that is a matter upon which we shall be entirely in the hands of the House. I make the proposal now, in order that hon. Members may have an opportunity of considering its fairness; and if we find that its justice commends itself to other minds, as it does to ours, it will be necessary for me to move that Orders of the Day have precedence of Notices of Motion on Thursday week. With regard to the time when the projected changes will come into operation, I think I have stated as much as is within my duty to state. On Monday next it will be my duty and study fully and clearly to explain to the House the whole of the proposals of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. HORSMAN:—Will copies of the treaty be in the hands of Members before the statement on Monday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER:—It will not be practicable to present the treaty to the House before Monday next; but I do not think the treaty will be so complex as not to be possible to convey in a general outline the principal subjects upon which it touches. I beg it will be understood that the Committee of the Whole House will not be asked to vote upon any subject of great importance—although there may be some minor matters which they may dispose of—without full notice and opportunity of consideration. I may add that it is my intention to propose a Committee of the Whole House on the Customs' Acts, that certain Resolutions may be moved which these changes will render necessary.

SUPPLY.—OBSERVATIONS.

Report of Resolution "That a Supply be granted to Her Majesty" brought up. On Motion that the said Report be received:—

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he did not rise to oppose the reception of the Report, but he wished to take that opportunity of calling the attention of the House to a practice which he believed was calculated to impair, if not altogether to render nugatory, the right of that House to vote Supplies. The House was aware that they never knew what was exactly the expenditure of any one year till some twenty months after it had been incurred. At the end of last Session, in the month of August last, the Secretary of the Treasury laid on the table of the House a document which showed the entire expenditure on the army and navy for the year 1857-1858. This was the last expenditure of which they knew anything—at present they knew nothing of the expenditure for the year 1858-59. The document was printed and issued to hon. Members only during the recess, when it was impossible for hon. Members to make any use of it. But he found that in that year more than £1,500,000 had been spent on the army and navy in excess of the Supplies which had been voted by that House. If these things were allowed to be done what became of the right of the House to vote Supplies? It appeared that £800,000 was spent on the navy in excess of the Supplies, embraced under twelve different heads, on almost every conceivable subject—law charges, acquisitions of land, coast-guard, transport service, and so on. In the army he found that the excess for the same year amounted to £1,029,000, and that had been spent under six different heads. It was true that the House was afterwards called on to vote money for this expenditure in excess, but by that time their power of control was gone, as the money had been long spent. He wished now to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether there had been any excess of expenditure over supply for the financial years 1858-59; and if so he would ask the House whether they did not think it necessary to apply some remedy to this abuse, and insist that no excess should be allowed except in cases of the gravest emergency. He would not have pressed this matter on the attention of the House if he did not feel that it struck at the root of all the financial power of the House, and if he did not believe that the practice was annually increasing to a large extent.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER:—The hon. Baronet has called my attention and the attention of the House to a subject of great importance and great complexity, but which, I think, cannot be discussed with advantage, except upon notice indicating the direction which the discussion is likely to take. The hon. Baronet has put to me a question whether during the financial year ending the 5th April, 1859, there has been any excess of expenditure over the Supplies voted by the House of Commons in any department. Of course I need not say that the hon. Baronet might have better put the question he has put to me to the Gentlemen who were responsible for the finances of the country at that period, of whom I was not one—but it does happen that the accounts of the War Department have been obtained within the last few days—a little earlier than usual—from which it appears that there is an excess of expenditure for the year 1858-59 over Supply somewhat exceeding £300,000. The hon. Baronet may wish to make his remarks or comments on this statement, and he will have an early opportunity of doing so, as it is the intention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War to ask for a vote of Supply to cover this excess of expenditure, on one of the days of the week. With regard to the larger aspect and bearings of this question, I shall not enter upon them casually and loosely, as I must do were I to do so now, but I can assure the hon. Baronet that Her Majesty's Government are very sensible of the importance of avoiding any expenditure in excess of the Supplies voted by the House, except in cases of urgent necessity; and when compelled to do so, of rendering an account to Parliament at the earliest possible moment.

COLONEL SYKES said, that he wished some Member of the House would move at once a vote of censure upon the head of any Department who should have ex-

pendent money in excess of his Votes. That was the only remedy he could think of for the evil, and he would cordially support his hon. Friend opposite in any such attempt.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER:—Sir, I am sorry to say that I have rather understated the excess of the army expenditure in 1858-59. That excess amounts to £470,000.

Committee appointed for Wednesday.

COMMITTEE. LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved that the House do resolve itself into a Committee to consider the Annuity Tax (Edinburgh).

Motion agreed to. House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the subject had been often under the consideration of the House, and therefore a short statement only would be necessary of the provisions of the Bill. As the House had been often told, the annuity tax was a rate amounting to $4\frac{1}{4}$ per cent upon the rental of houses within a certain limited area of the city of Edinburgh, and which was laid upon the occupiers of those houses, the proceeds being applied to the support of eighteen Ministers of the Established Church within the city. He must also explain that the congregations covered a much larger area than the districts taxed; nor did the tax extend to all the occupiers, inasmuch as there was a special exemption of a large and wealthy class, consisting of members of the College of Justice—that was to say, the judges, barristers, and solicitors. Without entering into the question whether the principle of this taxation were right or wrong, no one could deny that it was very unjust in the mode of its imposition. Several plans for modifying it had been introduced into the House, and he would now proceed to state in what way he proposed to make a new attempt in the same direction. His hon. Friend and colleague the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Black) in the last Session and in the Session previous to that, had introduced a measure which on both occasions had received the assent of the House on the second reading. By the provisions of those Bills the ministers of Edinburgh would be preserved in their existing interests ; but when the present ministers were all dead, when the last vacancy occurred, the future ministers of Edinburgh would be dependent on seat-rents, church-door collections, and a sum of £2,000 which was drawn from the Exchequer, being part of a rent-charge levied from the docks of Leith. The principle of that proposal—the final abolition of this impost—had twice received the sanction of the House. Therefore the question was not now as to the continuance of the tax or its abolition, but upon what terms and conditions it should be abolished. The measure he was about to introduce was essentially different from the Bill proposed by the hon. Member for Edinburgh last Session, because the plan of the hon. Gentleman of a tax of 4½ per cent was to be levied to pay the existing stipendiaries. An approximate calculation had been made of the amount which would have to be paid by the citizens of Edinburgh if the principle of maintaining the tax during the continuance of vested interests were acted on. Taking the assumed ages of the present incumbents as a basis, it had been estimated that for the first fifteen years a payment of £3 7s. 4d. per cent would be annually required from the citizens of Edinburgh ; and that for a further period of sixteen years—making thirty-one years in all—there would be a total sum paid which would be equivalent to £63,000. Thus it was evident that the Bill of his hon. Friend would not, if adopted, have had the effect of extinguishing this burden for a considerable period. Within the present year two contingencies, which were not foreseen at the time the calculation was made, had taken place—one of these ministers having been appointed to a professorship, and a second translated to another benefice. Such contingencies might, of course, occur hereafter, but they were chances that could not be taken into calculation. With regard to the Bill of his hon. Friend for the total abolition of the tax he would offer no opinion whatever ; but it was impossible not to see that the proposal, which to a great extent left the clergy dependent on voluntary contributions, would meet with very strenuous opposition, and that it was doubtful whether it would obtain the consent of both Houses of Parliament. The issue of a contest with the House of Lords might, as in other instances, prove successful, but a number of years would first be spent in the struggle ; and, believing that the time and money requisite for that purpose might be more economically employed, he was about to make a proposition which would give immediate relief to the inhabitants of Edinburgh, which would completely extinguish the tax within a limited period, and which would also provide in its stead a just and equitable substitute to the ministers of that city. Some of the sources from which it had been proposed in former years to derive this substitute were no longer available. A law-suit had arisen with respect to the right of the Town-Council to dispose of the sum paid by the railway company for the site of Trinity College Church, which it had been proposed by a Parliamentary Committee that sat in 1851 to apply in aid of the extinction of this tax, but in consequence of the suit that had arisen this fund was no longer available. There was also a sum payable to the Deans of the Chapel Royal, which it had been proposed to apply to this purpose ; but these funds also were now beyond reach, the University Commissioners having recommended that they should be applied to increasing the number and efficiency of the Divinity Chairs in the University of Scotland. The third source was Government money ; but he was happy to say he did not propose to have recourse to that. His proposition was one by which the citizens of Edinburgh would be enabled to redeem the tax. At all events, it contained the materials for an amicable settlement of the question. Great scandal resulted from the present mode of collecting the tax. The other day there was a trial for resisting the officers in the execution of these warrants, in which the prosecutor failed to get a verdict ; and it was most desirable that the question should be settled. At present the ministers were eighteen in number. Three of the churches were collegiate. It appeared to him that they were not bound to provide for the second charges in those collegiate churches. He did not propose to abolish any of them ; but, in providing a substitute for the annuity tax, and providing for existing interests, he did not think that it would be necessary to provide for those second interests ; and that opinion was shared by many members of the Established Church. That would leave fifteen ministers—a larger proportion for Edinburgh than was provided for in other towns. He thought it too much. He wished to say nothing invidious against the Established Church, but still his measure was a practical one. In 1837, when the Ecclesiastical Commissioners reported, the attendance at the Established Churches of Edinburgh was very nearly equal to the aggregate of all other denominations put together. In 1843 there was an unfortunate disruption in the Church, and in the Census of 1851, by taking the attendance on a Sunday fixed by the Commissioners, it was found that of 48,000 attendants on Divine service in the mornings, about 8,000 only belonged to the Established Church; showing that the attendance had greatly fallen off. The seat-rents would also show the falling off in the attendance in the Established Church within the last twenty years. The seat-rents in the five years from 1832-37 amounted to £5,835; in the five years from 1853-58 they yielded only £3,235. The surplus derived from that source in the former period was £3,400 against £1,600 in the latter. He had no wish to pare down the revenues of the Established Church in proportion to the number of attendants, but it should be remembered that they were dealing with a question of an equitable adjustment. In the Old Church, Edinburgh, there were only forty-seven seats let, and 641 unlet—and the ordinary attendance was certainly not 200. Of the forty-seven seats let only one was let to a parishioner. The Old Church was under the roof of the High Church, and the High Church was a collegiate church. The Tolbooth Church had only fourteen seats let, against 634 unlet. He did not propose to abolish either of these. The present incumbents would retain the right to share in the annuity tax or in the substitute which by this Bill he was going to propose, as long as they lived; but they were not bound to make provision for future incumbents of those two churches. The Old Church was vacant at present, and he proposed that the minister to be appointed should not have the right to share in the annuity tax. He should therefore give power to the Commissioners to be appointed by this Bill to nominate one of the ministers in the Collegiate Church to the Old Church. His proposal was to the following effect:—An Ecclesiastical Commission to be appointed under the Bill; three members to be appointed by the Presbytery, two by the Town Council, one by the Faculty of Advocates, and one by the Society of Writers to the Signet. To those Commissioners would be transferred the property in the churches, the right to the seat-rents, and all liability for repairs. The seat-rents, now amounting to £1,600 a year, would be collected by them; it was quite certain the amount was far below what it ought to be; in all probability there would be an increase of about £60 a year. It was proposed that that fund of £1,600 a year should be accumulated for fifteen years at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent interest, and supposing the fund to increase at the rate of £60 a year, the whole amount would be £33,600 at the end of that time. Then there was a sum of £2,000 a year paid from the Exchequer—part of a rent-charge derivable from the docks at Leith. It had been said that, if the annuity tax were abolished, this charge ought to be remitted; but he saw no sound reason for doing that, and proposed that it should be continued. He would allow it to accumulate in the same way for fifteen years at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent interest, and the amount of the two funds at the end of that period would be about £80,000. He proposed that at the expiration of fifteen years the annuity tax should be abolished altogether, but that there should be laid on by the Town Council during that fifteen years an assessment of from 8d. to 10d. in the pound. The latter was lower than the present rate. A rate of 8d., if levied on the present police assessment, along with the police rate, and paid by all occupiers, would give a surplus produce in the year of £1,520, after paying the stipends of the ministers now chargeable on the fund. This annual surplus, accumulated in the way he had described, would yield, at the end of fifteen years, a sum of £34,000 or £35,000. Then he proposed that the exemption in favour of the lawyers should be abolished—an exemption which ought never to have existed. If the lowest amount of rate were taken—8d. in the pound—the capital accumulated at the end of fifteen years would amount to £106,000. If 10d., the highest rate, were exacted (and that was lower than the existing rate), the capital would amount to no less than £160,000. That, however, would be more than sufficient; and what he proposed to do was either to take the sum to be collected at £120,000, or the sum to be furnished by the town at £42,000—the two things would be very nearly the same—and the result would be that at the expiration of fifteen years there would be an annual income to the ministers of the interest of £120,000, at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.—£4,200. There would be in addition £2,500 from the seat-rents, and £2,000 the rent-charge on the Leith docks—giving £8,700 a year. To give £600 a year to thirteen ministers, £7,800 was all that was necessary, and there would still remain a balance in the hands of the Commissioners applicable to expenses. The plan would have this advantage; it would put an end to the tax altogether at the end of fifteen years, unless it should be found that the assessment on the town had not yielded £42,000; but he thought this was sure to be realized. He had made no allowance for the increase of the town, nor for a higher rate of interest than $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent being obtained on the accumulations. This proposal would not lay a greater burden on the ratepayers than the proposition made by his hon. Friend (Mr. Black) last year; for 8*d.* in the pound was only £3 6*s.* 8*d.* per cent, instead of £3 7*s.* 4*d.*, and the whole amount of £60,000, payable on the other scheme, would be saved. He certainly did not expect that this measure would satisfy general or abstract views entertained by some on this troublesome question; but at all events it afforded a means of extrication. If the ratepayers considered the rate too heavy they might reduce it by spreading it over a greater number of years—over twenty, instead of fifteen; on the other hand, if they thought it desirable to terminate the tax sooner, they could do it by making the rate 10*d.* instead of 8*d.* It had been suggested before, and again to him on that occasion, that the salaries of the ministers might be reduced from £600 to £500, or £550. If the members of the Established Church thought that a more desirable plan, and proposed that reduction in order to maintain the two churches, he had no objection. But he had not made the proposal, because he thought it infinitely better for the Church that thirteen clergymen should be fully paid, though they had to extend their strength over a larger surface. The hon. and learned Gentleman then moved a Resolution.

“That the Chairman be directed to move the House, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to abolish the Annuity Tax in Edinburgh, and to make provision in regard to the Stipends of the Clergy in that City.”

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, that a measure such as that which the learned Lord sketched out, the object of which was to effect the settlement of a question which had excited much bitterness of feeling, was entitled to be received with the utmost respect, and being of that opinion, he for one did not rise to offer any opposition to its introduction. He wished however, to make a few observations. He was, he might say, in the first place, glad to find that the learned Lord in framing the measure had proceeded on a different principle from that which characterized former measures which had been introduced to the House on the same subject. He had recognized the principle that it was the duty of the State to support the Established Church of the country, as well as the obligation which lay upon the people of Edinburgh to provide for the payment of the ministers of the Established Church in that city, the learned Lord had, however, in dealing with that subject passed over very lightly the history of the tax; nor would he (Sir James Fergusson) enter further in the points than simply to state that it was a tax which had been levied on a portion of the inhabitants of Edinburgh for a period of nearly two centuries and a half, and was originally the result of a compromise by which considerable advantages had been secured to the town itself by the voluntary cession of certain lands which had been formerly the property of the Church. The city of Edinburgh, which had so much benefited by that compromise, had the obligation imposed upon it to maintain the clergy of the Established Church within its confines; nor could he understand why they should be left dependant on voluntary support any more than other clergymen of the same communion whose stipends were paid out of the land of the country. The learned Lord, however, he was glad to find, did not propose to take that course, one of the main features of his scheme being to provide a substitute for a charge the complainants against which he (Sir James Fergusson) could not help thinking often had recourse to it as furnishing a sort of cheap martyrdom, and which was a charge, moreover, subject to which every individual who paid it entered upon the occupation of his house. But although it afforded him satisfaction to perceive that the learned Lord did not propose to leave the clergy belonging to the Established Church in Edinburgh dependant upon voluntary contributions, he thought there were one or two objections to the measure which might affect the progress of it. He must confess it appeared to him rather hard that no less than five of the Ministers of the Church in Edinburgh were to be swept away, under the operation of the Bill, and swept away too at a moment when the sphere of their duties was becoming rapidly extended. It had been found necessary to build new churches to meet the spiritual wants of the population, and it seemed to be very inconsistent to introduce at the same time a measure reducing the number of the ministers of the Church. There was, however, another feature of the measure which was even still more objectionable, and that was the proposal to perpetuate the imposition of seat-rents. Those rents were the property of the Corporation of Edinburgh, conferred, he believed, by Act of Parliament when that city was nearly bankrupt, and were so very high as to exclude from many of the churches in Edinburgh the great mass of the poorer classes resident in that city. He might add, that the Established Church was very anxious to reduce rents which so operated, but that it was unable to do so in consequence of their being the property of the Corporation, with whom he trusted the hon. and learned Lord would have no difficulty in coming to some satisfactory arrangement on the subject. If it were really the object of the Corporation to maintain an Established Church it should be one of their first objects to provide accommodation for the poorer classes. In conclusion, he should merely express a hope that the members of the Church of England would not fail to perceive that any attack made upon the property of the Established Church in Scotland tended equally to the prejudice of their own, and that they would, therefore, lend their aid to render this measure as little injurious as possible to its interests.

MR. BLACK said, he should not resist the introduction of the Bill which proposed to deal with a tax which was of the most obnoxious character; but he thought he had seen other schemes much preferable to this, — indeed he thought that the scheme of the hon. and learned Lord was far from an improvement upon that which he himself had last year submitted to the House. He was, for instance, by no means satisfied with that portion of the Bill which provided for the continuance of the tax for a period of fifteen years, and which virtually amounted to its imposition upon those by whom it was at present paid during the remainder of their lives. His opinion was that the people of Edinburgh would not be willing to bear it. He was himself willing to bear his proportion; he was so anxious to see an accommodation of so vexatious a question that he had supported almost every proposition that had been made for its settlement, and would submit to almost any personal inconvenience to get rid of it. The opposition to its settlement had been most injurious to the cause of religion. It had been said how beautiful upon the mountains were the feet of them who published peace, but the ministers of Edinburgh, who called themselves ministers of peace, sent messengers with manacles in their hands for the purpose of handcuffing and carrying to jail respectable men who refused to pay for their support. He thought it unjust that the present generation of the citizens of Edinburgh should bear the whole burden of the measure proposed by the hon. and learned Lord. He doubted, indeed, whether the inhabitants of Edinburgh in general would submit to it. He thought his own scheme—for which, perhaps, he felt the fondness of a parent—preferable. No doubt, some of the town ministers were very long-lived; but suppose a few of them should live to a very great age, yet, when the greater bulk had come under the new arrangement, the few that remained might be expected also to concur. The hon. Member who spoke last talked of what the city of Edinburgh got by the agreement to pay this tax; this only showed that he was utterly unacquainted with the history of this impost. If his argument had been based on a knowledge of facts he would not have made the statements he had done. In fact, the city got nothing for it. It was that religious Monarch, Charles II., who recommended it, and they all knew what was the value of such recommendations in the days of the Stuarts. The hon. Gentleman had also talked about seat-rents, and that seats ought to be free to the poor; but this was mere religious sentimentalism; the churches in Edinburgh were half empty, and the poor were quite welcome to sittings, but the poor would not attend the church if they were charged no seat-rents at all. There could be no doubt that for some time the Established Church in Edinburgh had been sinking. This very tax acted as a wet blanket, and was, to a great extent, the cause of the popular dislike to it, leading them to regard the institution, not as one for promoting their welfare, but actually doing them an injury. It was impossible to believe that the Established Church in Edinburgh could prosper under such a system. The Bill he proposed did not interfere with the number of the clergy. He did not care what was the number; they might be fifty, provided those who appointed them paid for them. He thought the plan of the hon. and learned Lord would have a more injurious influence on the Established Church than that introduced by him last year. That would have given new life and energy to the Church, because it provided the clergy should be paid according to the talents and vigour displayed. He saw no reason why a man of talent, who paid great attention to his parish, and who was beloved by his people, should not have a higher income than a drone who cared nothing about his parish; but by the plan now proposed the drones and the working bees would be paid alike. He had no idea of such a system. It was quite possible some modification might be made in the measure so as to render it more agreeable to the inhabitants of Edinburgh, and more useful to the Church; he would vote for the Resolution and see what shape it took in its progress through the House.

MR. W. MILLER thought, if the Bill had proposed the abolition of the tax on the shipping interests in Leith, which dated from the time of Charles II., for the support of the established clergy of Edinburgh, it would have given more satisfaction. If the inhabitants of Edinburgh complained of the Annuity-tax, much more cause of complaint had his constituents, who were saddled with an onerous burden for supporting a clergy from whom they received no benefit whatever. The tax affected the shipping interest of the whole country. A ship coming from Liverpool to Leith, for instance, had to pay a specified sum for the support of the Established Church of Edinburgh. It would be much more to the honour and credit of the citizens of Edinburgh if they would maintain their own institutions. At a future stage of the measure he should object to that part of the Bill which affected the town of Leith, and hoped he should receive the support of the House.

MR. BLACKBURN thought the proposal unobjectionable, in so far as the new tax was less than that now in force; but with reference to the appropriation of the seat-rents considerable objections were stated by the hon. Member for Ayrshire (Sir J. Fergusson) and he, for one, also objected to the reduction of the number of Ministers from eighteen to fifteen. It would depend much on the details of the Bill whether he could give it his support, but no doubt there would be every disposition to have the matter settled.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM wished to know whether the Lord Advocate meant the Ecclesiastical Commission to be a paid Commission; if so, from what source would their salaries be taken? Of course, if they were drawn from the Annuity Fund it would pro tanto be reduced.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he proposed that the Commission should be unpaid. He might take this opportunity of supplying an omission in his former statement. The seat-rents, to the extent of £300 a year, formed part of the ordinary revenue of the city of Edinburgh, and it would be necessary to provide a substitute by a rate to that extent, to be levied as a police-rate over the whole community.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported.

Bill ordered to be brought in by MR. MASSEY, the LORD ADVOCATE, SIR GEORGE LEWIS, and SIR WILLIAM DUNBAR.

LONDON CORPORATION.

LEAVE.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS : — Sir, the House are doubtless aware that when the Municipal Corporation Bill passed, an exception was made of the Corporation of the City of London. That exception was mainly founded upon the generally popular character of the municipal government of that body. Before the Municipal Act was introduced a very large number of the corporations of England were practically close; the governing body was confined and limited in its character, and frequently the vacancies which occurred were filled up by self-election. The main object of the Municipal Act was to popularize the constitution of the corporations of the country; but the Common-council of the City of London being already a popular body, and having in former times exercised a great influence for strengthening the popular party in this country, it was not thought necessary to include that corporation in the general Municipal Act. A separate Report was afterwards made with respect to the institutions of the City of London; and a few years ago it was found, after the reform which the other corporations had undergone, that that which had at one time been regarded as the model corporation of the country would not bear a favourable comparison with the bodies included in the Municipal Act. Accordingly a Commission, of which I had the honour to be a member, was issued to inquire into the Corporation of the City of London.

That Commission made a Report, and a Bill was subsequently introduced into this House, founded on the Report of the Commissioners. The Bill was referred to a Select Committee, who went through all its clauses, and reported it to the House with Amendments. The measure which I now seek to submit to the notice of the House is substantially the measure which was reported by that Select Committee, and may, therefore, be deemed the result of the recommendations of the Commission, revised by a Select Committee of this House. The Bill so framed is limited to the constitution of the Corporation and to certain duties of its officers. It does not include the financial part of the question—namely, the coal duties, the metage dues, or the fees on brokers, which are all omitted from the operation of the measure. I think it not improbable that in the course of the Session I may have to call the attention of the House to the subject of the coal duties—which will expire, or at least a portion of them, at a not very distant date—as well as to other points connected with them which require consideration by this House. That question I however reserve to a future opportunity, and at present I merely ask for leave to introduce the Bill the object of which I have generally described. The right hon. Baronet concluded by moving for leave to bring in a Bill for the better Regulation of the Corporation of the City of London.

MR. AYRTON said, he did not intend to oppose the Motion, but must express his regret that the Government, having had ample time to consider that important subject, should have arrived at so feeble a result. The question of the City Corporation had engaged the attention of the House and of the metropolis for many years past, and he did not complain of the extreme candour of the right hon. Gentleman in giving the true reason for the maintenance of that particular municipality. No doubt it had for a long period strenuously supported Liberal principles. When reform began to be applied to the other corporations of England, it saw the necessity of allying itself strictly with the Liberal party in the House of Commons; and from that time to this it had pursued that exceedingly wise policy to which it owed its immunity from real reform. It was to be doubted, however, whether the service it had rendered to the Liberal party was a sufficient ground for keeping up an institution which had not only ceased to be of practical utility, but was of very serious inconvenience to the metropolis. The right hon. Gentleman had introduced a measure which contained provisions of a very curious character. The House would remember that in the last Session of the late Parliament a memorable discussion took place to determine what should be the proper basis for the elective franchise. The late Government thought it wise and politic to maintain a £10 franchise. The Whig leaders solemnly condemned that as too high a qualification for voters for Members of Parliament; and by a concerted movement—in which they were supported by the entire Liberal party—they contrived on that very question to turn their opponents out of office. Now, however, after a year's deliberation, the Whig Government came down to the House and proposed a £10 franchise for the constituency of this great municipality. One was at a loss to know how to deal with such a Government. When he assisted the present Government last year in ousting their predecessors, he never imagined that they would adhere to a limit for the franchise which they had so solemnly condemned. Surely it would not be said that a higher qualification was required from those who chose the members of a municipal corporation than from those who returned representatives to Parliament. He could discover no reason for retaining such an anomaly, except that that Corporation had attached itself so affectionately to the Whig party that it was absolutely necessary for those who directed the politics of the Liberals to look more to the combinations of City corporators in elections than to the great political principles which they had professed. They must either maintain the Corporation of the City of London as a curiosity and a thing of the past, or place it on a footing consonant with all other municipalities. In its origin it was not, as it had now become, a mere local institution, confined within the ancient walls of London. It was formerly a very remarkable combination of all the freemen engaged in trade in the city in its widest sense, namely, as the whole metropolis. The Corporation was based on the freedom of the City, and that freedom was connected with the freedom of the Livery companies, bodies representing every branch of trade then carried on in the metropolis. No man had a right to take his place in the municipality unless he was free not only of the City but of one of the Livery companies, which were not limited to the City boundaries. These companies were all united into one Corporation, which was therefore not a mere municipal but a trading institution. The Mayor—an integral part of the Corporation, without whom nothing could be done—was elected entirely by the Livery, and was supposed to represent every branch of trade. It was now proposed, however, to divest the City Corporation of its trading character, and to reduce it within the limits of an ordinary municipal corporation, such as was to be found in any other part of the country. If it was dealt with in that way, it must abandon all its pretensions to represent the trading and commercial classes of the whole metropolis. If maintained, then, at all, its privileges ought to be extended to the entire metropolitan community. They last Session heard a good deal about the inconvenience resulting from the Government not possessing the confidence of the House of Commons; but in this case a Government which professed to enjoy that confidence was bringing forward a measure which was quite unworthy of the attention of the House. The same Government had recently entered into negotiations and concluded a treaty to relieve the manufacturers of Paris from a tax upon coal; but by this measure they proposed to continue a similar tax upon the manufacturers of London and about twenty-one miles round. Was it possible that a mere territorial municipality should be allowed to levy a tax upon the whole metropolis? The right hon. Gentleman, from his experience as a Commissioner appointed to inquire into this subject, knew perfectly well that the Corporation of London had at present no right to levy the smallest tax upon coal, or to levy any other tax whatever upon the metropolis. The coal tax was granted in times past, without any restriction, but for specific purposes and objects. Those purposes and objects had been fulfilled, and more than fulfilled; and it was now continued for the benefit of the City, at the expense of the rest of the inhabitants of the metropolis. Yet, because the Government did not like to quarrel with the Corporation of the city of London, who were all-influential in the city elections, the interests of the inhabitants of the rest of the metropolis were to be sacrificed, and this tax was to continue to be levied. He hoped that the House would not sanction any such feeble and unsatisfactory legislation. No doubt they would be appealed to to maintain the corporation because it was antiquated, and had in times past been associated with the triumphs of liberalism. Probably the noble Lord the Member for London would tell them that the Corporation was mentioned in Magna Charta, and that when the Barons had signed that document they were so frightened that they ran into the city of London and made themselves secure behind its walls. This, like the story of the 40s. freeholder who said that he had held his freehold since the days of William the Conqueror, was no doubt a very interesting historical fact, but it ought not to be allowed to influence the decision of an important practical question. Some years ago the Legislature established a really useful and practical municipality to conduct the affairs of the inhabitants of the metropolis; and how could it now re-establish by the side of that, a crude and imperfect corporation elected upon quite a different principle? In former days, the Lord Mayor of London was a person of considerable importance; but since the time of Beckford the municipality had been going down in public opinion, its chief offices were no longer sought for as distinctions, and it had become the mere plaything of people of no political importance, and served no useful purpose whatever. There were evils and inconveniences enough with which the right hon. Gentleman might have dealt; and which, if he refused to notice them, would, he hoped, be dealt with by a measure introduced by some independent Member. For instance, great loss and inconvenience arose from different parts of the metropolis being in different counties. For all municipal and legal purposes the metropolis ought to be formed into a single county, having one Recorder, with deputy Recorders for different districts, one nisi prius court, one jury system, and one sheriff; and thereby to secure uniformity of administration, a great relief to the inhabitants, and an impartial administration of justice. To effect such an arrangement would be worthy the exertions of a Secretary of State; but the measure now introduced was so incomplete and imperfect, that he trusted that the House would either send it to a Committee for improvement, or altogether refuse to proceed with it.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS said, he thought the Bill so objectionable he should much prefer the postponement of all legislation on the subject to accepting it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), some time ago promised them a Bill on this subject. Now he (Mr. Williams) wished that that right hon. Gentleman would frame a measure, for he confessed he would feel greater confidence in the manner in which he would deal with it than in the right hon. Gentleman who had introduced the subject that evening. It was perfectly well known that if a Lord Mayor did not treat the Common Council well, they held out a direct threat to him that they would not vote him thanks unless he mended his manners. Why should the Aldermen of London be elected for life in contradistinction to those of Manchester, Liverpool, and the other important cities and towns in England, who were elected for only six years. He should not oppose the introduction of the Bill, but if it were the same as that of last Session he hoped it would be dropped by the Government, or very materially altered. Such was the influence of the Corporation of London, arising from their convivial meetings at the Mansion House, that they had evidently triumphed over the good intentions of the Government. It remained for the House of Commons, however, to resist their attractions, and to hand over the municipal affairs of the metropolis to a governing body worthy of the name.

MR. ALDERMAN CUBITT wished to say a few words on behalf of an important portion of the citizens of London. The Livery consisted of from 10,000 to 15,000 persons, a large proportion of whom were men of great influence and of the highest respectability. In the Bill of last Session their existence was entirely ignored, much to the dissatisfaction of the Corporation itself. He hoped the same error would not be committed in the measure about to be introduced. The Livery ought to be retained in their present position.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he perfectly agreed with the last speaker that the Livery of London ought not to be forgotten. They were not confined within the walls of the city of London, but were spread throughout the whole metropolis, and his principal objection to the measure proposed to be introduced by the Home Secretary was that it dealt with a comparatively small portion of the metropolis. The Corporation of the City of London had already extended its limits; for a number of wards in the City were composed of districts which from time to time had been taken into and incorporated with the City of London. The Metropolitan Board of Works was intended to be something like a corporation for the whole of London, controlling its municipal Government in an essential respect, having the power of levying rates for improvements—a body, too, which he felt bound to say almost everybody disliked. By the fusion of the Metropolitan Board of Works with the Corporation of London an effective body might be constituted. This would be much better than having a second Guildhall in the neighbourhood of Charing Cross, where on the site of Berkeley House they were building a Palace for the Metropolitan Board of Works. If this Bill of the Government passed we should have two kings—the Lord Mayor and the Chairman of the Board of Works, with two grand establishments, the expense of which would fall on the inhabitants of the metropolis. Was this expedient? Why not, instead of passing this Bill, pursue the course formerly adopted, and extend and enlarge the Corporation—dividing the metropolis into wards, and making the Lord Mayor and Common Council the body which should govern the whole. To a body thus constituted the affairs of the entire metropolis might fairly be entrusted, and a great deal of unnecessary expense spared to the rate payers; for the funds and machinery of the Corporation were quite sufficient for a largely extended jurisdiction. But it had been said that by so doing we should create an imperium in imperio, and that even the Houses of Parliament and the Queen upon her throne would be obliged to succumb to the Corporation of London—but for these apprehensions there could be no grounds. The existing Corporation was powerful because it possessed large funds of its own, amounting to £60,000 a year, with which they could do as they pleased, derived not from rates but from property which it had inherited. But let the Corporation have a taxing power over the whole metropolis, and it would soon be unpopular enough. Devolve upon it the duties which were now performed by the Metropolitan Board of Works, convert it into a taxing body, and while its means of usefulness would be largely increased it would speedily find itself deprived of all that was improper in its influence. The Bill now brought in by the Government was, so far as he knew, totally inconsistent with its professed object, and was unworthy of the consideration of the House of Commons. He hoped to see before long a suitable measure laid before them.

state whether it was intended to legislate in reference to a point of considerable importance, affecting towns in the neighbourhood of London. Certain towns within a radius of twenty miles round London, suffered materially from the coal-tax, and the inhabitants of those towns thought it a hardship to be taxed for metropolitan purposes. The town he represented (Hertford) was involved in this hardship, and a great stretch of authority seemed to be allowed to the Corporation of London, when it was permitted them not only to impose a coal-tax on the metropolitan district, but also to extend the tax to a radius of twenty miles round, thus compelling towns within that distance to subscribe to metropolitan objects. He hoped that the Home Secretary would not afford the Corporation of London any reason for believing that they might continue to impose so unjust a tax.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it was quite true that Hertford was interested in the coal-tax, inasmuch as that town was included within the area where the coal duties were levied. The House was aware that the coal duties were made up of three different amounts, which were each disposed of in a different way. The total of these three amounts was 13*d.* per ton. The 4*d.* tax which was levied for the benefit of the City of London, the City claimed as its property, putting it on the same footing as the town duties of Liverpool and other municipal taxes, which, as the House would remember, were made the subject of discussion two or three Sessions ago. Whatever opinion might be formed by hon. Members on the matter, the City claimed that portion of the coal duties as part of the income of the City, which it had a right to appropriate to its own uses, and that portion was charged with the repayment of certain capital sums raised for metropolitan improvements and other purposes, which would not be satisfied for some years to come. With respect to the two other portions of the coal-tax, the 8*d.* and 1*d.* duties, these were applied not to the purposes of the City. They were collected by the officers of the City, but were paid over to the officers of the Board of Works, and were made applicable to the redemption of certain debts created for general metropolitan improvements. The purpose to which the 1*d.* duty was applicable was satisfied, and the sums receivable under the 1*d.* duty were now accumulating at the Bank of England, under the control of the Commissioners of Works. The 8*d.* duty would expire about April in next year. Such was the state of the coal duties, and it would probably be his duty to bring the subject under the attention of the House in the course of the present Session. He should not express any opinion of his own as to the propriety of that tax being levied over a radius of twenty miles; but he might observe that the ground upon which the levy of the coal duties in towns within that radius was vindicated was, that those towns were virtually within the metropolitan district; that their communications with the metropolis were frequent; that the value of the land was greatly enhanced by the vicinity of the metropolis, and that they were interested in the improvement of the roads and streets and other communications of London. He now merely stated the ground on which it was contended that there was an equitable right to levy the coal duties in those towns, but did not offer any opinion of his own as to the sufficiency of that ground.

MR. EDWIN JAMES deprecated this sort of piecemeal legislation, and would much prefer seeing the whole question of civic rights and civic finance placed on a broad and intelligible footing, and dealt with in one comprehensive measure. The present state of things was most anomalous. One day the Court of Common Council sat at Guildhall, another day the Board of Works, both possessing large powers. It would surely be better to have one measure which should deal at the same time with the municipal and electoral Questions. Here was the Government proposing to make the electoral franchise for the Common Council a £10 rating, which at one time, at least, the noble Lord at the head of the Government thought a £5 rating a sufficient qualification to vote for a Member of Parliament. He must designate the Bill of the Government as a paltry Bill, and one unworthy of the subject with which it proposed to deal and of the sanction of the House of Commons.

Leave given.

PACKET AND TELEGRAPHIC CONTRACTS

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he rose to propose the appointment of a Select Committee—

"To inquire into the manner in which Contracts extending over periods of years from time to time have been formed or modified by Her Majesty's Government with various Steam Packet Companies for the conveyance of Mails by Sea; and likewise into any agreements or other arrangements which have been adopted at the public charge, actual or prospective, for the purposes of telegraphic communications beyond sea, and to report their opinion thereon to the House; together with any Recommendations as to the rules to be observed hereafter by the Government in making Contracts for services which have not yet been sanctioned by Parliament, or which extend over a series of years."

He had little to do beyond proposing to the House the reappointment of the Committee, as the Motion carried with it its own recommendation, and he was not aware that there existed any intention to oppose the Motion. He only wished to say that one reason why he was anxious that the re-appointment of the Committee should take place at an early period was connected with the change which the Government were disposed to make in regard to a department which was henceforward to be considered responsible for what were called the packet estimates. At present, and for a considerable number of years, these packet estimates had been under the charge of the Admiralty; but the Government, after due examination of the matter, considered it desirable to make a change in that respect, and to hand over the principal charge and chief responsibility of them to the Post Office Department, with which they seemed more peculiarly connected. Upon the whole, that would be a more suitable arrangement. The Post Office would, of course, discharge its duty under the control of the Treasury, and in regard to the maritime portion of the duty would be assisted by the marine department of the Board of Trade, with the power of referring to the Admiralty in case of expediency. The Government thought the change desirable for the general advantage of the public service, but, at the same time, it would be proper that the Committee should have the opportunity of taking the subject under view if they thought fit, and delivering any opinion they might deem suitable to the merits of the case. With respect to the notice given by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) it was, of course, perfectly open to him to make the present Motion an opportunity for offering any comments on the conduct of the Committee which sat last year. He would not now by anticipation vindicate the conduct of that Committee—first, because he had not been a member of it, and, secondly, because he was not aware of any ground for impeaching its conduct; and, further, because he understood that the proceedings of the Committee, so far as related to the extent of the subject-matters to which attention should be applied, were proceedings unanimously taken by the Committee. He did not mean to say that the Committee were unanimous on all the questions they had to decide upon, but he was not aware of any difference of opinion arising as to their competency to inquire into the matters to which they did apply their attention. If he did not now further notice the subject involved in the notice of the right hon. Baronet, it must not be considered that there was any disposition on the part of the Government to censure the Committee, or to acquiesce in any censure which others might be disposed to pronounce. He would conclude these few observations by placing his Motion in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman, leaving the right hon. Baronet to address such remarks to the House as he might think fit. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by Moving the appointment of a Select Committee.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I rise now, according to the notice which I have given, to submit to the House certain considerations with regard to the manner in which the investigations of this Committee were conducted during the last Session of Parliament, and the manner in which, as it seems to me, it would be desirable they should be conducted during the present year. But, Sir, before I proceed to state those considerations, I wish to clear the ground by saying, that I do not intend on this occasion to enter at all into the evidence which has been printed in the blue-book, nor to touch upon the case of Mr. Churchward, and the contract that was made with him by the late Government for the conveyance of the mails from Dover to Calais and Dover to Ostend. The hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire (Captain Vernon) has given notice of a Resolution on this subject, which he intends to move next week. It is perfectly clear, I think, that a definite issue must be raised upon the report of that Committee, whether or not this House approves of the recommendation it contains that the contract with Mr. Churchward should be violated. It would not be consistent with the rules of Parliament that that issue should be raised on the Motion the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has just made for the reappointment of that Committee. It is, therefore, the intention of my hon. and gallant Friend, if I rightly understand his purpose, to move the Resolution I have mentioned for the purpose of raising that issue. For the same reason I will not touch upon the censure which that Committee have in their report passed upon Mr. Murray. I confess that I have a very strong opinion as to the grounds upon which it is stated that censure proceeded. The evidence on this question is so very much mixed up with the evidence relating to the conduct of Mr. Churchward that I think that if I were to enter into it I should inevitably bring on a highly inconvenient discussion with regard to both matters. I shall, therefore, limit myself to the object which has induced me to give this notice—that object being to raise the question whether the mode in which the examinations were conducted by the Committee and the shape in which they have drawn their report are consistent with a strict regard to justice or Parliamentary usage, but more especially whether it is consistent with the practice of this House in relation to all matters (I think I may speak in these general terms) which involve anything like a charge of personal misconduct. Now, Sir, I wish very much to submit the views I desire to express to the House in the most temperate language. I very much wish not to express and not to excite anything like angry feeling. I think in the discussion of this question last Session (and perhaps it was very natural that it should be so) there was mixed up a good deal of party heat and party acrimony; but it would be most desirable this year, at all events in this stage of the proceedings, that we should avoid so far as possible reviving any feeling of that sort. Now, I will, in the first place, remind the House of the acknowledged rule—and I believe that there is no rule more generally acknowledged—that our Select Committees are bound to keep themselves within the terms of their order of reference. For a long period this rule was what I may call part of the lex non scripta of this House; but in that very valuable work for which we are all, in my opinion, very much indebted to Mr. Erskine May, one of the clerks at the table, and which I believe is quite accepted as a manual of Parliamentary practice, the necessity of confining Committees to their order of reference is strictly laid down. It becomes, therefore, no longer a lex non scripta, for Mr. May, in a few precise, strong words, has expressed it to be thus:—

“Like a Committee of the Whole House, a select Committee are restrained from considering matters not specially referred to them by the House. When it is thought necessary to extend their inquiries beyond the order of reference a special instruction from the House gives them authority for that purpose.”

Now, I think that every Gentleman, on both sides of the House, will admit that if this be recognized as the law of Parliament in all cases, it is more especially necessary that it should be observed with greater stringency than ever in any case in which it becomes the duty of a Select Committee to investigate any questions touching the honour and character of an individual. Our honour and our character, as I need not state to the House, is the most precious possession that we have. No doubt it becomes our painful duty now and then to entertain in this House charges against the conduct of individuals; but I am sure that there is not a man on either side of this House who will question the propriety of what I say, when I state broadly my opinion that whenever it becomes our duty to entertain charges of personal misconduct, be they what they may, it behoves us and our Committees to be scrupulously cautious that every such charge is treated with the strictest regard to all the requirements of justice. I will now, with the permission of the House, call its attention to the terms of that part of the order of reference which was to guide this Committee in its inquiries respecting the Mail Packet Contracts; but I shall pass over that which relates to the Telegraph Contracts, because it has nothing to do with the question now before us. It says,

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the manner in which Contracts extending over periods of years have from time to time been framed or modified by her Majesty's Government, with various Steam Packet Companies for the conveyance of the Mails by sea, together with any recommendation as to the rules to be observed hereafter by the Government in the making Contracts for services which have not yet been sanctioned by Parliament, or which extend over a series of years.”

Those are the terms of the order of reference, and having read them I will now read a passage from the report of the Committee, which, I think, seems to show that the conduct of the Committee was not limited so strictly as it ought to have been by the terms of the order:—

"It further appears to your Committee that neither at the Admiralty nor at the Treasury were the officers with whom the decision rested influenced in granting the renewal of the contract by any corrupt or political motive. But your Committee consider that the conduct of Mr. Murray, the private Secretary of the First Lord of the Admiralty, was open to grave censure, but they have not sufficient evidence to show that any member of the Government was cognizant of the communications that took place between Mr. Murray, Mr. Churchward, and Captain Carnegie."

Now, I cannot help very confidently thinking that hardly any Gentleman will rise in his place to tell me that this paragraph in the report is in accordance with the order of reference. I cannot think that any Gentleman will be of opinion that the order of reference justified the Committee in undertaking either to acquit, to convict, or to censure any gentleman for personal misconduct. I certainly did expect, nay, more, I desired and fully expected that this Committee would institute a full and searching inquiry into the principles and the policy upon which these contracts had been made. I further expected that they would investigate and report their opinion upon the wisdom and prudence with which successive Governments may have made these contracts. But, Sir, I did not expect that they would enter into the question of personal corruption or personal misconduct, which, in my opinion, had not been referred to them, and with which, further, I maintain they were not competent to deal. If this Committee had the right or the authority to acquit, why, then, of course they had the right to convict and to censure. Perhaps it may be said that my colleagues and myself ought to be obliged to the Committee for having acquitted us of every charge of corruption. But, Sir, I answer that we were in no sense before them. No charge of political misconduct was preferred, and I maintain that they had not, morally or legally, the right to enter into any such question, nor had they the right to negative such issues as personal misconduct. The right to acquit or to convict involves, as a matter of course, a trial. To have a fair trial two things are essential—namely, a distinct and specific accusation, and a competent tribunal; and I am prepared to maintain that in this case both those elements were wanting. I have heard that in reply to observations of this kind it has been said on behalf of the Committee, "Very true, we had no authority to inquire into misconduct or to try any charge of corruption on the part of individuals, but there was an understanding in the House that we should enter into these questions." Now I have two answers to that. In the first place I deny the existence of any such understanding. But even if there were the understanding I say further that I protest in the strongest terms against the idea that the conduct of any man—that a charge of corruption or misconduct against any man—can be referred to an incompetent tribunal upon an understanding unless the man is a party to that understanding. Therefore the Committee was not justified in travelling as they did beyond the powers which this House entrusted to them. But, Sir, I am prepared to deny that any such understanding took place, and I rest my denial upon the debates which took place last Session with respect to the appointment and the duties of this Committee. I think that the highest authority to which I can refer is the language of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who moved for the appointment of the Committee, and I beg to remind him and the House that he rested his Motion solely and exclusively on the ground of public policy. In his speech he referred to several considerations which rendered the appointment of such a Committee desirable. He dwelt upon the great extent to which these contracts had increased; and, if I recollect rightly, upon the question whether a system had not grown up with these contracts which practically had the effect of taking them out of the jurisdiction of the House of Commons. He also dwelt upon another most important question—namely, the policy of granting subsidies with these contracts. Then, after touching upon the increase of the expense which also had arisen, the right hon. Gentleman moved for this Committee, but throughout resting his Motion exclusively upon these important public grounds—amply sufficient, as I think the House will feel, for the Motion he made, but not intimating in any way, that I recollect, that this Committee was to be made the engine of attack or recrimination upon any individual. Well, then, the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Crawford) also spoke upon that debate. He strongly approved of the appointment of the Committee, and dwelt, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had done, upon the public grounds by which it was supported. He used the expression that "He did not think it was so much a question whether the making of a particular contract was to be charged as a ground of censure against this or that Government. Other hon. Gentlemen also spoke.

Some of the speeches made were of a strong party character. Party feeling, at all events, was strong at that moment. But I think I am justified in saying that the tone of the debate was entirely in harmony with the tone adopted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and tended to this view of the question, that the object of that Committee was to entertain questions of public policy alone. Well, Sir, another debate shortly after ensued. It arose in consequence of the presentation of a petition by the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. E. P. Bouverie), from Sir William Russell who prayed that the Committee might be restrained from entering into the question of the Dovor contract because they might prejudice his interests in respect of an election petition then pending. The speech in which the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock introduced the Motion he made for that purpose was marked by a good deal of party spirit; but the reason why I have referred to it is, that in that speech the right hon. Gentleman expressed in very strong terms, in terms indeed as strong as I could use now, his opinion that the Committee was not a fit tribunal to investigate personal charges if personal charges should be preferred; and he gave his reasons for that opinion. In those reasons I entirely concurred; in some others that he gave at the same time I did not concur, but I quite agreed with that conclusion. Well, Sir, he was followed amongst others by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Hertford (Mr. Cowper), who, in a speech, not of the most kindly description as far as it regarded Gentlemen on this side of the House, also expressed an opinion in which again I entirely concurred, namely, that if personal charges were to be brought forward in connection with these contracts, they ought undoubtedly to be referred to a judicial Committee. The consequence of these two speeches was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer rose at the end of the debate, and particularly referring to the opinions they had expressed as to the unfitness of that Committee for judicial duties, he said,—

“The Committee was not appointed for the purpose of conducting certain cases of criminatory accusations against any Government in particular. It was not to try the case of Dovor or Galway in any other spirit than that in which it would be its duty to examine every other case of contract that might come before it.”

Now, Sir, I do not know what construction the right hon. Gentleman may now put upon those words, but I have no hesitation in telling him the construction not only that I put upon them now, but that I placed upon them then; and it was this. They were uttered in answer to the objection that the Committee was not a competent judicial tribunal, and they meant, as I took them, that it was the intention of the Government and of right hon. Gentlemen that that Committee should enter into questions of public principle and public policy, and into nothing else. I feel convinced that that must have been the meaning of the right hon. Gentleman, because if, at the moment he used those words, he had had it in his mind that the Committee were to be at liberty to asperse the character of an individual, and be at liberty to enter into charges of or accusations, whatever they might be, of corruption (none were ever before formally preferred that I know of), and to acquit or convict upon those charges, dealing, therefore, with the honour and character of individuals—if such were the case, I think the right hon. Gentleman was bound to state it to the House, after what had fallen from those other right hon. Gentlemen who had spoken before him. I accepted, therefore, the construction I had alluded to, and I made no objection whatever to the appointment of the Committee, thinking it a most proper step on the part of the Government to adopt. But I must at once state this to the House, that if I had at that moment had an idea that that Committee were going, not only to investigate the public policy involved in the making of those contracts, but the characters of individuals, and to presume to acquit and censure on imputations of personal misconduct or corruption, nothing would have induced me to consent to the appointment of that Committee, constituted as it was. But now, Sir, let me state to the House the grounds on which I rest my assertion of the unfitness of that Committee for the investigation of anything like personal character, and let me add that I do so from the conviction that there is no member of it who can feel the least objection to the grounds which I am obliged to state. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the speech I have referred to, said that he thought the Committee ought to be most carefully selected, and I am free to admit that he fully redeemed his pledge—I say this, keeping in mind the two speeches that he made, and the intention which I have stated was to be inferred from them—so far as the investigation of that important question, what were the principles and the public policy which ought to govern these contracts was concerned. I am free to admit that the time had arrived for that investigation, and I also admit that I do not think it was possible for the right hon. Gentleman to select a Committee better qualified for carrying out that object. It contained several very distinguished members, and it was presided over by a most able member of this House; indeed, in that unusually large Committee, I do not think there was one man to whom I should have taken exception as one not thoroughly qualified to deal with the question stated. I own that my own individual opinion is always opposed to extending the number of Members composing Committees beyond fifteen; this consisted of nineteen Members, and considering the work they were appointed to do, and the questions I supposed were submitted to them, they could not have been better chosen. But, Sir, I am bound to state at the same time, that I do not think nineteen gentlemen could have been selected more unfit to enter upon an investigation or trial of any charge affecting the character or honour of an individual hon. Member of this House, or, indeed, of any one else. In this I hope I may not be misunderstood. I say it with no disrespectful feeling towards any of the members of that Committee. But my charge against them is this:—In the first place, whatever I may think about the prudence of appointing very large Committees to conduct any ordinary matter, I have no hesitation in saying that the appointment of a very numerous Committee to investigate anything like personal charges is not only opposed to the practice of the House, but it is opposed to all notions of a prudential character. But who were these Gentlemen? I look down the names, and I find men of high character, position, and credit; but I look in vain (I hope I do none of them an injustice) throughout the whole of that list for one man connected with the profession of the law. I find scarcely one that can be acquainted with the laws of evidence. I do not find a single Gentleman amongst them who is conversant with the mode in which business is transacted in our courts of law, who has ever been accustomed to judicial investigation of any kind, and who, therefore, is at all capable of conducting a judicial investigation as it ought to be conducted. Now, Sir, I am not sure that I can give the House a better idea of the objection I feel to the constitution of that Committee for the purpose I am now referring to, than by alluding to the examination of witnesses as conducted by their very able Chairman (Mr. Cobden). He is not now present, but I presume I am not irregular in thus alluding to him. There is no Member of this House less inclined than I am to speak with disrespect of the hon. Member for Rochdale. I trust, therefore, that I shall not be misapprehended in the observations that I am about to make. But any hon. Gentleman reading the examinations conducted by the hon. Member for Rochdale, will come to the same conclusions that I have arrived at—first, that he is a very acute and able man; secondly, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not have selected a better man to superintend an investigation into the policy of the contracts in question; but, thirdly, that he could not have selected a worse man to conduct an investigation into the conduct of individuals. I appeal with confidence to any lawyer who has read the questions that will be found in the blue-book containing the evidence taken on that inquiry, and which were put by the hon. Member for Rochdale, and I ask him his opinion of those questions. I say they were questions which I believe would never have been allowed to be put in any court of justice in the kingdom, or before any other judicial tribunal where a proper course of examination and investigation is understood and pursued. There are, in my opinion, strong reasons why the Committee fell into the error—the only error that I charge them with. I do not suppose that any member of the Committee intended to do that which was wrong, or unfair, or inconsistent with Parliamentary practice. I make no charge of that sort against them, but I wish to express my belief that the Committee were led into the error of assuming to themselves powers that they did not possess, and of discharging duties for which they were, for reasons I have mentioned, unfitted. Upon these grounds I certainly shall object to a repetition of any such an investigation on any such principle. What the intentions of the Government may be I know not, but I do think that the proceedings before the Committee last year were such as to make it very desirable that we should now distinctly understand what the Committee, if reappointed, is to be. If the Committee is to go into an investigation of those principles of public policy to which I have referred, I entirely concur in the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman; nay, I will go further, and say I think that he could not do better than reappoint the same Committee. But, on the other hand, if that Committee, on its reappointment, is to deal with the character of individuals—if they are to entertain and to try anything like serious charges affecting the character of individuals—then I cannot consent to a repetition of such an investigation by a body of men, who, I think, are so entirely unfitted for the purpose. And here let me repudiate in the strongest terms—I beg it may not be for a moment thought that in the observations I am now making, the members of the late Government shrink from any investigation. On the contrary, we court it, we invite it. If there is any man in this House who thinks that any man connected with the late Government was influenced in the discharge of his public duties by motives of corruption, or by dishonest motives—from which I have no hesitation in saying we should shrink with indignation—if any such opinion as that is entertained, let it be avowed, and let the issue be tried. In that case I have a right to require and demand, that if such opinions are entertained no one should shrink from getting up to avow and proclaim them, and in that case I have a right to demand two conditions. The one is that there shall be a specific charge and accusation; and the other is that such specific charge shall be referred to a competent tribunal. I may remind the House that there is no lack of precedent upon the matter. Any hon. Gentleman who has sat for a considerable time in this House must recollect case after case of that painful kind in which charges against individuals have been brought forward, and I believe I am right in saying that the way in which the House has uniformly dealt with the matter, has been to appoint the Committee to investigate the particular subject, and not to enter into a fishing examination on the question to see if they could not find out any charges to be brought against the Government. The uniform practice of the House I believe has been this, to refer the charge to a Committee specially appointed with particular regard to its fitness for its duty, and as far as my experience goes, and I think no one will contradict me, there have been always three conditions observed in the selection of such a Committee. The first of these conditions has been, that instead of being an unusually large Committee, such Committee has been unusually small, with the very obvious and proper motive of increasing and concentrating its responsibility. The second condition has been, that there shall be at least some Members of the learned profession on the Committee who should be capable of guiding the inquiries before such Committee in a proper manner, and taking care that no injustice was done to the parties whose conduct had to be inquired into. The third condition was, that the remaining members of the Committee should be constituted, so far as it was possible, of men who were perfectly free from any party prejudice or party interest. I trust, therefore, that in the remainder of the investigation—if there are any more grounds for suspicion with regard to the conduct of the late Government—I hope that what I say will not be forgotten. I hope we shall have a specific accusation brought before the House, and that a Committee will be appointed competent to try these matters. I trust that in making these observations I have adhered to the intention I began with of neither expressing nor exciting angry feelings. I have made these observations without questioning the motives of the Committee, and I hope without saying anything that any member of the Committee might take exception to; but I strongly hold, whatever may have led them into this course, that in so taking it they did not act consistently with the order of reference, and practically, although I am sure not with such an intention, consistently with the ends of justice. I do trust that if we are to have any painful investigation of this kind we shall take care not to infuse into it the elements of party feeling; but that after the investigation has taken place we shall all look back upon what we have done with a full conviction that we have done it with a proper regard to the interests of justice, and with a due consideration for the character and reputation of this House.

SIR FRANCIS BARING:—I am sorry the Chairman of the Committee is unfortunately absent, so that it falls to me to make some observations in answer to the right hon. Baronet. Any public man in the discharge of public duties is a legitimate object of criticism, and no member of the Committee has any reason to complain that the right hon. Baronet has thought fit to bring their conduct before the House. I am glad, however, that the right hon. Baronet has, by limiting his remarks to the question whether the Committee were justified in the course they took and fit to conduct the inquiries upon which they entered, relieved me of anything like pain in replying to him. I rejoice that the question has been brought forward now, because it relates not only to the past but to the future; and as a Committee is about to be appointed to investigate some other cases with regard to contracts, and as the conduct of Government officials in certain transactions has been questioned, it is right the Committee should know what course they are to pursue for the future in their inquiries, and whether they are or are not at liberty to extend their inquiries into matters which relate to personal misconduct. As far as I understand the tenor of the right hon. Baronet's observations, he maintains, first, that the Committee of last year was unfit to conduct a judicial inquiry, and next, that the order of reference gave them no authority for carrying their examination the length they did. Now, I am not prepared to stand up here and say that any Committee I ever saw appointed by this House was well fitted to conduct a judicial inquiry. You cannot, in this assembly, find judges on any question who shall come up to the standard of strict judicial impartiality, and are consequently obliged to select so many from one side and so many from the other, and allow the truth to be evolved by the discussions between them. But on the whole I do not think, as far as my experience goes, that upon a personal question you find that the verdict is dictated by party motives, not the honest feeling of honourable men, or that a political man seeks merely to gratify political animosity, and run down the personal character of his opponents. I may allude in proof of this to the very Committee we are speaking of. It so happens that we condemned both parties. I am afraid we must not look for thanks to the Treasury Bench, because we found fault with the conduct of the very men whose political supporters we are, and condemned an arrangement made by one of my most intimate personal friends upon this side of the House. It is not my business, however, to defend the composition of the Committee, that was the work of the House itself, and if faulty, or not properly cast, should have been objected to at the time it was nominated. When the right

Baronet spoke of a judicial inquiry, I did remind him that the verdict of a
Sir Francis Baring

Committee, selected after the most approved fashion, is seldom more satisfactory to the parties whom it condemns than that of one appointed in the ordinary way. There was a great inquiry upon the administration of the Admiralty during the Government of which the right hon. Baronet was a member; it was conducted by five Gentlemen appointed by the Committee of Selection, in the most judicial manner, and who came to a unanimous decision. Surely the verdict of such a Committee, one would suppose, must have commanded the respect and confidence of the House. Not at all; it led to a long debate, and the right hon. Baronet himself so far from being satisfied with a decision arrived at in the most judicial manner, was among the first to denounce it as characterized by party prejudice and party bias. As I have said, it is not for me to defend the selection of the Committee, but I do not know that it would have been more likely to gain the confidence of the right hon. Baronet if it had been selected judicially. The next point is whether the House gave authority to the Committee to inquire into what we did inquire or not. I confess that the difficulty never struck me, and it is very remarkable that I do not think it ever struck any one member of the Committee. We had not the slightest notion that the construction which the right hon. Baronet seeks to put upon that order of reference was the construction which we were bound to observe. He has said that we were wanting in lawyers, but I am afraid that even some lawyers were on the Committee. At all events, we had Gentlemen who came from the opposite side, and I should have thought they would have stated any objection which they felt to our exceeding our power. But, if we look at the minutes of our proceedings, not the slightest objection will be found to have been taken by those Members to the course which we followed, or that they themselves abstained from going into those questions which it is now said we should have avoided. The right hon. Baronet says that in the course of the debate he understood distinctly that it was never intended the Committee should go into personal charges, and he quotes the discussion on Sir W. Russell's petition. I look back to that discussion, and I confess that I am surprised the right hon. Baronet after reading it should have given as the result that which, to my mind, is just the reverse. First we have the hon. Baronet (Sir S. Northcote), who claimed that the inquiry into transactions with regard to Dover should not be skin deep. I think he was quite right. I am stating only what in his notion the inquiry ought to be, and, having mentioned his name, I may add that, although he took views in which a majority of the Committee did not concur, he gave every facility to make the inquiry efficient. Then we have the late Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Whiteside), who submitted that the late Government had a right to demand that the charges made against them should, without delay, be inquired into by that Committee, in whose honour every hon. Member ought to be prepared to repose the most implicit confidence. He said the late Government had a right to inquiry by that Committee, and now we are told that it was extremely improper that the Committee should have inquired at all. I am surprised that the right hon. Baronet, if he were in the House, did not rise to contradict his hon. and learned Friend, and to say that it was not in the least intended the inquiry should extend to anything connected with personal questions. The right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) followed, and, although he may not be a lawyer, he is a chairman of quarter sessions. That right hon. Member said, on that occasion, that everybody concurred in opinion that there ought to be an investigation into the charges which had been made. We did investigate. I do not suppose that every hon. Gentleman will agree in the opinion to which we came. Upon that there will naturally be a difference of opinion, but I do say the inquiry was as fairly conducted as it could well be. I think I have shown that, as far as regards the expectation of the House itself, the inquiry into personal charges was expected, and most of all by hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. It was claimed and pressed by them, and I can hardly believe that Gentlemen will now change their tone and blame the Committee for doing that which they suffered those who sat by their side to demand when the Committee was first appointed. Is there anything in the words of the reference to prevent inquiry? The Committee are to inquire "into the mode in which contracts have been made." Supposing there had been a practice of regularly paying certain officers for passing contracts, what would be the use of the Committee if they were not to inquire into that? What is the use of telling certain gentlemen to inquire, and, at the same time, that the moment there is anything personal or not commonplace, their inquiry is to close? If the House think as I do, I hope they will say so. I only wish I had never been put on the Committee. It was by far the most disagreeable of any Committee upon which I ever sat in my life, and I shall be very glad to be relieved from it. But it is of importance that Committees in future should know whether, when the strict words of the reference are in their favour, they are to be stopped from going fully into the question of improper transactions. I hope that in some shape we shall ascertain what Committees are to do—whether they are to be free or tied down as the right hon. Baronet suggests. I have carefully avoided going into the details of the evidence, or anything which relates to personal questions. I have no wish at all—very far from it—to repeat opinions which I held in the Committee, and there is no Gentleman here but must feel that having to balance contradictory statements is an extremely painful and very unpleasant task. It was with great regret that I went into all those disagreeable matters, and I can assure the right hon. Baronet that, as far as I am concerned, I have no intention of saying a word unnecessarily in censure of any of the parties who were brought before the Committee.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: I entirely agree with the observations of the right hon. Baronet who has just sat down on the great importance, with regard to the future conduct of this Committee, or of any similar Committee, that some expression of opinion on the part of the House should be given relative to the specific subjects of inquiry to be brought under their investigation. The impression that I derive from sitting day after day on that Committee was not the impression that was derived from it by the right hon. Baronet, and which he has just given to the House. The right hon. Baronet said there was no difference of opinion amongst the members of the Committee as to the validity of the course the Committee pursued, and I understood my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the few observations that he made, to intimate a similar opinion; but as a member of the Committee, I may say, that repeatedly were objections made in the Committee-room to the course of investigation that the Committee appeared to be determined to enter on; and if there was no actual division of opinion taken, it may easily be explained when one recollects that no fewer than four members of that Committee were members of the late Government, whose conduct was supposed to be impugned before that very Committee. Repeatedly did I say—"This is an investigation which, in justice to the parties implicated, ought not to be persevered in." I felt, however, as my colleagues in the late Government felt, that if we pressed and persevered in our opposition, it would at once be said by those who were actuated by party pique and party rancour that we were endeavouring to shield ourselves from an investigation that we fully courted. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Francis Baring) said, there was an inconsistency, because my right hon. Friend near me (Sir John Pakington) says the Committee was improperly constituted for the investigation of personal charges, whereas no such objection was raised at the time the Committee was appointed. But I agree with my right hon. Friend that when the Committee was appointed it was not anticipated that personal questions would be brought before us. The Committee was confined to the subject of contracts, and the reference on which we acted was couched in the most clear and explicit terms. Now, I draw the distinction, and I make this concession to the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Portsmouth, that if the conduct of any members of the late Government should seem to have been implicated in the course of the investigation, for the conduct of which we were appointed, there would then be no objection to the course which the Committee actually took. But the complaint of my right hon. Friend and myself is that, travelling far beyond the legitimate limits of the questions which were referred to them, the Committee went wholly out of the beaten course, and implicated the conduct and character of individuals who were not before them, and who were not members of the late Government at all, in a way that was quite unprecedented, and that, as I felt then, and still feel, was eminently unfair. The right hon. Gentleman knows, that in the course of these proceedings repeated objections were taken by myself and by other members to this course of proceeding; I said then, and when the further occasion which we are promised arises I shall repeat, that this course was unfair. While entertaining the deepest respect for the members of that Committee, I am still anxious that the House

shall say how far this great Committee, consisting of nineteen members, shall proceed in this special course of inquiry, because, as a member of the late Government, I feel, after what has already occurred, that I shall be out of my place on the Committee, and that if the same kind of questions as were brought up last year are to continue to be investigated, then the members of the late Government ought not to be upon it to decide on what, to some, may appear to be their own case; and, further, I feel that our presence is unfair to the claims of other persons not members of the late Government, whose claims might be defended with greater freedom than we can possibly do, on account of the offices we formerly held, and the charges that have been brought against us. I must solemnly protest if this investigation is to go on, against its being referred to a tribunal of the kind. Entertaining this opinion, if it is the pleasure of this House to re-appoint this Committee, and, if it is, further, the pleasure of the House to refer to it questions of this delicate and painful nature—a course against which I protest—I hope the House will relieve me from the unpleasant duty of being a member of a Committee where my services can be of no use, but must rather be a hindrance to a full investigation of the subject, and to that full and free defence which other persons not members of the Government are entitled to expect at our hands.

SIR FRANCIS BARING explained, that he certainly remembered a division of opinion in the Committee as to whether certain questions ought or ought not to be put, but with all deference to the noble Lord he did not remember any difference of opinion as to the course of the inquiry.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: There is something peculiar in the speech of the noble Lord. He has now taken an opportunity to protest against the decision of a Committee of which he was a member, he, during the whole time, having sat patiently by, voted upon every question, and yet made no protest. I confess I have great temptation to go fully into this case, for I entertain a strong opinion both on the composition of the Committee and the judgment to which it came, but I shall resist that temptation; and I think it would have been wiser and more discreet on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) if, instead of now raising a debate on this question, he had left the matter in the hands of a Member of the Committee who has given notice of a Motion in reference to it for next week, since it is inconvenient to have two discussions upon the same subject. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich says that this was not a competent tribunal. I agree with him that it was not a competent tribunal, but I agree with him for different reasons. I think the present Government, or rather the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was greatly to blame for the formation of the Committee; but I don't find that the right hon. Gentleman took any exception to its constitution at the proper time. What were the circumstances attending its constitution? Instead of having the usual number of fifteen Members, nineteen were appointed; and what was the reason alleged for that course by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer? Why, that he was obliged to put four extra members on the Committee, they being members of the late Government. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich has been vapouring a little to-night. "Show me (says he) any specific charge." I took the liberty to bring forward a specific charge last Session, and to say that I suspected and had strong grounds for suspecting that the right hon. Gentleman the late First Lord of the Admiralty had tampered with the exercise of the elective franchise at Dover by bringing the Admiralty influence to bear upon it. That was notorious, and was one reason for the appointment of the Committee. Sir William Russell made the same allegation in his Petition. So that if the right hon. Gentleman wanted a direct charge, there it stood, pointing directly at the late First Lord of the Admiralty and his private Secretary. When the Committee was appointed the Chancellor of the Exchequer entered into a private arrangement, as it appears to me, with the hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford (Sir S. Northcote), and with right hon. Gentlemen on the other side. It was, in fact, an agreement to hush up the inquiry altogether; and was nicely arranged on the old Scotch system of "Scratch me and I'll scratch you." The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) suspected as much, and protested at the time against the constitution of the Committee, adding that if the House really wished to have an impartial and trustworthy inquiry the Committee ought to be nominated by the Committee of Selection. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich talks about there being no legal members on the Committee. At least one-fifth of the Committee, however, were judges in their own case, and so much was this felt to be so that the hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford, though he took part in the proceedings and put questions to bring out the case for his friends with more ability than most lawyers would have shown, could not sit in the Committee when it came to a vote, but left the room. The noble Lord (Lord J. Manners), however, voted manfully upon every division, and yet now, forsooth! he will not serve any longer. The truth is that this is an attempt to whitewash the private secretary of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich. He was a member of the Conservative Committee for managing the Elections — a circumstance to which the right hon. Gentleman must have been privy. There never was such a Committee in the world as that which sat to inquire into the Dover contract. One fifth of them being accused of tampering with the elective franchise at Dover were actually judges in their own case. Surely the House will see through the veil attempted to be thrown over this transaction. In spite of all the management exhibited, a verdict of guilty has been returned, and then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich, discontented with that, turns round and says the Committee did not quite act according to the order of reference. I have been looking back to that matter, and that being so I was a little surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman make such an assertion, remembering that for twenty-five years he was a chairman of quarter sessions, and that his public services have recently been commemorated by the presentation of a magnificent silver-gilt shield. I don't see in any of the compartments of that splendid shield, illustrating those branches of the public service to which the right hon. Baronet is supposed to have devoted himself—namely, the navy, the colonies, education, and justice—any view of Dover, or any medallion of his private secretary; and I would recommend him, in the event of his having any supplementary shield presented to him, to devote a whole compartment of it to a pictorial illustration of that interesting seaport. What, I ask, were the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in moving for this Committee on the 7th of July? He said,

"If the Committee were appointed it would be the study of the Government—and he hoped they would receive the assistance of others who were qualified to aid them—to select the names of those hon. Members who were to constitute it, with the view of securing, as far as possible, an impartial and thorough-going inquiry.”

Mr. Gladstone is not always so plain, and nobody could have been mistaken as to what the right hon. Gentleman meant by “an impartial and thorough-going inquiry.” He added, “with regard to the scope of the inquiry, he was desirous that it should be as wide as possible.” There was no mistake about that, but yet no objection was made on that occasion by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich. Acting in accordance with the advice given by Lord Brougham to the late Mr. Zachary Macaulay in reference to his illustrious son, he generally speaks on every question. But on that occasion he never said a single word. But on the 12th of July, when the Committee was nominated, the hon. Member for Stamford, the late Secretary to the Treasury, was unusually animated. Laying aside his ordinarily calm, business-like manner, he became indignant:—

“This inquiry (said he) ought not to be skin-deep, but fully and properly gone into, and he believed the more the subject was inquired into, the more it would redound to the credit, and not discredit, of the late Government. The subject was one which could not properly be discussed in that House, but should be referred to a Select Committee; and if it were discussed without the assistance of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), it might be said that the Committee had not been appointed fairly, nor the subject properly gone into. This Committee would have to go into the whole question as to what were the principles upon which the packet contracts were founded, and they would have to state whether the Galway, Dovor, and other contracts were right or wrong.” [3 Hansard, cliv. p. 1086.]

Did the hon. Baronet make any protest in the Committee as to the line of examination which was being pursued? No; but he put as able questions as any lawyer could have done; and, what was more, he refused—and properly refused—to vote on a matter in which he conceived himself to be a judge in his own case. I say it is a very unfortunate thing that the right hon. Baronet did not take this exception before. He is a chairman of quarter sessions, and ought to know that it is unlawyer-like to challenge the constitution of a jury to which he had assented. I say that the Committee from first to last had a most suspicious character. It was acknowledged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that in its formation he found a great difficulty because of these four Gentlemen being put upon it. However, he got over it, and I will say no more about it; but I do hope that, on the appointment of this new Committee which the House is called upon to appoint, it will be appointed upon different grounds, and composed of different men from the last; and, in my judgment, the House would act wisely if it referred the nomination of the Committee to the Committee of Selection. Do not let us have any arrangements made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer with his late private secretary the hon. Member for Stamford—no endeavours to hush up this question; and when the verdict has been delivered, do not let us have any of the members of the Committee coming here and declaring that he objects to the formation of the Committee and its conclusions. I thought at the time that the House made a false move, when a Petition was presented from Sir W. Russell, who had charged the late Government with having interfered with his election, that it should have gone into the Dovor case at all. How stands the case now? You are going next week to debate upon the evidence in this blue-book, and a Committee will probably be struck next week to try the Dovor election petition. I maintain, if the House wishes to retain public respect, and to avoid such scenes as this, it should refer the nomination of the Committee to the Committee of Selection upstairs. By the way, I may observe, that although the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) claims the verdict of the Committee as one of acquittal, in fact it was no such thing—it only amounted to a verdict of not proven; but I tell the right hon. Baronet fairly that I cannot believe that he, with his legal experience and his acquaintance with business, could ever have allowed his private secretary to take the part he did without his knowledge; and until he explicitly denies it I shall continue to disbelieve. The right hon. Gentleman volunteered to be examined before the Committee, but his memory was singularly defective in this case, and he quite forgot that he had given orders to Captain Carnegie to go down and contest Dovor, until Captain Carnegie produced a letter from his private secretary, and then the right hon. Gentleman found he had made a mistake. As far as Dovor is concerned, I bear the right hon. Gentleman no ill-will. I am disposed to say let bygones be bygones, for I feel rather grateful to him for getting me away from there. But there is another consideration. What is the effect upon the people of this country as to their views of Parliamentary Committees of this House? The right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir F. Baring) says that no Committee is to be trusted, and that is the decision to which the country is coming. You are urging on a measure of reform though the country is said to be so apathetic, and do you not see the end? If anybody will support me, I will oppose altogether the nomination of this Committee by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for I feel convinced, that if you are to have any fairness in the nomination you must refer it to the Committee upstairs. Let it not be a matter of arrangement between the two front benches. All Governments, no doubt, wish these things to be hushed up. They are disagreeable matters to raise; but if you wish the decision of the Committee to go to the public with authority and weight, let the Members of this House insist that the nomination be left to the Committee of Selection.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he had not intended to take any part in this discussion; but after the astonishing statement of the hon. Gentleman, who had just sat down, he felt bound to assure the House—and he was sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer would bear him out in it—that there had been no kind of agreement or private arrangement or compact whatever between him and the Chancellor of the Exchequer with respect to the appointment of this Committee, and he was quite at a loss to know on what grounds the hon. Gentleman made such a charge. He believed, indeed, the list of the Committee was shown him before the nomination; it was usual to show the list to those who took an interest in the question and to those who were asked to serve, and in both those capacities the list of the Committee, after it was drawn up, was shown to him. But as to any private arrangement or compact as to its composition he could assure the hon. Gentleman there was no foundation for it whatever. He differed from his right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich to some extent as to the course taken by the Committee, for bearing in mind that this very Committee had arisen to some extent out of charges made against the late Government, he thought it probable that the Committee would inquire into those charges in respect to certain contracts that were challenged. And when Sir William Russell presented a petition, praying that the Committee would not enter into the case of the Dovor contract till his petition were considered in Committee, he (Sir S. Northcote), speaking on the part of himself and his colleagues, had felt it his duty to say they were anxious the matter should be inquired into. For himself, he never objected to the course the Committee took; but he could bear out the statement of the noble Lord the Member for Leicestershire (Lord J. Manners), that once or twice in the course of the inquiry Members of the Committee expressed their opinion that they were travelling out of the record. He had never supported that view; the majority of the Committee was always against it; but he was bound to say that it had been urged. When he urged an inquiry, he did not expect the kind of evidence that would be brought before them. The charge against them was that they had renewed a particular contract without sufficient public grounds and from a suspected corrupt political motive. Now, as he knew that he was the person who in the last resort had sanctioned that contract, and that he had done so purely on public grounds, he was anxious that the matter should be thoroughly investigated. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. B. Osborne), had condemned the Committee because four members of the Government were appointed on it. But unless that were the cause the persons who were accused would have no opportunity of making their defence. Either they must appoint Gentlemen who understood the case, and then they ran a risk of partiality; or they must secure impartiality by appointing Gentlemen who knew nothing of the subject; and then the danger of a partial report was just as great, because there would be no one to elicit those facts which ought to be brought in justice to those interested in the case. He confessed he did not see his way to a solution of this problem, but he could assure the hon. Gentleman opposite that there was no foundation for his charge of a compact between the late and the present Government or to the appointment of a Committee.

MR. HOPE said, that as a member of the Committee he felt bound to bear testimony to the fairness of its proceedings. He so far agreed with the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth, that he did not recollect any substantial question being raised of the Committee going beyond its legitimate bounds—at least there was no formal discussion on the point, and certainly no division was taken. He had objected at first to serve on the Committee because he foresaw that it would lead to strong personal conflicts, and he should be very happy to be relieved from future attendance. It was not for him to defend the composition of the Committee, but if the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. B. Osborne) would look to the proceedings of the Committee he would find that in every division the Members of the late Government were in a minority, and therefore that no one of the recommendations made by the Committee were adopted in consequence of their opinion. In the main, however, he was happy to say the Committee were unanimous, and he would leave it to the House to say whether a Committee that was unanimous in its main decisions was not worthy of confidence.

MR. H. HERBERT said, he hoped that if the members of the Committee were to be reappointed there would be some distinct understanding as to how far it was to go, and how far the words of the reference were to cover its inquiry. Having taken a great interest in the debate which had so often been alluded to, he had certainly derived from it the impression that the inquiry was to be of a judicial character, and that it was appointed more or less to try, so to speak, the character and conduct of the late Government. In that impression he was fortified by the words of the right hon. Member for Bucks (Mr. Disraeli), who said on that occasion that as there seemed no chance of the Dover Election Petition coming on for trial that Session, it would be unfair to the members of the late Administration to deprive them of the opportunity of promoting an investigation into all the circumstances of this case. Why should the right hon. Gentleman have said that, if the Committee were to be debarred from going into that case? So entirely was he impressed with the view he had stated, that although he was a member of the Committee, yet, having been prevented from serving by having to attend an Election Committee, when he was requested to be present at the drawing up of the report, he said that he did not think it was right that a member of a Committee who had not heard the evidence should assist in drawing up the report. Therefore he had certainly never been more astonished in his life than when he heard the right hon. Member for Droitwich get up and object to the course taken by the Committee. He might add that whatever might have been the impressions on the minds of hon. Members, they were caused mainly by the speeches of the right hon. Baronet's own friends.

LORD LOVAINE said, he thought it might fairly be concluded from that discussion that it was not safe to entrust to a Committee of that House an inquiry of a judicial character, in which the reputation of private individuals was more or less involved. As a member of the late Government, he should state that he would be again prepared to pursue the course he had adopted in that matter; but that was a question into which he would not then enter. He had risen solely for the purpose of pointing out the extreme inconvenience which must arise from allowing the conduct of private individuals who had no opportunity of defending themselves to become the subject of inquiry before a Committee, which according to the confession of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth himself, partook more or less of a political character.

CAPTAIN LEICESTER VERNON said, he should not then intrude on the time of the House were it not that he was anxious to notice an observation which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and which had been repeated by the right hon. Member for Portsmouth. The right hon. Gentleman stated that he believed the Committee were unanimous with respect to the extent of the inquiry in which they were to engage. He (Captain Vernon) was himself an independent member of the Committee, and he felt bound to say that he was no party whatever to that unanimity. It was his opinion that the Committee, in entering rather into personal than public matters, had departed from its duties, and that when the House appointed the Committee there was no idea that it was to subserve political ends. When the Committee devoted nearly the whole of its time to inquiring into the question whether Captain Carnegie was right in coming to the rather astonishing opinion that Mr. Churchward, in offering him his political support, was attempting to seduce him from the paths of Admiralty virtue, he believed it was turning aside from its duty for peddling objects and postponing the interests of the public to those of individuals. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might object that the proper place to make this remark was in the Committee, and the time when it showed an inclination to depart from its instructions ; but he had taken both that time and place to make the objection, though he was put down by the argument that the public out of doors were anxious upon the "Carnegie and Churchward" question, and that they must be satisfied. He ventured to say, too, that the Committee had not so much to do with the public out of doors as with their own business ; but still he was put down with the Shibboleth "the public out of doors." Now no one entertained a greater respect than he did for the public out of doors, but there was a time and a place for everything, and it certainly appeared to him that there was no reason why the Committee should have entered into many of the details they had investigated. Independent Members then found themselves, without the slightest reason, drawn into a perfect whirlpool of party conflict. They saw gentlemen on the jury whose proper place was in the witness box, and plaintiffs and defendants adjudicating on their own case. It was easy to foretell from the first that some over-nice and over-scrupulous persons would refrain from voting on matters which personally concerned themselves, and that others, not so scrupulous, would not be restrained by any such fanciful feelings, and it needed therefore no ghost from the grave to say what would be the inevitable verdict. To that verdict he intended to call attention on the 7th of February, but in the meantime he hoped that if the Committee were re-appointed, its duties would be strictly defined, and that it would have the hardihood to restrain itself within them. He had no intention, therefore, of drawing on two debates on the question, as the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. B. Osborne) had accused some Members of wishing to do, neither had he any intention of whitewashing the private secretary of the late First Lord of the Admiralty. He had not the slightest doubt that when light was let into the affair that gentleman's character would need no whitewashing. The hon. Member for Liskeard, who evidently felt very sore at what he called the attempt of the late First Lord of the Admiralty to tamper with the constituency of Dover, [Mr. B. OSBORNE : Hear, hear !] laid some stress on the fact that that right hon. Gentleman had volunteered to be examined, and insinuated that he had gained nothing by his motion. But the right hon. Gentleman was not the only person who had volunteered, and those other persons who had volunteered, as far as he recollected, had not taken much by their motion either.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : I was sorry to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard lay down the doctrine that it was the desire of all Governments to hush up these matters—for my hon. Friend has himself been a member of various Governments, and one is led, therefore, to suppose that when he makes so sweeping an assertion he is giving reminiscences of his own sentiments in such cases. For my own part, I beg leave to disclaim such a disposition. I am desirous that this matter should be fully inquired into. My hon. Friend gave loose to his imagination to an extraordinary extent in what he said about some secret understanding between me and my hon. Friend opposite, with whom I had once the honour of being intimately connected in a public capacity. There never was any such understanding between us. I do not believe I ever exchanged a single word with my hon. Friend on the subject except across this table. A fertile imagination is certainly sometimes a most inconvenient thing. This question appears to me a very simple one. It would seem that if the Committee were not unanimous in the view they took with regard to the scope of their inquiry, at all events no Gentleman who differed from the rest of the Committee thought proper to place his dissent on record ; it is also quite clear that a great majority of the Members entertained no doubt whatever as to the nature of their duties, and I am bound to say, as a question affecting the practice of the House of Commons, that it is very inconvenient that members of a Committee who entertain opinions with regard to the proper limits of their inquiry which differ from those of the majority, and which differ from the course which the Committee is actually pursuing, should remain silent in the Committee, being restrained by the fear of imputations from putting their views upon record, and then, not having stated their views to the Committee in an intelligible form, should afterwards make appeals to the House, and make complaints of the conduct of that Committee. Such a course appears to me to be hardly fair on the part of Gentlemen towards the other members of the Committee to which they belong. With regard to the merits of this particular case—the terms of the order of reference and the line of inquiry which was pursued—I confess that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich, who introduced this question, I must say, in the most temperate manner, appears—if I may be permitted to say so—to be in error in the view which he has taken. The opinion of the House of Commons is generally in favour of the course which the Committee has pursued. I do not speak now of the judgment which they came to, for that is a perfectly proper matter for review and question by this House; but it is perfectly impossible for a Committee appointed under an order of reference such as was passed in this instance, altogether to avoid what may be called personal matter. Undoubtedly the inquiry was one directed in the main to the policy of certain measures, and therefore I think it would be an inconvenient course to refer the subject to the Committee of Selection; but although such was its character, it was not simply an inquiry into an abstract matter of policy, but into the conduct of Executive Governments; and collaterally and in a secondary manner it was, of course, a question involving praise or blame of the conduct of those Governments for the manner in which they had acted. How is it possible for a Committee required by this House to inquire into the manner in which contracts were framed or modified by Her Majesty's Government, to make their inquiry thorough and searching if they are restrained from pronouncing a sentence of either praise or blame on the men by whom those contracts have been so framed or modified. The right hon. Baronet very fairly and justly says that the inquiry was one into the wisdom and prudence of the conduct of the Government, and that if the Committee found that their conduct had been deficient in wisdom and prudence, no doubt they ought to express their sentiments with regard to it. But although he admitted that they might declare their conduct not to have been prudent, they were not from that circumstance to infer any blame. The right hon. Baronet also finds fault with the Committee for having alluded to "corrupt motives." It appears to me that the Committee, instead of being censured, deserve rather to be commended for the mention which they have made of this branch of the subject, because the Committee having, by a very large majority, arrived at the conclusion that the Dover contract was made without sufficient inquiry into the grounds of the claim for its extension, and having gone on to express their views with respect to it, they afterwards, in a spirit of equity and of consideration for those whose conduct they had been condemning, inserted a paragraph declaring the opinion of the Committee that, notwithstanding an error had been committed, no ground existed for the imputation of corrupt motives. The Resolution was thus worded:—

"It further appears to the Committee that neither at the Admiralty nor at the Treasury were the officers with whom the decision rested, influenced in granting the renewal of the contract by any corrupt or political motive."

That passage appears to me clearly to show that the Committee not only acted with equity and fairness, but that they adopted it with a view of precluding any supposition of invidious interference that might otherwise be entertained. I believe, moreover, that the constitution of the Committee was well adapted for the purposes of the general inquiry for which it was appointed. I grant you that the mixture of what may be called personal matter is productive of much inconvenience, and is to be regretted when it comes incidentally under inquiry and cannot be made the subject of investigation by itself, without entailing other and very serious inconveniences; but this cannot be charged upon us by way of constraint—it is a matter of constant recurrence in inquiries by this House. The Committee on Contracts, for example, which sat in the years 1856, '57, and '58, was appointed not as a Committee for criminatory charge, notwithstanding which, in the investigation of a great number of proceedings of this nature, they found it necessary to express opinions in the nature both of praise and blame with reference to the conduct of those concerned in the making of those contracts. A great and natural desire has been expressed by members of the Committee that the sense of the House should be expressed as to whether they have exceeded their jurisdiction. Now, Sir, having listened attentively, and I hope calmly and impartially to this debate, I must say that I collect the sense of the House to be that the Committee did not exceed the jurisdiction given to them, and that they could not but pronounce a sentence of blame or praise upon the framing of the contracts which they were appointed to examine, when such an expression of opinion appeared to them to be called for. But it is of course my duty to remind the right hon. Baronet that if in his opinion the Committee have exceeded the bounds assigned to them, and that for the future they will require to be limited in their proceedings otherwise than by the discretion of the members, it rests with him to move an Amendment in words, or in some other manner to obtain an expression of the positive opinion of the House ; and I have no doubt that any opinion which may be expressed by the House will receive attention at the hands of the Committee.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that as one who had the remarkable pleasure of serving on the Committee, he must give it as his opinion that the grand question for which the Committee had been appointed had been almost lost sight of, when the inquiry passed from a consideration of the general policy which ought to regulate postal contracts, into details of a personal character. As far as the evidence had gone he was inclined to think that the points which had been complained of were occasioned by the absence of definite responsibility in any of the official departments. The Dovor case, which had assumed the dimensions rather of an election petition, might be taken as disposed of ; but he wished to remind the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) that the Galway case remained still to be disposed of. Was it intended that nineteen Members of the House should be doomed for another Session to the wretched task of wading through a similar mass of evidence, altogether apart from the great object of the inquiry ? Would it not be possible in some way to treat the charge of corruption as a separate inquiry, and to carry it on distinct from the main object of investigation ? His experience of last year led him to believe that it was utterly impossible that practical benefit could result from a renewal of the course of proceeding which was then adopted. He thought it right, however, to state that as regarded the spirit by which the Committee had been animated, it was his firm conviction that they had carried out the very difficult undertaking in which they were engaged as fairly as was possible. With respect, however, to their proceedings as published, he found that some 300 questions and answers, composing the whole of the evidence taken in one day, had been omitted. This was the more to be regretted as it included the valuable testimony given by Mr. Wilson and Mr. Rose—one of whom was now in India and the other in Canada. The evidence, he knew, had been printed, but was not included in the Report which had been laid on the table.

MR. HOPE explained, that when the evidence of the last two days on which the Committee sat had been printed, it was thought advisable that it should not be reported, as a fresh subject was therein opened up, the understanding being that they were to conclude with that portion of the testimony which related to Dovor.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY BILL.

LEAVE—FIRST READING.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to provide for the consideration of an Ordinance which has been laid before Parliament in a Report of the Oxford University Commissioners, he wished to explain that the Ordinance to which the measure referred was one which regulated the constitution of St. John's College, Oxford ; and the Bill proposed to provide a tribunal for the adjudication of a difference which had arisen between the College and the Commissioners.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he was sorry the right hon. Gentleman had treated the Bill in so light and indifferent a manner, because, in point of fact, it was nothing less than a breach of the contract which was entered into between Parliament on the one hand, and Oxford University on the other in the year 1854. At that time the state of the case was this :—A very complicated University Reform Bill had been brought forward by the Government of the Earl of Aberdeen, the earlier portions of which passed through Committee with great difficulty. The Government were beaten on several divisions and nearly beaten on several others ; and at last, at Whitsuntide, despairing of carrying the measure that Session, the Chancellor of the Exchequer remodelled it altogether, reconstructing it on the principle of giving large discretionary powers to the Commissioners named in the Bill, and also allowing each college in the University, by a majority of two-thirds of its members, to negative any Ordinance that it considered objectionable. Upon the understanding that this negative was to be a practical one, the Opposition ceased to object to the Bill ;

subsequently it went up to the House of Lords, the University withdrew their opposition, and the measure became law. What did the University do? Did it make use of this power in a factious manner? By no means. Except in the case of St. John's College no permanent opposition had been offered to the Commissioners. On many occasions the Commissioners had proposed changes to which strong objections were taken, but the Colleges were anxious to accommodate them, and it was only in this one instance, where the interests of a very important school in the City of London were most injuriously affected by an Ordinance, that the College resolved on exerting the power which was given it by the Act of Parliament. To meet this one case, then, the right hon. Gentleman proposed to invoke the authority of Parliament, and to destroy the veto which Parliament had solemnly conferred in 1854. If the Bill were allowed to pass it would throw the greatest reflection upon the Ministry of that day; because it was impossible to believe that the Ministry, when it proposed the veto, intended it to be a deceit and a sham. They, no doubt, intended it to be an honest protection to the University, and not that the absolute exercise of the power should terminate at the end of five years.

DILAPIDATIONS OF GLEBE HOUSES.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON put the Question of which he had given notice, namely, Whether any Bill is proposed to be introduced this Session under the Sanction of the Episcopal Bench to alter and amend the Law relative to Dilapidations on Glebe Houses. The noble Viscount expressed the belief that he should receive an answer to the question that would be gratifying to a large portion of the community, more especially the parochial clergy; for beyond all doubt, if ever there were a matter which more than any other loudly called for some alteration and amendment, it was the law upon the subject of dilapidations on glebe houses. He had intended to introduce a measure himself in a former Session; but upon learning that the matter was to be taken into consideration by the right rev. Bench and the two Houses of Convocation, he refrained from doing so. He believed that Convocation and the right rev. Prelates did take the question into consideration last year, but that in consequence of the dissolution it had necessarily, with many other important questions, been postponed. But he had reason to believe that the subject had been duly weighed and considered by them since, and that a measure would be introduced this Session that would be calculated to give real satisfaction to the clergy.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY stated, in reply, that during last Session a Bill was in preparation, but owing to the circumstances of that Session an opportunity could not be got of introducing it into Parliament. He had, however, been in communication with his right rev. Brethren on the subject, and could now state with the complete concurrence of three of them, that a measure was actually under consideration, and he hoped in a short time it would be completed and submitted to their Lordships' House.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON expressed his satisfaction that a Bill was about to be brought forward on this subject. There were some alterations which had occurred to him which he hoped had not escaped the attention of the right rev. Prelates.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was gratified to hear from the most rev. Prelate that a measure was about to be introduced which had the concurrence of the Episcopal Bench. He thought there would be found difficulties if any attempt were made to codify the whole law affecting the subject. It seemed to be especially desirable that there should be something more stringent than the present law to require the incumbent to keep his house in repair.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, the difficulty of altering the law on this subject had always been felt to be the interference which it involved with the old English axiom, that "an Englishman's house was his castle." The matter had been many years under the consideration of the Episcopal Bench; and it was a happy circumstance at the present moment that the great body of the parochial clergy, by their representatives in the Lower House of Convocation, had agreed fully in the principles that were necessary to remedy the defects of the present law. There was a great objection to anything like inspection; but it was generally admitted that there should be a public officer to examine from time to time, and see what repairs were necessary, and order them to be done, and to receive a yearly sum from the hands of the incumbent. He might, however, state, in order to correct the noble Lord who had just spoken, that the Bill, being in the nature of a taxing Bill, could not be introduced into their Lordships' House, but must originate in the other House of Parliament.

TRANSFER OF LAND.

PETITION.

TRANSFER OF REAL ESTATE BILL.

FIRST READING.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he had to lay before their Lordships a very important petition from nearly all the magistrates and landowners of the county of Cumberland, praying for an Improvement in the present Law respecting the Transfer of Land. They did not state, as they might have done, that the present Master of the Rolls, when examined before a Select Committee, gave it as his opinion that if that law had been designedly intended to make land an unmarketable commodity it could not have been more complete in its provisions. The petitioners prayed their Lordships to extend to all land of all tenure, freehold and leasehold, but particularly freehold, the custom of copyhold conveyancing which was known in their part of the country, and practised with perfect success. He had also a petition from a very learned Friend of his, a conveyancer of forty years' standing, Mr. Fawcett, who had been for thirty-five of those years steward of one of the greatest manors of the north. He stated his experience of that manor, in which there were about 500 tenements of various descriptions, and some of very considerable value and extent, and he said that during the whole thirty-five years, in which hardly one had not passed at least once, but many several times, by transfers will, or mortgage, there had never been a single instance of a dispute raised on any question connected with those transfers of property. The expense of each conveyance was not more than 7s., and the length never exceeded 200 words. It was natural that these petitioners should hope and pray that this mode of conveyancing might be extended to all real property held under whatever tenure. He (Lord Brougham) availing himself of Mr. Fawcett's experience, prepared and introduced a Bill on this subject last year and the year before; but it did not go further than its first stage last year. This was very much owing to his learned Friend Sir Hugh Cairns, then the Solicitor General, having introduced a Bill of great value, carefully and elaborately framed, with the same view, and in several respects in nearly to the same effect. There were certain objections urged against that Bill to which his was not liable, but instead of opposing it he thought it well to co-operate with his learned Friend in his effort to amend the law. He (Lord Brougham) had now prepared, in compliance with the prayer of these petitioners the same measure which he before proposed, with certain material alterations, the object of which was to provide the remedies to which Sir H. Cairns' Bill was directed, and some other improvements. Sir Hugh Cairns' Bill established a Land Transfer Court on the footing of the Irish Incumbered Estates Court, but his (Lord Brougham's) measure gave the same powers, under control and with the right of appeal, to local officers in every district throughout the country.

Petition read and ordered to lie on the Table.

The noble and learned Lord then presented a Bill touching the Transfer of Real Estate, and for the Registration of the Titles thereof.

LORD CRANWORTH asked, Whether the Bill which the Government intended to bring forward on the same subject would be introduced in this or the other House of Parliament?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the Attorney General had already announced that he would ask leave to bring in this measure. Many fiscal considerations would arise respecting it, and it was thought more expedient to introduce the Bill in the other House.

Bill read 1^a.

QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Government intend to introduce any measure this Session respecting Irish Education?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, no change will be made in the system of education in Ireland without giving the House an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon it. The hon. Member is of course aware that the system of National Education in Ireland is not regulated by statute, and that there is no probability of the necessity for any legislation on the subject.

LAND TAX (INDIA.)

QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India what has been done by the Government in India to give effect to the orders contained in Lord Stanley's Despatches as to the redemption of the Land Tax, and the repeal of the regulation XIX. of 1810?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he had not heard from the Government of India whether any steps had been taken to carry those measures into effect, but before long he hoped he would receive information on the subject. With regard to the redemption of the Land Tax, he could state that at Madras measures were taken to allow builders of houses in towns to redeem the tax on land on which the houses were built.

FOREIGN TARIFFS.

QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to put a Question to the right hon. President of the Board of Trade, of which he had not given him notice; and, therefore, if the right hon. Gentleman wished him to postpone the question he would be happy to do so. He understood that an account of the changes in all Foreign Tariffs was in the habit of being prepared, but no such information had been laid before the House for the last eighteen months. It is very important that the House should have information on this subject, and he would be glad to know when the Papers will be in the hands of Members. He would add to this question, whether the changes in the Tariffs of our foreign dependencies was in possession of the House.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he did not quite collect the bearing of the first part of the hon. Gentleman's observations; but with regard to the Papers he asked for he would give him information to-morrow.

AFFAIRS OF SARDINIA.

QUESTION.

MR. STANSFIELD said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true or not that, towards the end of the month of December last, a public Association, to be entitled "La Nazione Armata," having for its object the voluntary arming and organization of large numbers of the population of the kingdom of Sardinia, was proposed by two Members of the Chambers, Signori Brofferio and Sineo, and the Presidency, with the consent of the King, accepted by Garibaldi; and whether, about the same time, a Royal decree appointing General Garibaldi Inspector-in-Chief of the National Guard of the Kingdom had been determined upon, and was on the point of being signed by the King; and, further, whether, under these circumstances, Sir James Hudson, Her Majesty's Ambassador at Turin, under instructions from the Government at home, and in conjunction with the French Ambassador, or otherwise, on the 2nd day of January, or on any other occasion, protested to the King against such measures, which His Majesty was supposed, of his own free will, to be about to adopt, stating, in the name of Her Majesty's Government, that the good offices of Great Britain, in the present crisis of Italian affairs, would be withdrawn if such proposed measures were persisted in?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I confess I am unable to answer the former part of the question of my hon. Friend as to what was done in Piedmont with regard to the association called "La Nazione Armata." I was however informed by Sir James Hudson in a private letter that there was a plan for having an armed association in Sardinia, of which General Garibaldi was to be the head, and that Signor Brofferio, one of the Chamber of Deputies, and two or three other deputies, were favourable to the plan, and went to General Garibaldi to invite him to accept the presidency. Sir James Hudson informed me that he had considered the matter, and had come to the conclusion that to have an armed association, not under the control of the Sovereign, was quite inconsistent with his notions of a monarchy. Sir James Hudson received no instructions from Her Majesty's Government on the subject, nor has the question come for discussion before Her Majesty's Government, but I believe that Sir James Hudson's opinion reached the ears of the King. General Garibaldi was then asked to resign the Presidency of this Association, which he did in the most prompt and generous manner. General Garibaldi afterwards wrote to Sir James Hudson to know whether he had given any opinion to the King of Sardinia that this Association ought to be dissolved. Sir James Hudson answered promptly and frankly that, in his opinion, in a monarchy all the armed forces ought to be under the command of the King. All the forces of the Kingdom had previously been under the command of the Sovereign as Commander-in-Chief. It was an entirely private proceeding on the part of Sir James Hudson with regard to these questions, and one upon which he received no instructions from Her Majesty's Government, nor do I think that the French Minister had anything to do with the matter. As to Sir James Hudson having stated that the good offices of Great Britain would be withdrawn if the proposed measures were persisted in, I believe Sir James Hudson never made any such statement. Although it was not necessary to take any public notice of the matter, I wrote a private letter to Sir James Hudson approving what he had done.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished to know whether he was to understand that this was an entirely unauthorized proceeding on the part of Sir James Hudson.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL:—Her Majesty's Government had never heard of the matter until they were informed of it by Sir James Hudson.

THE OATH TAKEN BY RECRUITS. QUESTION.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has taken into consideration the Oath taken by recruits on attestation, with a view to an alteration of the same? He (Lord W. Graham) thought that a declaration might be substituted for the oath that the recruit would obey the commands of all the officers that were set over him.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, the Oath of Allegiance did not cover the answers which the recruit had to make to the questions of the magistrates. The oath was, however, under consideration.

MARTIN ESCALANTE.—THE BIBLE IN SPAIN.—QUESTION.

SIR ANDREW AGNEW said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if it is true that the British Consul at Cadiz allowed Martin Escalante, a British subject, to remain upwards of seven months in prison untried, and also delayed or declined to take him under his protection, although (at the instigation of the Spanish Judge) an application was made to the Consul to do so? He believed that Martin Escalante had been sentenced to nine years' penal servitude for circulating Roman Catholic Bibles in the Spanish language. He should also be glad to know whether any remission of the punishment has been asked for and is likely to be obtained?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, the British Minister at Madrid was informed that Martin Escalante had been arrested on the ground that he had circulated Bibles in the Spanish language, that being an offence by the Spanish law. Mr. Buchanan, the British Minister at Madrid, wrote to our Consul at Cadiz, to know what he had done, and was informed that he had inquired into the case, that he found that Martin Escalante was in prison according to the law of the country, but that he had legal advice, and that he would be defended by his legal adviser. We have no information to induce us to think that the British Consul at Cadiz could have released Martin Escalante from prison or obtained his trial in a shorter time. He repeatedly applied to the Spanish Minister at Madrid, who always replied that Martin Escalante was suffering in the due course of justice. He certainly, however, was not tried until after he had been in prison for seven months, and at the end of that time was sentenced to nine years' penal servitude. The British Minister has applied to the Spanish Government for the liberation of Martin Escalante, and there is every reason to think that he will very soon be released entirely from the term of his servitude.

LICENSING BILL (INDIA).—QUESTION.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he wished to inquire what course the Government intend to take with regard to the Licensing Bill in India, and whether that Bill has been passed through all its stages by the Legislative Council at Calcutta?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the Licensing Bill had been introduced and had passed through certain stages. Its further progress, however, was postponed until after the Legislative Council should again meet. The Legislative Council had not yet met, and he was not in a condition to state what course the Government of India would pursue upon the Bill.

THE MILITIA.—QUESTION.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is intended to embody fresh regiments of Militia in the place of those about to be disembodied, and whether it is intended to introduce any measure to place the Militia force on a more permanent and efficient footing?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, when he brought forward the Army Estimates he would then state the course the Government intended to pursue with respect to the Militia force. He might state now, however, that it was not intended to embody any fresh regiments of Militia in place of those that had been disembodied.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE. QUESTION.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer a question relative to the Treaty with France. It had been stated that the Treaty was to be laid on the table very shortly, but he wished to ask whether it is necessary for the House to receive it as a whole, or whether it will be competent for the House to consider and alter any of the details? They were informed that the Treaty, so far as England was concerned, would come to immediate operation, but that with regard to France it was not to take effect eighteen months. If this were so, it would be a great hardship to those who held large stocks of wines and spirits. The question that he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman was whether the precedent of 1825, laid down by Mr. Canning when he took off the duty on foreign spirits and wines, will be followed—namely, that the duty should not be taken off till January, 1861, thus giving traders time to get rid of the stock they happened to have on hand.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the Treaty would of course be subject to the approval of the English Parliament, but as regarded its details, he must beg the hon. Gentleman to wait till Monday, when his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer would lay the whole of his financial measures before the House.

MERCHANT SHIPPING.

COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. LINDSAY*: I rise, Sir, to move the following Resolution:—

Sir, in March last, I brought under the consideration of the House, in the late Parliament, a Motion similar in all respects to that which I now submit to the consideration of the House. Parliament was then pleased unanimously to grant this Committee of Inquiry; but unfortunately the late Parliament was soon after dissolved, and, consequently, no results followed the appointment of that Committee. I have now, therefore, again to ask that a Committee be appointed to inquire into the special burdens and restrictions affecting Merchant Shipping. I see on the paper that my hon. Friend the Member for the City of London has a Motion similar in substance to that which I have just submitted to the consideration of the House; and, apparently, the object which my hon. Friend has in view is the same as that which has caused me to move in the matter. I may say, for the satisfaction of my hon. Friend, and for the information of the House, that if the House shall be pleased to grant me this Committee of Inquiry, it will be necessary, in the first place, to make some inquiry into the actual position of the British Shipping Interest, which, I am sorry to say, has for some time past been suffering great depression. It will be necessary also to glance generally at the causes of that depression. I for one feel that the causes of that depression are so apparent that a very limited inquiry on that head will suffice. I believe the Committee will find that the causes of that great depression to which the British Shipping Interest has been subjected, arise in great measure indeed from the same causes which bring periods of great depression on other branches of commerce. I will call the attention of the House to the facts of the case.

In 1853-54-55, it is well known that the British Shipping Interest was in a state of great prosperity. The Crimean war, while it created an enormous extra demand for ships, curtailed in a very small degree the usual channels of commerce, and the consequence was that a larger number of ships was called into requisition than was necessary for the usual trade of the country. I am free to own that the shipowners at that time brought forward more ships than the trade of the country required. What was the consequence? The consequence has been that the supply, during the last three or four years, has greatly exceeded the demand. But I would not venture to ask the House for the appointment of a Committee of Inquiry if I thought that the sole cause of the depression was the over-supply of ships, because I fear I should thus be setting a precedent that would justify other interests, when they were in a depressed state, to come before this House with a demand for inquiry.

But there are other causes which to a considerable extent have been the causes of this depression. In the first place, there are those peculiar restrictions which, when the shipping interest was deprived of protection, ought also to have been removed—restrictions which were the creatures of protection, and which, when protection was abolished, ought, in justice to the shipping interest, to have been also swept away. There is another point on which the Committee will feel it necessary to make some inquiry. The House is aware that the repeal of the Navigation Acts, ten years ago, admitted the ships of all other nations into our ports on the same terms as our own ships are admitted. In thus throwing open our ports I admit we have shown a wise and prudent regard to our own interests, but we have also displayed great liberality to other nations, and at the least we might have expected that other nations would make us some return. But other nations have not reciprocated our liberality; for I find that France—and I take the case of France, because I understand that we are about to enter into a commercial treaty with that country—and though I will not say anything that would lead to the discussion of a treaty of the details of which I am ignorant, I may take up this point—how we stand, with regard to the shipping interest in our relations with France. In 1850—ten years ago—we admitted the ships of France into our ports on the same terms and on the same conditions as our own ships. Ten years have gone, but France has not met us in the same spirit of liberal policy. France maintains high differential duties. The article of sugar, when imported into France in French ships, pays a duty of £3 8s. per 100 kilogrammes; if in British ships it pays a duty of £4 4s. I find that coffee pays a duty, if in French ships, of £2 8s. per 100 kilogrammes; if in British ships, £4 4s. Tobacco in French ships pays 4s. per kilogramme; in British ships the duty is double the amount. Cotton wool in British ships pays £1 8s. per 100 kilogrammes; if in French ships, it pays only half that amount of duty. Tea, if in British ships, pays 4s. 9d. per 100 kilogrammes; in French ships, only 1s. 2d. There are very few staple articles admitted into the ports of France in British vessels upon the same terms on which they are admitted in French vessels. In fact, in many cases, there are not merely very high differential duties against our ships, but the duties are almost prohibitory. It is perfectly true that France does not gain by that illiberal policy, for we find that, for every French ship that enters our ports, three British ships enter the ports of France. But that is no answer to the complaint of what I may the injustice on the part of France, which, deriving as she has done during the last ten years the full benefit of a share in our vast carrying trade, excludes our ships from her comparatively limited trade. It is not, however, solely of the differential duties on goods imported in the ships of the respective nations that I have to complain, I find that there are also very high tonnage duties levied, to the disadvantage of British shipping entering the ports of France. I find that British vessels from any but British ports in Europe pay a tonnage rate in France of 2½ francs per ton, while French ships pay a tonnage duty of only eighteen centimes, or one-fourteenth of the charge imposed upon our vessels. I find that French vessels from other ports than those belonging to Great Britain and her Colonies pay 75 cents per ton; while British vessels from all parts pay 2½ francs per ton; and the ships of the Americans—our great rivals in the carrying trade—are also only subject to the French charge of 75 cents per ton. As I have already said, we not only admit the ships of France to our ports, but we also admit the ships of the rest of the world; and, however high those differential duties of France may be against us, they are as nothing compared to the differential duties maintained by the Spanish Government against our shipping entering their ports. I find that coffee imported into Spain from Havana in British ships pays a duty of 20 cents per 9 lbs., while coffee imported in Spanish ships pays a duty of only 12 cents per 9 lbs. I find that sugar—the staple product of that island—imported in British ships pays 37 cents. per box, while sugar imported in Spanish ships pays a duty of only 25 cents per box. I find that the same high differential duties are imposed against our shipping upon other articles, and that on tobacco, for instance, the charges fall in the proportions of 150 and 75. I find that at Cardenas, dues of one dollar and a half per ton are levied on British ships, while dues of only half a dollar per ton are levied on Spanish ships. I need hardly add that we are excluded not only from the coasting trade of Spain, which is inconsiderable, but also from the coasting trade of France, which is considerable, and in which it might be important to us to be allowed to share. There are altogether seventeen nations which maintain against us differential duties, or prohibit our ships from engaging in their coasting trade. What is the course which we ought under these circumstances to adopt, it is not for me to say; but I do think that these are facts which the Committee, if it be granted, will be bound to inquire into, and to report upon to the House. I believe it will also be the duty of the Committee to ascertain what the various Governments which have sat upon these benches since the year 1850 have done to obtain from foreign nations that reciprocity which we have a right to expect. I think, or rather I fear, it will be found that these Governments have not used the exertions which they ought to have used with foreign nations for the purpose of inducing them to allow our ships to enter their ports upon the same terms on which their ships are allowed to enter our ports. With regard to the United States of America, it is true that for many years treaties of reciprocity have existed between them and this country; and, consequently, when we repealed our navigation laws in the year 1850, America had in reality nothing to give us for the vast benefits which we had conferred upon her shipping, except her coasting trade. We had previously admitted her ships into our ports upon the same terms on which she had admitted our ships into her ports. But, by the repeal of the navigation laws in the year 1850, we threw open to the ships of the United States our ports in our distant possessions in India, in Australia, and elsewhere. Now, as I have just observed, America had nothing to give us in exchange for that advantage except her coasting trade; and when we threw open to her our trade, we expected that that enlightened nation would open to us her vast coasting trade. But she did nothing of the kind. Again, when in the year 1854 we threw open our coasting trade, I remember that the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell), who was then President of the Board of Trade, was not only sanguine, but seemed to entertain no doubt, that when the Act of 1854 should come into operation, America would throw open to us her coasting trade. Six years have since elapsed, and the American Government still exclude our ships from that valuable trade. I remember that when this subject was under discussion some years ago in this House, Mr. Labouchere (now Lord Taunton) represented the conduct of the American Government in this respect as “shabby.” I do not know that I can find a more appropriate word than that; and I will repeat the language of Lord Taunton, and say that the conduct of the American Government towards us after what we had done was indeed “shabby.” Even if the trade from which America excluded us were a coasting trade in the strict sense of the words, the course which she pursued would be nothing less than “shabby,” but it is very questionable whether it is a coasting trade at all. The distance from New York to California is quite as great, and the voyage from New York to California is more hazardous, than that from London to Calcutta. In making that voyage,

American ships are obliged to pass the shores of various foreign nations. Now, can it be said that, even in the technical sense of the words, that is a coasting trade? And above all, can it be said that it is a coasting trade in the sense of that equity which ought to guide great nations in all their dealings? But America has been stretching that point to our prejudice. She has not only maintained that the voyage I have just named is a coasting trade, but she has held that a ship loading at New York with a portion of her cargo for Rio Janeiro, another portion for Bahia, another for Valparaiso, another for Lima, and the remainder for California, is engaged in that coasting trade from which our ships are excluded. I believe that such an assumption is opposed to the provisions of our reciprocity treaty with America, and that, whatever may be said in support of the doctrine that the direct voyage from New York to California is a coasting trade, a ship which lands goods at an intermediate port in a foreign country does not come within the terms of that doctrine. That is another subject into which it will be the duty of the proposed Committee to inquire. In a question so comprehensive as this, hon. Members will not expect that I should do more than touch upon its leading features.

I would now, with the permission of the House, direct its attention, for a very short time, to those burdens on the shipping interest which, I think, ought to have been removed when the navigation laws were repealed. And, first of all, I would refer to the light dues. This is a question which has been discussed over and over again in this House. It was made the subject of a very full inquiry by a Committee of the year 1845, over which the late Mr. Joseph Hume presided, and of which the noble Lord at present at the head of the Government was a member; and I think I cannot now do better than read to the House a Resolution at which that Committee arrived after the fullest investigation. It was as follows:—

“That all expenses for the erection and maintenance of Lighthouses, Floating Lights, and Beacons, be henceforth defrayed out of the public revenue, and that as the Trinity House has incurred a debt under the authority of the 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 79, in purchasing the lights of private individuals, for their leases and possessions of Lighthouses, the Government ought to take upon it that debt.”

If I remember rightly it was the noble Lord

at present at the head of the Government who proposed that Resolution in the Committee, and at all events he was one of the majority who voted in its favour. Here, therefore, we have a Committee which, after the most careful inquiry, was clearly of opinion that not only the cost of lighting our shores ought to be paid by the nation, but that the whole of the debt contracted in the purchase of private lighthouses ought to be defrayed out of the Consolidated Fund. At that time the shipping interest was a protected interest. I am one of those who doubt very much whether it ever received any benefit from that protection, but it was supposed at least to derive from it certain advantages; and if it were right to recommend then that those burdens should be removed, there exists surely a stronger reason why it should be relieved from them now that it has to enter into competition with the whole world. May I ask the attention of the House for one moment to the extreme hardship of this case. At the time when the Committee recommended that the lights should be maintained out of the Consolidated Fund, and that the money necessary for the purchase of private lights should be taken from the same quarter, a sum of not less than £1,250,000 was required for that purchase; and let it be remembered that the interests which had to receive that indemnity had been created to a great extent by the improvident grants of ministers and kings in times long gone by. But that Resolution of the Committee of 1845 was never carried into effect, and the shipping interest was obliged to pay, and has paid, the whole of that sum of £1,250,000 for the purpose of buying up those grants of private lighthouses. But, independently of the merits of this particular case, I contend, on the grounds of policy and of justice, that it is the duty of all great nations to light their shores. If we invite other people, as we have been doing, more especially during the last ten years, to trade with us, surely we ought to warn those who accept the invitation of the dangers which surround our shores, without taxing them for that knowledge. If we have been before other nations in adopting the doctrine of free trade, they have been before us in the point to which I am now directing the attention of the House. It is to the credit of the Government of the United States of America that they have never charged either their own shipping or ours one sixpence for the maintenance of the lights along their coasts, and other great nations have followed the same course. Now, strongly as I feel with respect to the manner in which America has acted towards us in the case of her coasting trade, I really do not see how we can go to her and ask her to throw open that trade until we shall have placed her ships upon the same footing in regard to lights in which she has placed our ships. The Americans, as a keen people, have felt this grievance, and have remonstrated with our Government upon the subject. On looking into the blue-book which has been laid before the House, I find that in the ten years between 1840 and 1850 they have paid towards the maintenance of our lights a sum of not less than £234,000. Now, when we go to the United States and ask them for that reciprocity which I think we have a right to expect—nay, more, which I think we have almost a right to demand—led us go with clean hands; let us admit that we have taxed their shipping too long for the maintenance of our lights; and let us announce that we will at length square accounts with them, and admit their ships into our ports in all respects upon the same terms on which they admit ours into their ports. If we do this, I think we shall have a better chance of obtaining a system of reciprocity from the United States.

There will be another subject for the consideration of the Committee; and that is, our local dues and passing tolls. That question also has been often discussed in this House. Hon. Members may remember that about two or three years ago a Bill was introduced to deal with that subject. I was one of those who thought at the time that if two separate measures had been brought forward, one dealing with the passing tolls and the other dealing with the local dues, the passing tolls would then have been abolished. But as many persons thought that the local dues formed a vested interest, and that they ought not to be swept away without compensation to the owners, the Bill which dealt with the two questions did not pass through this House. The result was that the local dues and passing tolls were still maintained, and our shipping was still obliged to pay a sum, which amounted to nearly £200,000 per annum, for what was called local dues, levied under the names of craning, meting, wharfage, and various other designations. But the sum so raised was not employed in any work the names under which it was levied would imply. That money was appropriated for the benefit, not of the parties who were called upon to pay the tax, but for the benefit of the local bodies by whom it was received. In the year 1852, no less a sum than £105,000 was paid by the shipping interest to the Corporation of Liverpool, and was actually transferred by them to their borough fund for the purpose of cleansing their streets, building St. George's Hall and completing other works, which are very well in their way, but with which the shipping interest has nothing whatever to do. It is not Liverpool, alone, however, which levies those dues. There is the port of Newcastle, which also raises a very large sum under the same pretext, without affording any benefit whatever to the parties from whom it is received. The port which I have the honour to represent in this House—namely, the port of Sunderland, the largest shipbuilding port, I may say, in the world, which has three times the amount of tonnage of Newcastle—is still considered a creek of Newcastle, and pays to that borough a sum of £1,400 per annum, for which it gets no return whatever. These are subjects with which, I hope, this House will deal. There is also another matter to which I desire for a moment to direct your attention. As I have already said, there are various bodies besides the Corporations of Liverpool and Newcastle which levy these dues. I think there are seven of them altogether; and in former times, before we entered into reciprocity treaties with other nations, these corporate bodies had the right of charging double rates on all foreign ships frequenting our ports. But since the years 1824 and '5, when Mr. Huskisson, on the part of this country, had entered into reciprocity treaties with foreign States—one condition of those treaties being that the ships of those States should be admitted into our ports upon the same terms with regard to dues as our own ships—these corporations were obliged to reduce their charges on foreign ships to the same amount as that which was imposed upon British shipping. They then, however, stood upon their vested rights; they appealed to this House, and this House granted them compensation for the loss they had thus sustained. This House has paid up to the end of 1858 no less a sum than £1,125,000 in order to compensate those corporate bodies who levied taxes upon shipping for purposes which I have endeavoured to explain.

Now, Sir, this brings me to the question of passing tolls. In regard to passing tolls, I had the honour of being a member of the Royal Commission which was appointed to investigate that subject, and after a full inquiry the members of that Commission arrived at the unanimous decision that those charges ought to be defrayed at the expense of the country at large, one of them being to afford light to ships frequenting our shores in the ordinary course of commerce, while the other portion of the expenditure was for the purpose of creating harbours of refuge, which would be able to receive at all states of the tide, and during stormy weather, ships of almost any size. Surely these are two great national objects; and if the decision at which the Commission arrived is a correct decision—namely, that it is the duty of the nation, in the interest of commerce, to light our coasts, and to maintain harbours of refuge from which ships can derive benefit—it is high time that the shipping interest should be relieved from the payment of taxes from which they can derive no benefit whatever. We have paid for a very long time, and still continue to pay, no less a sum than £1,200 passing tolls for Dover. Most hon. Members are acquainted with Dover, and, therefore, they must know that Dover in certain states of the tide is a dry harbour, and that not one out of ten ships which pays for its maintenance can enter the harbour of Dover. Can it then be said that any such vessels derive any benefit from it? Then, again, £1,400 a year is charged for Ramsgate, which we also know is a dry harbour. And Whitby is also a harbour dry at low water; yet towards the maintenance of Whitby harbour we have paid no less than £5,000 per annum for many years. Last of all, there is Bridlington. Now, Bridlington is one of the places which we visited in the course of the inquiry, because it was said to be the very best site on that part of the coast on which to form a harbour of refuge. It is only just to the people of Bridlington to state that, when the idea was first mooted, they did not say that they thought Bridlington the best place for the formation of a great national harbour of refuge. However, we inspected it for that purpose, and the House will hardly realize what this harbour of Bridlington is without visiting it. We were in a steamer which the Admiralty had placed at our disposal, drawing about eight feet of water. The House might at least suppose that such a vessel should enter a harbour of refuge.

But no; we were obliged to moor her full half a mile outside of the harbour. The steamer could not enter, and we were obliged to land in a small boat. Well, Sir, we proceeded to the entrance of the harbour, and positively found that we in our small boat could not enter; and we, Her Majesty's Royal Commissioners, were actually obliged to be carried on shore from the entrance of this harbour of refuge on the backs of the Coastguard. Yet the amount charged for passing tolls annually for Bridlington is actually £2,800, and there is a debt upon the security of the tolls to the extent of £28,000. These are surely matters which ought to have been changed long ago. I wish to remind my right hon. Friend, and those with whom he acts, that various Ministries, ever since 1850, have pledged themselves to the House and country that these restrictions and burdens should be removed from the shipping interest. I will just remind the right hon. Gentleman who now fills the office of President of the Board of Trade of the remarks made by Mr. Labouchere when he held that office in 1856. That right hon. Gentleman then said:—

“The Government did not undertake to deal with this question until it had been fully examined. I will ask, likewise, is the subject a new one to this House? Why, the very grievances we are now considering, have year after year been forced on the attention of the House and Government, and when it fell to my lot, several years ago, to propose the repeal of the Navigation Laws, I was repeatedly taunted for not coupling that great change with a subsidiary measure like the present, doing justice to the shipping interest, and it is, in fact, in redemption—a tardy redemption, I admit—of the pledges then given by me and other Ministers on that subject, that the Government introduced the Bill before the House.”

I ask my right hon. Friend to redeem the pledges given so long ago to the House, and to remove from the shipping interest those burdens and restrictions with which it is still fettered. Sir, I see that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire is in his place, and no doubt I shall have his support, as well as the support of hon. Members on that side of the House generally, in any attempt which I may make to remove the passing tolls; for so long ago as 1852, in his financial statement, the right hon. Gentleman told the House that passing tolls were a vexation, a grievance, and a burden to which the shipping of this country, under present circumstances, ought not to be subjected. No doubt, if the right hon. Gentleman had remained in office, those passing tolls would by this time have been removed.

But, Sir, there are other burdens upon shipping, such as the Stade Dues, to which our attention may well be called. Inasmuch, however, as my hon. Friend (Mr. Ricardo)—whom I do not now see in his place—has given notice of his intention to ask a question in regard to them this week, I will pass them over; but if something is not done before the labours of this Committee close, should the House think proper to appoint a Committee—I shall feel it my duty to make those dues the subject of investigation; for not only do they operate as a hardship upon shipping, but they tend very much to prevent our having any large transactions with the interior of Germany. There is, however, a series of dues, at the existence of which the public in general will feel greatly surprised. There is in this country a Russia Company, which levies dues on shipping to no less an extent than £12,000 a year. What the benefit may be which the shipping interest derives from the money levied by that company, I am at a loss to understand. All I find is that the following are the items:—

“Lastage, address money, church money, passes, &c., &c., £1,791; then there is a sum for the chapel of the British Factory at St. Petersburg, and £623 to the Russian Company's chapels in Russia; organ at Moscow £25, plate to Governor, £85; entertainment to Russian Embassy, £193; ditto to Grand Duke Alexander, £595; £360 for engraving, and £200 for framing and embellishing the portrait of the Emperor Nicholas; and £100 to churchwardens at Moscow.”

I cannot for the life of me understand what necessity there is for taxing the shipping interest for the purpose of giving dinners to the Embassy and the Grand Duke Alexander; but certainly the last item but one is the most amusing of all. Why on earth are we to be taxed for engraving and framing a portrait of the Emperor Nicholas? Surely these are matters which ought to be brought under the notice of the House of Commons.

There is, however, another question which may be worth while to consider. I do not see how hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Ministerial Benches can, consistently with their political opinions, support the tax on timber. Upon what principle can they admit a manufactured ship which enters our ports to compete with our ships, but which may bring a cargo or not—on what principle can they admit such a ship free, and yet place a tax upon the raw material which builds that ship, and the manufacture of which gives employment to a large number of men? How is it that they can bring themselves to continue the imposition of 7s. 6d. a load upon square timber and 10s. on deals? I know very well the sort of answer that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will make next Monday to this; I know very well that he will say—“This impost brings in a revenue of £600,000 a year. I am very sorry to say that I am a long way off a satisfactory settlement of the accounts. I am very short of money, and I have nothing to spare for the remission of the Timber Duties, or, for that matter, for anything else.” However true that may be, still I do think that there has been a very great deal of money unwisely and unnecessarily spent which might have been spared; and I do say that, if the Gentlemen sitting on these Benches, acting in accordance with their free-trade principles, admit manufactured ships into this country free, they ought also to admit the raw material free. It is no answer to me to say that they have no money. This is a question of justice, and justice is not to be bought. If it is just that these duties should be removed, the people of this country will find the ways and means; but if it is impossible to remit the whole duty of £600,000, I think the least they should do would be to remit the tax upon oak and pitch pine.

I now proceed to touch upon what may be called the legislative enactments, or fiscal burdens. My Motion in the last Session, as brought before the House, was simply the first clause of the present Motion, and my hon. Friend the Member for London (Mr. Crawford) added to it the reference to the 9th and 10th Victoria, which contains the legislative enactments or liabilities of the merchant shipowners. The House will be aware that, by the Merchant Shipping Act, the responsibilities of shipowners are said to be limited to the value of the ship and freight. By an Act previously passed, and which is known as Lord Campbell's Act, certain regulations were made, and certain responsibilities created, which applied to carriers by land, but which the law has since held, applies to carriers by water, and it would appear that shipowners by that Act are placed on the same footing as carriers by land. But the House will perceive that there is a vast difference between carriage by sea and carriage by land. In the latter case the things carried are in most cases under the immediate control of the carrier or his servants. It is true you may say an accident may occur as easily on shore as upon the sea; but the House will agree with me that accidents on land to a great extent are attributable to some amount of negligence on the part of the persons engaged in the carriage, but on the sea accidents may arise from the natural dangers of the sea, from the tumult of the winds and waves, and from many other causes irrespective either of the owner, who is most frequently on the land, or of his servants, for whom he is to be made responsible. There is, therefore, a marked difference between a carrier by sea and a carrier by land—so marked, in deed, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford, when President of the Board of Trade, found it necessary to insert a clause in the Merchant Shipping Act which stipulated that the responsibility of shipowners should be limited to the extent of the ship and freight, but not less than £15 a ton on the registered tonnage; and the object in so limiting it was to prevent inferior ships from entering into the passenger trade. Attention had been drawn to the fact that before the passing of that Act a great number of inferior ships were employed to carry passengers from this country to North America, and it was deemed expedient to prevent inferior ships being employed in that trade. But the object in view was not accomplished. In 1857 I find, while there were shipped at Liverpool in British bottoms for North America 13,000 passengers, as many as 76,000 embarked for the same place in foreign ships. The consequence was that there were greatly enhanced rates of freight—namely, from £3 10s. to £5 per ton—while by that over-legislation which sought to carry out our object, we raised the passenger charge to the poor emigrant to a very serious extent, and he does not appear to thank us for the measure we passed, seeing that he prefers going in a foreign ship to going in a British one. But another influence has been at work in regard to responsibility. Lord Campbell's Act was so onerous that our leading shipowners declined to carry passengers at any cost. They said it was far too serious a responsibility. No amount of money would pay them to keep their ships employed in the Passenger trade under such stringent laws, and the result was that all the passenger trade was thrown into the hands of a few persons, at enhanced rates, and the poor emigrants who were about to settle in North America, were treated worse than ever. Is it not,

I ask, too much that a shipowner shall be mulcted in penalties, it may be of £100,000—for there are many merchant ships afloat of greater value than that—long after his ship is beyond his control? And yet we have not effected the object we had in view. The effect was strikingly manifested in respect to the trade carried on in the conveyance of coolies from Calcutta and other parts of our Eastern Empire and China, inasmuch as it rendered necessary that clause which was introduced into the Chinese Passengers' Act of 1855, and which was so stringent that prudent shipowners declined altogether to allow their captains to convey passengers of that description, whatever might be the rate of passage money; so that not only did we increase the value of labour in these countries, but the carrying trade of coolies and Chinese fell to a great extent into the hands of the Americans. There is another feature of this case to which I must draw the attention of the House—I mean the practice of inflicting very heavy penalties upon shipowners who enter into contracts for the conveyance of Government stores or mails on the one hand, and the infliction of equally heavy penalties on the other by the Board of Trade, in case any serious accident happens. On the one hand, the Admiralty comes down upon the unfortunate shipowner for not going fast enough; and on the other, the Board of Trade comes down upon him for going too fast. The shipowners are placed in a dilemma. If they do not go fast enough they are mulcted by one; and if they go as fast as they are required, they are mulcted by the other, under the responsibility of the Merchant Shipping Act. Considering that every ship carrying passengers must be certified by the surveyors from the Emigration Office; considering that there are no less than forty-nine imperative obligations, for the breach of which he is subjected to penalties varying from forty shillings to £500, and, in some cases, amounting to the forfeiture of the ship; considering that, before he can send a ship to sea, the master must receive a certificate of competency from the Board of Trade, and that the first and second officers must also receive similar certificates;—all these things being taken into consideration, I think that the shipowner has the strongest claims to be relieved of the virtual responsibility he is now subjected to under the ordinary Carriers' Act and Lord Campbell's Act. I have no desire to see the shipowner relieved from that responsibility which might be justly thrown upon him, but I think it might fairly be limited to the sum of £10 per ton, so as to protect the merchant ship entering into the passenger trade; that the limit should be £18 for a ship employed by Government, and £25 per ton for a steamship. I, for one, think that would be a very good proposal. There are questions of pilotage, stamps, and other matters, not in themselves, perhaps, of very great consequence, but all fit subjects to be inquired into before a Select Committee, and discussed in this House; and therefore I do trust that the House will, as it did last year, appoint a Committee of Inquiry.

I have no desire to make any proposition that will have a tendency to reverse the established policy of the country, for I believe that that very policy of free trade is not merely for the benefit of the country, but for the benefit of shipowners themselves. Still, I say that shipowners themselves cannot be said to have free trade while they are fettered with all these burdens and restrictions, while our ports are free and open to every ship in the world, and while the ports of almost every nation in the world are closed to our ships. These are matters which are worthy of a calm and impartial inquiry by a Committee of this House; and I hope that the Government will take some steps to obtain from other nations a reciprocation of that liberal policy which we offer. Then I think I may say that, if the shipping interest is relieved from all peculiar burdens and restrictions, it will have no reason to fear competition from any nation in the world; but that our ships will be found, as they always have been, on every sea, the true harbingers of peace and progress. All I ask for the shipping interest is a full, fair, and impartial inquiry. To use their own forcible expression, all they want is a fair

He agreed with much that had been said by the hon. Member for Sunderland; he thought that there ought to be an entire removal of all unnecessary restrictions upon British shipping. He agreed also in the propriety of the abolition of the Timber Duties. He did not, however, concur with the hon. Gentleman in the observations which had fallen from him in reference to local dues, more particularly the local dues of the town which he (Mr. Horsfall) had the honour to represent. The hon. Member must have forgotten that, in accordance with provisions of a special Act of Parliament, these dues were now appropriated to the benefit of shipping, and not expended for the advantage of the town itself. He also agreed that the efforts made by Her Majesty's Government, if such efforts had been made with a view to the introduction of reciprocity with other nations, it did not seem to have been attended with very beneficial results. He would not follow, however, the hon. Member for Sunderland into the various matters he had brought before the House, though he would add that he entirely concurred with the hon. Member as to the operation of Lord Campbell's Act. There was also another important subject to which he might advert—he meant the operation of our international maritime law—in dealing with which he (Mr. Horsfall) was desirous of impressing the House with the conviction that it was a question most deeply affecting the shipping interest of this country. He was, of course, quite aware that there were political reasons why there was an objection to any interference with that law; but the mode in which it acted ought nevertheless, he thought, to be fully investigated by the proposed Committee, so that such information upon the point might be obtained as would be of use to Parliament in case legislation in regard to it should hereafter be determined upon. It had been too much the custom to consider the shipping question as one solely connected with shipping and manufacturing interests; but it was more than this, it was a question which affected the whole consuming population of the country,—nay, more, it was of the utmost importance when considered in connection with the subject of the national defences; for, if the mercantile marine, which was the nursery of that reserve of 30,000 seamen by which our shores were to be defended, were to continue to suffer under the existing system, the efficiency of the force to which he alluded must be proportionately diminished. He should not on that occasion enter further into a subject which had been so often and so fully discussed, but should content himself with expressing a hope that the Committee, if nominated, would do its duty faithfully by inquiring into the various subjects connected with the welfare of British shipping, and be enabled to supply the House with such a report as would enable it to legislate effectively upon a question of such great national importance.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR said, he rose in no spirit of hostility to the hon. Gentleman who had introduced this Motion to the House. His aim was, that the Committee, if granted, should be armed with such authority as would place it in a position to set at rest that question which was the cause of deep anxiety from one part of the country to the other. He maintained, however, that the Motion of the hon. Member for Sunderland would not set at rest all the disturbing elements in this question. The shipping interest of this country was in a very depressed condition, and they need not go further back than the debate in June last, when hon. Members on both sides of the House, the representatives of great as well as small maritime constituencies, were unanimous in their opinion that a cloud heavier than that which the experience of any former year revealed then hung over British shipping. In support of the justice of that view he might quote the authority of the hon. Member for Sunderland himself, who, in a work which he had recently published, made mention of the adversity under which the shipping interest had laboured ever since the date of the Crimean war, and declared the prediction that that adversity was only a mere passing cloud to have been completely falsified. He might add that in letters which had emanated from the Shipowners' Society of Sunderland a short time ago, in answer to an application which had been addressed to them, it was stated that the depression in the case of the shipping of that port had decidedly increased since December last;

while from North Shields, Montrose, and Glasgow similar replies were returned. He should next call the attention of the House to certain figures which had been furnished by the Board of Trade, in compliance with a Motion which had been made in the month of February last year. Those returns bore out the same view of the case, and if the House acted in a spirit of justice they would institute a searching inquiry into the whole subject. This return showed that the average increase of British entries during the five years from 1844 to 1848 was greater by 72 per cent than the increase during a corresponding number of years from 1834 to 1838, and that the increase of foreign tonnage during that period was greater by 86 per cent than during the like period immediately preceding. The average increase of British shipping in tonnage from 1854 to 1858 was greater by 39 per cent than the average increase from 1844 to 1848; while the average increase of foreign shipping during the same period was 126 per cent. He perceived, moreover, that for the five years previous to the repeal of the navigation laws the average annual increase of British tonnage was 73 per cent, that of foreign being 88 per cent; while, taking a similar period since the repeal of the navigation laws, the increase of British shipping had been at the rate of 40 per cent, while that of foreign shipping had been at the rate of 133 per cent. He did not make this statement with a view merely of raising an argument in support of the old navigation laws; for he had voted in favour of their repeal, and he believed that free trade was an absolute and unmixed blessing. He did not mean to prejudge the opinion of the Committee by pronouncing whether the views of the shipping interest were right or wrong; he merely said that while they murmured and complained, something more would be found necessary than the remedy pointed out by the hon. Member for Sunderland in order to silence those murmurs and apply the healing balm to those complaints. The competition with American and other foreign shipping, even in our colonial ports, was very severe. In the April of last year there were 235 sailing ships of 190,000 tons in the Chinese ports: 100 out of these were British ships; out of the whole number only 69 vessels were loading, and of them only 21 were British vessels; at Hong Kong there were 24 British vessels and 35 American, besides several French, Dutch and Spanish; 26 of them were taking in cargo, of which only six were British and the larger proportion were Americans. So that British vessels were unable to hold their own in the Chinese ports, and American, Spanish, and other foreign ships were running away with freights; and what was true of Hong-Kong was true of other colonial ports. The shipowners did not say, "Enforce reciprocity, go back and avail yourselves of your orders in Council, but look at France—look at America—look at the system of differential duties to which our ships were subject in foreign ports, all but excluding us from their trade, and say whether something cannot be done to put us in a more fair position." He was happy to see, so far as France was concerned, that the prospect was improving; the Emperor was disposed to hold out the hand of a reformer, guided by a judicious and intelligent mind. He hailed this as an indication that the time was not far distant when France would be encouraged to follow the example shown in this country urged by the remonstrances which the debate of that evening would enable the Foreign Office to address to her, when our shipping would participate in the benefits of prosperous commerce, and when the golden threads of friendly interchange would be woven into a band of amity. At present we had to compete with foreign ships, having differential duties in their favour. America excluded us from her coasting trade covering a voyage of 5,000 miles to San Francisco. That could not be called, in any equitable sense of the term, a coasting voyage; if so, what became of the voyage from New York to Aspinwall—was that to be held a coasting trade? The shipowners said, in the spirit of free trade, "Let America meet us on fair and equal terms—we will throw open our Canadian coasting trade; throw open yours." They did not clamour for something evanescent and paltry when they sought admission to this vast field of profitable employment in the American coasting trade. That trade comprised the conveyance of 15,000,000 tons of coals, 4,000,000 barrels of flour, 20,000,000 bushels of wheat, 5,000,000 barrels of provisions, 1,000,000 hhds. of sugar, 21,000,000 bales of cotton, and 1,000,000 hhds. of tobacco. By their exclusion from this coasting trade, British ships were practically excluded from much of the American foreign trade, although the American foreign trade might be nominally open. Having put before the House this view of the question, he considered that he did not ask too much when he asked that the British shipowners might go before a Select Committee to tell their wrongs, and hear from that tribunal whether their grievances were such as Providence only could help but no legislative remedy could heal. Here was the great mercantile interest of this country, with all the relations, direct and indirect, clinging around it, supplicating that House to hear their complaints, and were they to turn a deaf ear to their supplications, or meet them with a prejudiced opinion that they should not be listened to because they were protectionists at heart. He trusted that so respectable a body of gentlemen would at least have the satisfaction of knowing that a British House of Commons would not refuse to listen to their complaints. They did not want a Committee to determine the question of lights. The incidence of lights on the shipping interest had been condemned in principle by the opinion of their most eminent Statesmen, by votes of the House, and by the most enlightened Foreign Ministers. Was it fair that these lights should fall on the merchant and not affect the Royal Navy? Railways were allowed to convey every species of traffic in goods, as well as passengers, without the incidence of any corresponding dues, and he would ask why the shipping interest should be clogged with a burden that bore upon it so heavily? They had the Reports of 1843 and 1845. The opinions of the wisest and most experienced men who could be placed on those Committees were unanimous in declaring that the expense of the lights along the coast of this country ought to be borne by the public revenues of the country. If they wanted an example as to the expediency of that plan he would refer them to Russia, Prussia, France, and America, in all which countries the expense of lighting the coast was borne by the State. In 1851, Mr. Lawrence, in his correspondence with the noble Premier, published an important fact—namely, that two United States steamers, called the Herman and the Washington, paid an annual charge of £800 for the mere privilege of touching at Southampton on their way to Bremen. The whole sum paid by two Liverpool steamers for light dues in the course of the year was £4,748. There were £200,000 paid as port dues in the American trade alone. Surely, then, if the House approached this subject in the spirit of doing but common justice to their own trade, they would be in a better position to ask the Americans to throw open their ports. If they exercised greater economy in their system they might be enabled to reduce their charges from £350,000 to £170,000 a year. The shipping interest had obtained the pledge of their Premier in favour of an alteration. Former Committees had declared themselves unanimously in its favour. What, then, could they hope for from a Select Committee? If the hon. Member for Sunderland were in earnest in the matter, he should not have included this subject at all events amongst the inquiries of a Committee. He would remind that hon. Gentleman of what he said before his former constituents of Tynemouth. His hon. Friend then told them that they had had evidence enough upon the subject, and that they did not require the light of a Select Committee to make the matter clearer. He (Mr. Digby Seymour) thought that they ought to invest the Marine Department of the Board of Trade with full authority over their various lighthouses and their funds. If they did so, they might be enabled, by the exercise of a judicious economy, to reduce the expenses of the lights from £300,000 to £150,000 a year. And when they had done that they might expect a more indulgent hearing from the Chancellor of the Exchequer than they could now hope for. In respect to the question of the passing tolls, he considered it impossible that any Select Committee could throw additional light upon it. The cases of Ramsgate, Whitby, Dover, and other ports presented an admitted injustice, which successive Governments admitted, and had pledged themselves to assist in remedying. Some time ago a right hon. Member (Mr. Lowe) brought in a Bill upon the subject, in which he proposed to exempt all ships from paying passing tolls, except those which actually entered the harbours for the benefit of which they were levied. Now, that he looked upon as a simple solution of the Gordian knot, in respect to those passing tolls. Let the hon. Member for Sunderland, therefore, if he were in earnest in this matter, bring in a Bill at once on the subject; there could be no difficulty in the House dealing with it at once, and settling the question of passing tolls without the delay of sending it before a Select Committee. The hon. Member for Sunderland spoke of referring the harbour and town dues to his Committee. If this course were taken, would his hon. Friend leave out of that Committee the hon. Members for Newcastle, which had its Trinity House—the hon. Member for Hull, with its Trinity House, and the hon. Member for Liverpool, with its corporation? His hon. Friend could not leave out those hon. Members with any degree of consistency if such a Committee were appointed. But supposing that they were on that Committee, the result would be only to raise up many obstacles to the carrying out the main object in view. The best way of getting rid of the monstrous grievances of the Trinity Houses of Newcastle and Hull, and the dues of Liverpool, would be to appoint an arbitrator competent to effect a safe and equitable adjustment of the claims of those places, and the mortgages and other charges upon them. The same observation applied to the Stade dues and the dues claimed by the Russian Government. With regard to the timber dues, that was not a question with which a Committee of that House could deal. That was a question entirely for a liberal-minded Chancellor of the Exchequer, acting upon the advice of Mr. M'Culloch, who said that there ought to be at least a drawback of the duty upon all ships built in this country. A substantial reduction of the duties upon oak and pine used in the building of ships would confer a great benefit upon the shipping interest. He concurred in thinking with the hon. Member that the Merchant Shipping and Passenger Acts might, however, very fairly form the subject of inquiry, with a view to remove the grievances of the shipping interest. He wished also to see the High Court of Admiralty in this country adapted to the purposes for which its constitution and customary practice qualified it. He wanted to see the mechanical power of that court rendered more suitable to the increasing maritime commerce of this country. He contended that the Court of Admiralty, in respect to questions of general or particular average, charter parties, bills of lading and the like, ought to have concurrent jurisdiction with the Courts of common law. The attention of the public was lately called to the case of the Paramatta, in which her commander, Captain Baynton, was charged with misconduct, by which the vessel was lost. Now, he maintained that the Marine Department of the Board of Trade, which had directed that inquiry, had acted in a manner opposed to the elementary principles of common justice, inasmuch as it monopolized to itself at once the executive, elective, and administrative functions without any control whatever. It became in the first instance the prosecutor, it then elected the judges, and ultimately it carried into execution the sentence that had been passed. Under the Merchant Shipping Act, if a person was charged with the loss of a ship he was taken before a magistrate. The Board of Trade then appointed a nautical assessor, and the whole case was again investigated, and, if guilty, the man was punished under the circumstances to which he referred. It would be therefore a fit matter for inquiry by the Committee, if appointed, whether the general marine interests of this country were not in favour of granting an appeal from those courts to the High Court of Admiralty, aided by the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House. Those were the reasons which induced him to give notice of his Amendment, and he now asked the House to grant to those interests that measure of right and justice to which they were entitled from the British House of Commons.

The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given notice.

MR. SOMES, in seconding the Amendment, expressed his conviction that the Motion of the hon. Member for Sunderland would not be satisfactory to the great body of shipowners.

Amendment proposed,—

"After the words 'inquire into,' to insert the words 'the causes of the present depressed condition of British Merchant Shipping, and how far the same are capable of Legislative remedy, and—'"

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. R. W. CRAWFORD said, he did not intend to trouble the House with many observations, as the hon. Member for Sunderland had anticipated him in many of the statements he had wished to make. He, however, thought it due to the House to make some remarks upon the question generally, inasmuch as he had placed upon the paper a Motion relating to the same subject. He had given notice of an inten-

express his satisfaction that the result of the ballot, by placing the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland first upon the paper, had relieved him from the task which he had been himself asked to undertake, and had placed the direction of the Committee, if it should be appointed, in the hands of that hon. Gentleman. He certainly could not concur with the hon. Member for Southampton (Mr. Digby Seymour) in the Amendment he proposed, more particularly as in his speech he had asked the House to exclude from the consideration of the Committee several matters of great importance to the shipping interest, which had been alluded to in the speech of the hon. Member for Sunderland. At the same time he (Mr. Crawford) thought that the terms of the inquiry, as comprised in his own notice, was a much more satisfactory mode of treating the subject than those proposed by the hon. Gentleman who introduced this question to the House. Although more briefly worded, it appeared to comprise all that was required to enable the Committee to inquire satisfactorily into all the points of importance. With respect to the operation of Lord Campbell's Act, he would suggest that the words "the condition of the merchant marine" ought to be added to the terms of the Motion of the hon. Member, in order to make the order of reference perfectly clear and intelligible, and while excluding the consideration of that Act in its effect upon railway companies which might otherwise seem to be included in the duties of the Committee, expressly to direct the attention of the Committee to the former part of the subject. Were this provision omitted, the Committee remembering the lecture of the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir J. Pakington) on the previous evening, might claim the right to enter upon such an inquiry. He, to a certain extent, concurred with the argument of his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, as to what was due from America to this country. In urging the House to authorize the Committee to go into the consideration of the reciprocity question, he was actuated by no desire to undo what was done in 1849. When the Act of that year was under discussion, it would be recollected that an hon. Member wished to limit the extension of the reciprocity clause to those nations who expressed their readiness to reciprocate with us. That proposition was, however, overruled, and the House adopted the course of leaving it open to the Queen in Council to retaliate upon any State that did not open its ports to us. He (Mr. Crawford) thought that was most unwise, and that it would have been better to have opened our ports to the whole world, and have left other nations to act as they pleased. The hon. Gentleman alluded to the circumstances under which America excluded us from the coasting trade, and the hon. and learned Gentleman who moved the Amendment adverted to the vast field of profitable enterprise that would be open to us if we could obtain the freedom of the coasting trade of America. The hon. Gentleman was, however, not warranted by the facts in making such a statement. The real state of the case was, that the depression of other trades had driven American ships into that one, and it had now become as unremunerative as any other, being one proof among many that protection was never beneficial to any interest. Notwithstanding the earnest endeavour of the hon. and learned Member for Southampton to dissuade the House from inquiring into the questions of lights, local dues, passing tolls, timber duties, and the stamps upon policies, it was, in his opinion, most important that the Committee should undertake that investigation, in order that the country might see clearly how those imposts operated upon the interest of shipping. The House would recollect that in the course of last Session he described how the various Acts relating to shipping bore upon the interests of that branch of industry. The Merchant Shipping Act passed in 1854 repealed every previous Act which in any way affected shipping, and was, in fact, a codification of the law, as it stood, at that time. But it introduced various alterations and modifications. It consisted of no less than 548 clauses, all of which were passed through Committee in the course of one sitting. The House would at once understand that such a treatment of the measure in Committee excluded anything like fair consideration. Indeed, it seemed to be taken for granted at the time by the framers of the Bill that it would require revision and alteration. It was to a certain extent tentative. Six years had passed since that Bill passed into an Act, and therefore the great shipowners were perfectly justified in coming down to the House and saying, "Let an inquiry be made as to the way in which this voluminous Act has worked." There were many matters of great interest to shipowners, which if a Committee were granted they could bring under its notice, and the Committee would have an opportunity of considering what improvements might be made. Thus, for instance, there was the Passenger Act. That Act was introduced, not by the Board of Trade, but by the Under Secretary for the Colonies. Under it various penalties, ranging from 40s. to very considerable sums, even the absolute forfeiture of the property, were enforceable for breaches of the regulations which it prescribed. The effect of that Act had been to drive the passenger trade out of the hands of the British shipowners. Of 90,000 passengers who had embarked at Liverpool for the United States 75,000 went in American ships, and only 15,000 in British vessels. At the same time, while our shipowners had lost the traffic, the American shipowners had gained an additional sum per head for every passenger conveyed by them. Nor was that all. A vessel taken up for the conveyance of emigrants was subjected under the Passenger Act to the inspection of an emigration officer. If the emigration officers acted upon any fixed rule the shipowners would have nothing to complain of, but unfortunately they were most capricious in their proceedings, and a vessel was often hewed and hacked in pieces to suit their peculiar views. Again, take the case of an English ship conveying passengers to Australia. She might, for some reason or other, be obliged to put into a port on the Brazilian coast, and might there be found to be in an unseaworthy condition and unfit to continue her voyage. The means of repair might not be at hand, the ship might be condemned, still in that case the captain would be obliged to pass on his passengers to their destination. He did not complain of that; but if the ship were an American ship the captain might snap his fingers at the authorities and leave his passengers in the port where his ship lay condemned to do the best they could for themselves. The Passenger Act, therefore, did not place English and American vessels upon the same footing. English shipowners might also complain of the liability to which they were exposed by that Act. The House would recollect that, in the investigation which took place into the circumstances attending the loss of the Royal Charter an attempt was made to fix upon the unhappy master the charge of intoxication. No proof whatever was adduced that Captain Taylor had been a man of intemperate at the question would see, the truth and sincerity of the grievances that, according to the statement of the shipowners of this country, now existed. He was not present when Her Majesty's gracious Speech was discussed, but in common with other Englishmen he felt great pleasure and pride in observing that the country was congratulated on the state of national prosperity that existed at the present moment, but no allusion was made in that Speech to one thing, and he confessed he thought it an omission—namely, to the depression, which was now assuming a chronic character, of the great shipping interest of this country. This depression was not temporary, as it had now extended over more than two years. He was not aware that it had been in any way alleviated. It might be to some slight extent, but it would have been but considerate to the shipping interest if room had been found for one paragraph in the Royal Speech referring to its present depression. But Her Majesty's Government could amend that omission by cordially accepting the Motion now brought before them, and granting a full and impartial inquiry into all questions connected with these complaints. Allusion had been made—and he was glad it came from the quarter it did, because it illustrated the honest intentions of the Gentleman who called the attention of the House to the subject—allusion had been made to the reciprocity clauses of the Merchant Shipping Act; and they were also told that one of the chief labours of the Committee would be to overhaul the Acts of Parliament passed for the protection—he did not use it in the old sense of the word—and promotion of the shipping interest. While they were engaged in the work he trusted that these reciprocity clauses would not be left out of sight, and he would ask any member of the House who had been instrumental in passing the great repeal of the navigation laws in 1849 a simple question—Why were these clauses put into the Act of 1849? They had been subsequently incorporated in the Mercantile Shipping Act, and formed part of the law of the land. They gave Her Majesty the power of placing the ships of foreign nations that did not reciprocate the advantages which that Act extended to them on the same footing that they placed ours. That was the substance of these clauses. Now, he would ask, were these clauses put in to gain the support of persons to the measure who would not otherwise have voted for it, or were they introduced with the intention of acting on them in the event arising, and which had arisen, of a refusal on the part of foreign nations to reciprocate these advantages? He would follow that question up by a further one. Was Her Majesty's Government prepared, on carefully examining the state of the case, to exercise this power, or to expunge these clauses from the statute book? For what had been their effect? Persons were induced to invest their capital, and to purchase ships on the strength of the power vested in the Crown without the interference of Parliament at all. They were deluded and misled by these clauses at this moment. He did not suppose that that House was likely to grant permission to any Minister to carry these clauses into effect; but they were a delusion and a snare as they at present stood in the statute book, and he would ask Her Majesty's Government whether they were prepared to consider these clauses, and the powers they possessed under them, and expunge or use them as they thought fit? His hon. Friend who spoke on that side of the House (Mr. Bentinck) took up the cudgels on behalf of the American Government in connection with the question of the coasting trade. He would not argue the matter with him, but he would set him right on one or two points, because he had clearly misapprehended the case as put by the Mover of the Motion, with regard to the effect of the restrictions of the American Government on their coasting trade. The hon. Member for Sunderland said the coasting trade of America was closed against us, but the American foreign trade was professed to be open to all nations; nevertheless, under the existing arrangements, we were virtually excluded from a great portion of the carrying trade, which was professed to be an open trade, and he gave illustrations to show how other ships obtained a preference in the matter over British ships, showing that the question of the American coasting trade was very materially and closely allied with that of the foreign carrying trade, which the Americans professed to be open to all countries. The hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Danby Seymour), told the Government that they were in a position to deal with the question without further inquiry. On many material points he (Mr. Liddell), granted that they were, and he would follow up the request that had been made, which, as it came from a supporter of the Government, he hoped would have weight. If they dealt with the passing late and unmixed blessing was to produce on the mind of the recipient the effect which it had produced on the shipowners, then he hoped he might never have an absolute and unmixed blessing inflicted upon him, for he had never seen any persons more dissatisfied with anything than the shipowners were with it. There was a curious fact connected with the Act of 1849—that was the power given to Her Majesty—which of course meant her Ministers for the time being—to revoke the Act. From that fact it was evident that the framers of the Act of 1849 foresaw exactly what would occur—namely, that the system of reciprocity would not be adopted by other countries. It would appear that that anticipation had been fully realized, yet they had not heard of any active steps on the part of the Government to meet the difficulty. In the reply of the Government to the memorial of the shipowners, figures were given, showing an increase of British as well as of foreign tonnage; but those figures did not show that the British tonnage was not working at a loss. The whole case was really in a nutshell. He believed the obstacle in the way of a remedy for that which the British shipowners complained of was to be found in the disinclination on the part of that House to take a step which might be considered one of retrogression from the principles of Free Trade. Within the four seas of Great Britain there were numbers of gentlemen who were free-traders, not from conviction, but from political compulsion. He firmly believed that to be the case, and the reason he believed it was that the language which he heard on the subject of Free Trade in private conversation outside the House was very different from that which he heard within it. He came then to the question, was Free Trade practical, or was it not? He should like to hear his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. M. Gibson) tell the House whether Free Trade could ever exist in this country without entailing national bankruptcy. Did it ever exist in any country except where men lived in the woods and fed upon roots? Was there ever such a thing known as Free Trade in a civilized country? [laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh; but would any of them be kind enough to answer the question in the affirmative, and make good his assertion? He contended that Free Trade was impossible in this country unless they were prepared to couple with it a national bankruptcy. If Free Trade was not a possible state of things, ought its attempted maintenance be a reason for refusing relief to one of the greatest interests in the country? The experiment of Free Trade lurked under all the objections to that relief. It was that which prevented this country from insisting on reciprocity from other countries. If they did this they would be condemning their system of Free Trade. Hence they hesitated. He blamed no Government in particular, for he held in his hand a document which showed that the previous Government had been beating about the bush and were unable to furnish a reason why the petition of the shipowners could not be complied with except the opinion of the Government, that what was asked for would be of no use. He hoped that this question would at once be dealt with, without allowing any more time to elapse in further examination. It was not a reason because some twenty years ago an association was formed avowedly for the purpose of procuring cheap food for the people; but in reality for the purpose of procuring cheap labour for its promoters; it was not a reason because, as a sequel to this league, a certain number of public men abandoned their principles, and betrayed their party; it was not a reason because at a more recent period the House of Commons of that day voted by an immense majority those financial measures to be wise, just, and beneficial which the greater number of that majority had previously voted to be unwise, unjust, and prejudicial to the best interests of the country; it was not a reason because these untoward and discreditable facts were indelibly recorded in the pages of history; these were not reasons why we should now stoop to the lowest act of folly and degradation of which any country could be guilty—namely, a determination not to own and not to apply a remedy to a gross and glaring error. He believed that a gross and glaring error had been committed. He believed that the effect of that error had been to cause a vast amount of depression and distress amongst one of the most important interests in the country. He believed that there was but one remedy for that state of depression. He could not doubt that the House would grant what the Committee now asked for; and judging from the evidence which must be laid before it, he could not doubt as to what would be the general tenor of the Report of that Committee; and when that Report was laid on the table he trusted that the House would not hesitate to give the most prompt and efficient relief to the distress of an interest upon the maintenance of the prosperity of which not only the general extension of our commerce but the very existence of the country must mainly depend.

MR. CLAY said, he was ready to admit that the greater part of the tonnage of the country had been working at a loss, but he thought the cause of the depression lay rather in over-supply of ships than in the result of competition. He agreed, however, with the hon. Member for Sunderland in the object he had in view, but he was afraid he had not sufficiently considered what would satisfy the interest, the affairs of which he proposed to inquire into. He would recommend, therefore, that the hon. Member should allow the introduction into his Motion of some such words as had been suggested by the hon. Member for the City of London, (Mr. Crawford).

MR. INGHAM said, he also thought the words proposed by the hon. Member for London would meet the objections made by the mover of the Amendment, for they would let in all classes of people who, connected with the shipping interest, had either a ground for complaint or a remedy to propose. He desired to see no controversial feeling imported into the discussion of this question, but a fair and impartial inquiry, and then, he had no doubt, the Committee would satisfy all parties with their report. He hoped the Amendment would not be persisted in.

LORD LOVAINE said, he wished to observe, in reference to the observations which had been made relative to the conduct of the late Government in not putting in force the reciprocity clause of the Act, that the Board of Trade had reported so fully upon that question, and in such a manner, that the late Government would be perfectly justified on the face of that Report. It ought to be recollected that the number of foreign ships that enjoyed the advantage of the free-trade principle, and consequently traded on the coasts of Great Britain, was exceedingly small. He thought the present Government would not entertain a different view from that held by the late Government, on the reciprocity clauses. The late Government had done all they could to relieve shipping from the burthens that oppressed it, and they had also prepared measures which would have done away with several of the objections now urged by the hon. Member for Southampton. He believed the present Government would afford the shipping interest the fullest means of stating their objections; and he could only say with regard to himself, that if appointed a member of the Committee he would do all in his power to improve the legislation on the subject.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, that in his opinion when the shipping interest found their property depreciated 30 per cent in value, they should have an opportunity of stating what their grievances were; but he did not understand why, while this was going on, the Government might not bring in a Bill upon a subject which had already been inquired into—namely, the passing tolls and light dues. The local dues on shipping had already been inquired into, but he would empower the Committee to inquire into the objects aimed at by the shipping interest, including the operation of the passenger Act, and afterwards, as a separate subject, into the jurisdiction of the Board of Trade. The duties on foreign timber for shipping had already been condemned, and as a large sum would fall into the revenue this year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would perhaps take the case of the suffering shipping interest into consideration. He agreed with the hon. Member for Sunderland that the depression was not owing to Free Trade, but, at the same time, he thought the shipping interests had a right to have the whole of what they considered their grievances overhauled by a Committee of that House.

MR. H. TAYLOR said, that when the House knew that 40,000 of our best seamen were in foreign service, and that a vast diminution had taken place in the number of apprentices in the merchant service, the matters to be inquired into by the Committee would be seen to be of the most serious nature even in a national point of view. In his opinion measures ought to be taken for establishing a more effective system of supplying the navy with well-trained sailors. Either the system of taking sea-going apprentices should be reverted to, or else that the Government should establish school ships in our rivers to educate lads for the sea. If one of these two things were not done they might one day find themselves in an emergency which it was not agreeable to contemplate.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, looking to the propositions before the House, he preferred the one made by the hon. Member for London (Mr. Crawford), but he thought that if the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) would agree to the introduction of the words proposed by that hon. Member, the House would accept his Resolution. It was because he (Mr. A. Smith) was a believer in Free Trade that the reciprocity clauses ought, in his opinion, to be insisted upon. In respect to our trade with the United States there was this difficulty, that we were sometimes dealing with individual States and sometimes with the whole Confederation. He held, however, that the British Government had a right to insist that the trade between one State and another should not be regarded as a mere coasting trade, but should be held to be identical with the traffic carried on between Great Britain and her Colonies. He agreed with Mr. Labouchere, who, when a Minister of the Crown and a Member of that House, said that the notion that a voyage between Malta and England stood upon a different footing from a voyage between New York and California was preposterous and inconsistent. With regard to the restrictions that had lately been placed upon the shipping interest, he thought they were most absurd, and that there was great room for amendment. One of the greatest grievances of which that interest had to complain was the subjection in which they were placed to the Board of Trade. Only those who were practically connected with the shipping interest knew the absurdities and difficulties to which they were thus exposed, from the whole of which foreign nations were exempt. Owners of vessels had great cause to complain that an examination of masters and mates was obligatory in order to enable them to command a vessel. The certificate, unfortunately, was no test of seamanship. The men who were crammed to a certain extent got the certificate, while those who were far better seamen were unable to obtain it. As an instance he might refer to a case with which he was acquainted of a well-qualified seaman, as far as the most important elements of his profession were concerned, who had been for twenty-four years in the service of his country as a master in the Royal Navy, but having left the navy and desiring to enter the mercantile marine, he was unwilling to undergo the examination in question, notwithstanding the practical evidence of his ability—the twenty-four years' service in all descriptions of the most important kind of navigation—he was held to be unfit for the appointment he sought. He trusted that the Committee now sought to be appointed would be so constituted as to enable them to deal with a petition lately presented by the mercantile marine, praying for something like an organization in the shape of an incorporation, and he thought that the Trinity House formed a very good foundation for such a scheme, and that it might be so modified in its constitution as to meet the wishes of the petitioners, to whom he had alluded. No doubt there were defects in the characters of those connected with the mercantile marine, but nothing would so much tend to improve that service as to treat them with more confidence, allow them more latitude in the regulation of their own affairs, and place them in that position of society to which they were entitled.

MR. LIDDELL observed that the great point of difference under discussion appeared to be between the terms of the several Motions before the House, but the great object, as it suggested itself to his mind, appeared to be not to narrow the scope of this most important inquiry. No one, however, who had listened to this debate, could, he thought, accuse the House of a desire to narrow the question before it, and he thought there were some reasons not yet alleged why the proposed inquiry should take place. It was very natural that the House, which, of its own free will, some years ago made various important changes in its commercial legislation, should be anxious to inquire what the result of those changes and of that legislation had been, especially as they affected one of the most important, if not the most important, of our national interests. Her Majesty's Government also appeared to him to be in a position not enjoyed by the last Government, of approaching this great question without creating the shadow of a suspicion in any man's mind. Had the late Government gone into the various questions raised that night (with rather more warmth than he thought still existed in that House on the subject of protection), they would have been met on all sides with the hue-and-cry that they wanted to reverse our commercial policy and return to the old system of protection. But Her Majesty's Government were not in that position. From whence had this Motion emanated? Why, from a man whom he believed to be as sound and sincere a free-trader as any in the country. The proposition had been supported by representatives of the great commercial communities of the country, and from what he designated the free-trading side of the House. This showed him, and every one who clearly looked only other amendment he proposed was to give Election Committees the same power with reference to the examination of witnesses, provided in the other Bill with regard to trials on indictments. If a witness declined to answer a question on the ground that it tended to criminate or degrade himself, he proposed that no proceeding be taken against him in respect of any answer he might have given in evidence. He hoped there would be no objection to the introduction of the Bill.

WAREHOUSING PLACES (MANCHESTER, &c.), BILL.

COMMITTEE. LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. HADFIELD moved that the House do resolve itself into a Committee to consider Warehousing Places (Manchester).

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. HADFIELD moved to resolve—

"That the Chairman be directed to move the House, That leave be given to bring in a Bill for enabling the parish of Manchester, and the Boroughs of Birmingham, Leeds, Sheffield, and Bradford, to be appointed Warehousing Places."

He believed it was more than fifty years since the system of bonding warehouses first began. At present there were 110 towns, harbours, and creeks, possessing them. Of these sixty-two did not import; and of the remaining forty-eight, twenty-seven imported to a trifling extent only. One half the entire collections of the Customs were in London. There were nine places where the whole annual collection amounted to £6,664 only, and the cost of collection was £8,884, involving a loss of £2,200. The experiment of establishing in an inland town a bonded warehousing place had been tried at Manchester with success, though as yet the town paid the expenses itself. The revenue during the last year paid at Manchester was £155,000, and the cost of collection only £850, being but 11s. 6d. per cent. By extending the system to other towns consumption would be much increased. There was no risk of loss to the revenue during the transit from the port of import, because the duty was paid upon the goods just as they left the port. No frauds had been complained of in Manchester. The Bill which he proposed to introduce would extend to four other towns the privilege at present enjoyed by Manchester.

MR. BEECROFT seconded the Motion, observing that his constituents, the people of Leeds, were anxious to obtain the privilege of bonding—a system which would not only benefit trade and increase the revenue, but would tend to check the practice of adulteration.

MR. LAING said, he could not enter into the subject without in some degree anticipating the statement which would be made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Monday next. He would therefore simply say that the Government did not object to the introduction of the Bill; but when both the Bill and the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement were before the House, it would be seen what course it would be best to take with respect to it.

MR. M'MAHER, in moving the second

tolls, or any other question of that kind, he implored the Government not to mix up with it that which was the cause of the former Bill being lost, not by accident, as the hon. Member for Poole had observed, but because the Government—and he thought it unwise at the time—and the noble Lord retained the place he held when the Bill was brought in, and the Government was somewhat similarly constituted—had mixed up with the consideration of the matter difficult and embarrassing questions involving vested rights and corporate rights, and the rights of property, which that House had always held sacred. If they dealt with the question as a simple question, no doubt it would be carried. The reason why the Passing Tolls Bill was not passed was an obstacle to which he had alluded, and these were matters so difficult of solution that they defied the labours of the Committee upstairs to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. It was decided that many of these disputed points were for localities to settle among themselves, that they ought to be left out of the question, and that they should deal with the Passing Tolls simply with a view to their abolition. The consideration of that question would, no doubt, be a difficult one to deal with, because it involved vested interests and liabilities with which the House was not acquainted; and it would be expedient not to mix up other and more difficult questions, as had been the case on the former occasion. Another hon. Member had touched upon that which really, in the eyes of the House, ought to be more important than all the details into which they would be necessarily led, but which he would not enter on then—namely, the national part of the question. He hoped that the inquiry which the House was evidently generously disposed to grant would be a full inquiry, more particularly as we had now a great and most vital subject before the country relating to the best mode of manning the navy. When the legislature repealed the navigation laws, as an act of justice to the shipowner, it was obliged to make certain concessions to him, with regard to the proportion of British seamen employed in the composition of his crew, and he was now enabled to take a much larger number of foreigners into his service than formerly. But besides that, they abolished the system of compulsory apprenticeship on board of merchant ships, and he believed they would be compelled eventually with regard to the public marine to revert to some system of apprenticeship for the education of seamen. The Committee should also inquire whether the tendency of the existing state of the law had not been to engender in the mind of the merchant sailor something like a feeling of antipathy to serve the country that had placed him in his present position with regard to foreign seamen. He mentioned this point from practical conversations that he had had with men who were well acquainted with the subject. The British seaman saw the foreign sailors throng our quays, but without spending one farthing on our shores, or bringing custom to them, and they purchased nothing in our seaport towns, inasmuch as they bring all their stores with them, which they consume on board, free of duty. This, therefore, ceased to be a marine question, but became important as a social one to the commerce of the country. On the contrary, our own sailors on going to a foreign port—if they were lucky enough to get in at all—in Spain, France, and other places, were met by prohibitive duties. Besides, the foreign sailor was much more cheaply fed, could live on food that the English sailor could not, and this tended to displace a large number of our English sailors. Was it to be supposed that this was not calculated to weigh in the mind of the British seamen? The Government had now a great measure before the country, and he would give them the fullest credit if they carried it—he meant the provision for a reserve of seamen for the defence of our shores in times of emergency. He was told it was not working in the way that was expected, and that the retaining fee was not accepted by sailors as had been expected. How did they know but that this feeling of soreness and dislike to serve the Government, arising from the inferior position of the British seaman to that of the sailors of foreign Governments, might not have something to do with it? With regard to apprenticeship, he thought the country required a national system of apprenticeship to be provided for our seamen. He hoped that her Majesty's Government would be in a position to do this without creating suspicion. He trusted they would accept the Motion in its widest sense, and investigate every portion of the subject. There was plenty of work cut out, more than one Committee could do in a year; but let the House and the country know what had been the working of the great Act of 1849, ascertain whether, it had been on the whole conducive to the commercial prosperity of the country. Let them ask whether if it had failed in any of its details, what these details really were; let them approach the inquiry impartially, and unhampered and uncontrolled by any previous prejudices that might have existed on one side or the other; let them consider that the shipping interest was second to none, he was almost saying it was the first interest in this kingdom—an interest that had placed this country in the proud position that it occupied—that had obtained and established her maritime superiority and prosperity, remembering too that if we lost that maritime supremacy and prosperity we should lose our position as a nation.

MR. CAVE said, he rose to express a hope that the suggestions both of the hon. Member for Sunderland and the hon. Member for the City of London would be adopted and incorporated in the Motion before the order of reference went to the Committee. In this way the investigation would be considerably widened. Besides, after the discussion of the previous night on the re-appointment of the Packet Service Committee, it was desirable that the objects and scope of the inquiry should be well defined in the order of reference. If the shipping interest suffered no depression, or only temporary distress, there would be no necessity for investigation. But if the Committee were appointed the subject they would have to investigate would be two fold, and the whole inquiry would hinge upon the disabilities to which British shipping was subjected either by British or Foreign enactments. They had heard that English enactments pressed—and he was willing to admit the truth of the allegation—in many instances with undue force on the British shipowner, and the reconsideration of these Acts would be of the greatest possible advantage, value, and importance to the British shipowner. Great benefit would arise from their revision and reconstruction, and he hoped that the British shipowner would accept this as an instalment, not shutting them out from future demands. It should not, however, be forgotten, that the relaxation of burdens which pressed equally upon the foreign and upon the British shipowners, would not affect their relative position. As an illustration of the extreme absurdity of the way in which the timber duties, for instance, pressed upon the British shipowner, he might mention that the other day a ship on entering one of the northern ports, by accident went on shore, and, in addition to this misfortune, the unfortunate owner was immediately pounced upon by the Custom House officer, and made to pay duty for the timber into which his vessel was converted by the winds and waves. As regarded the other principal point involved in this question—the point which depended upon Foreign enactments—which had been dealt with by hon. Members on the other side (he would except the hon. Member for Truro) with some reserve, as if they were afraid of their own conclusions, the point in fact of reciprocity. He could state cases where the existing want of reciprocity most materially affected the British shipowner. For instance, a French ship at Calcutta commanded a higher rate of freight for the homeward voyage than an English one, simply because she had a choice of two destinations. Again, an English ship went from China to New York and discharged her cargo. She was obliged, if she wished to return to China, to go back to England, probably in ballast. But an American ship going from China to New York, after discharging her cargo, could take a fresh one and go a coasting voyage to San Francisco, or even our own colony of Australia, which would take her more than half way back to China. It was said we could not enforce the reciprocity clauses. If that were so, it was a humiliating consideration that we should have provisions on our statute book which were inoperative, and therefore a delusion and a snare; but the fact was we might enforce them easily by denying corresponding advantages to those States which refused them. In the days of Huskisson disabilities were imposed upon the merchant ships of Prussia. What was the consequence? Prussia threatened to retaliate, and the English Minister was compelled to give way. Now, the trade of Prussia was not nearly so important to England, as the trade of England is to America and France. If, therefore, Her Majesty's Government in the present day were to adopt a firm attitude, not in a spirit of hostility, but in a reasonable and just manner, towards those other countries that now refused the same advantages we gave to them, they would find them more pliable than we thought they were, and then our shipping interest, restored to equal rights with that of other nations, would, in spite of bad food and scanty wages of the foreigner, fear competition with the mercantile marine of no country in the world.

cedure. So sound a lawyer was he considered, and the Government of the day had so great a respect for his opinions, that he was employed by them to draw up this Report. In this Report which was presented in 1856 or 1857, he said,—

“The system itself, however, is such as cannot fail to lead to mischievous results, even though it be administered in the best manner, and with the most laudable motives. In the first place, the investigation is a private one, and consequently facts may there obtain credence which, if disclosed, might be contradicted or explained. Secondly, it is very doubtful whether there be any jurisdiction to administer an oath on making an affidavit to be submitted to the Home Office. This, in addition to the secret mode of proceeding, no doubt leads to false statements being made, and that, too, with perfect impunity. Thirdly, no notice of the application, it is believed, is ever given to the prosecutor. The truth is that the law, allowing no direct means of obtaining a new trial, or revision of the sentence, an application is made to the Home Office in every case where any materials can be obtained for that purpose, and if sufficient materials can be produced to throw a reasonable doubt upon the correctness of the verdict, the Home Office is placed in a most unfortunate position, as there is no power to order a new trial or fresh investigation to take place. Three courses alone are open—to let the sentence be executed, to grant a pardon, or to mitigate the sentence. It is to be remembered that the very cases in which the Home Office is most likely to be misled are ever the most important of all, and therefore it is of the last importance that they should be properly determined, and not only so, but in such a manner that the public may be convinced that they have been so determined. Nor is it to be forgotten that it is at least a very doubtful question whether it be expedient that the solemn verdict of a jury, given after an open trial, should in any case be treated as a nullity, unless the proceedings are such as to satisfy all reasonable persons that such verdict was erroneous.”

Such was the opinion of Mr. Greaves, who when examined himself before the House of Lords in 1848 stated that every wrong ought to be redressed before a proper legal tribunal. Wrongs were done in criminal as in civil cases, and parties should have a right to redress in criminal and civil cases. Mr. Greaves was asked what remedy he proposed? He said, “I propose as a remedy an absolute and unconditional right to every person who is convicted to appeal to one of the common law Courts of justice at Westminster Hall.” He (Mr. M'Mahon) did not believe it was necessary that he should trouble the House with more authorities. They had heard him read the opinions expressed in reference to this question by Lord Denman, the Lord Chief Baron, and Mr. Greaves; and, in fact, he was not aware of any authority of eminence in this country who had ever declared in favour of the appeal to the Home Office as against the legally established tribunals of the country. In the Report of the proceedings of the Committee of the House of Lords, which sat in 1848, there was a question put to Mr. Baron Alderson by Lord Campbell, from which it might be presumed that no right of appeal in criminal cases existed in France or America. He should state that such was not the fact. In France a party convicted had, where a defect or mistake had arisen on any matter of law, an absolute right of appeal to the Court of Cassation. In France a party might be convicted by a bare majority, as in Scotland; but if it was expressly provided by the Code d'Instruction Criminelle, book 2, title 2, c. 4, article 351, that if the accused was convicted only by a simple majority “the Judges shall deliberate amongst themselves on the same point, and if the opinion of the minority of the jury is adopted by the majority of the Judges, so that in uniting the number of voices, this number shall exceed that of the majority of the jury and the minority of the Judges the opinion favourable to the accused shall prevail,”—and by the 352nd article it was provided. “If, except in the case provided for by the preceding article, the Judges are unanimously convinced that the jury though observing the forms are mistaken in substance—the Court shall declare that it supersedes the judgment and will remit the affair to the following session to be submitted to a new jury, of which none of the first jurors shall form a part.” He was aware of an instance within the last two years, in which a Judge in the county of Hereford expressed a decided dissent from the verdict of a jury convicting an accused party of an offence, and stated that he would not pass sentence on the man, but would refer the case to the Home Office. In France the Judge would have an absolute right to postpone the case to another session, and have the party tried before a new jury. In America the uniform rule for many years, at least since 1830, had been to grant a new trial in criminal cases, and thus to extend to those cases the same principles which were established in civil causes. In an American work of very high authority — Wharton on the Criminal Law, it was said that in recent times with the exception of a few cases in which Mr. Justice Story and another Judge attempted to disturb it.

to put French vessels engaged in the direct trade on the same footing as British vessels, yet we maintained a system of exemptions in favour of freemen and residents in certain towns, which, as Frenchmen could not become such privileged persons, prevented their really being on as good a footing as all owners of British vessels. He did not say whether such a course of argument was correct or not, but he pointed it out as a remarkable circumstance, that while the hon. Member was charging other nations with not keeping reciprocity treaties, they urged that we were not entirely carrying out the engagements which we had entered into with them. The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. A. Smith) had condemned the Board of Trade and the strictness of their examinations, but it should be recollected that they only acted under the Merchant Shipping Act. The Parliament of England had passed certain laws, and all that the Board of Trade did, was conscientiously and faithfully to carry them out. With regard to the master in the Navy who did know sufficient of navigation to pass the examination, he very much doubted, if that were so, his capability to be the captain of a merchant ship; but he thought his hon. Friend was misinformed upon the subject, because he imagined a master in the navy would, as a matter of course, have a certificate given him as competent to command a merchant vessel. With regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Southampton, he thought the House would consider it hardly admissible. He did not wish to dispute for an instant the assertion that the shipping interest was in a depressed condition, but he asked the House whether they had sufficient proof by figures of such a state of things that they were prepared to pass a deliberate Resolution that there existed at the present moment such depression as to demand inquiry. It would be prejudging the question. They had not facts before them to justify their passing such a Resolution. It might be so, but Parliamentary documents did not show it. They had the assertion, he admitted, of most respectable men, and statements to that effect from associations, but they had no figures which showed a greatly depressed condition of the shipping interest. On the contrary, the figures which were laid before Parliament would rather lead to a contrary conclusion. They would find that, although in 1855 there was an enormous increase in the number of sailing and steam ships built and registered, owing to the Russian war, there had been an annual augmentation in subsequent years far beyond what used to take place in former times. In 1856, 244,000 fresh tons were built and registered; in 1857, 250,000 fresh tons were built and registered, and in 1858, 208,000 tons. But a far better test than this was the number of tons actually employed. In 1855, 3,599,000 tons of British shipping were employed in the home and foreign trade; in 1856, 4,000,000 tons; in 1857, 4,211,000, and in 1858, 4,325,242 tons. Such an increase as this irresistibly led to the conclusion that if there were a serious depression in British shipping, it could but be temporary, and that we might look forward to a speedy improvement, even if it had not already begun. The old comparison, so often made between the number of British ships entering and clearing from the different ports of the United Kingdom, and the number of foreign ships so entering and clearing out was somewhat fallacious, because in the return of British ships no account was taken of those employed in other parts of the world, between Australia, for instance, and foreign ports. But had the alleged depression been peculiar to England? From a return contained in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in the United States which had been recently put into his hands, it appeared that while there had been an increase in the British shipping employed in the last three years in the home and foreign trade, there had been a positive decrease in the shipping of the United States employed in their home and foreign trade. And if similar returns could be obtained for France and Holland, he had every reason to believe that they would show the same result. These were the figures. From 1855, up to the present time, 335,072 tons had been added to the tonnage of British ships employed in our home and foreign trade—about 10 per cent—while there had been a decrease of 66,964 tons in the tonnage of American ships, or a decrease of rather less than 1 per cent. The conclusion at which those persons, who, he believed to be fully competent to form an opinion, had arrived, and which he himself had also formed, was that this alleged depression was a fluctuation common to all trades and employments. It would be quite impossible by any legislation to secure to the shipowners year by year an undeviating course of prosperity —to provide that freights should be settled at one fixed sum, or that the shipping interest should derive from the employment of their vessels the same uniform rate of profit. The only fair way was to take an average of years, and the progressive increase for the last few years in the British tonnage employed ought to give us confidence that the depression would be but temporary, and he hoped soon to see the period return, if indeed it had not already commenced, when there would be a considerable improvement in the condition of the British mercantile marine. There was no objection on the part of the Government to an inquiry, but he would be no party to inserting words in the order of reference leading to the idea that it was possible to find a remedy for the alleged depression by reversing the commercial policy of this country. As far as he could gather, there appeared to be no such desire on either side of the House. Hon. Gentlemen who had spoken on that side rivalled each other in their professions of adherence to Free Trade, while on the other not even the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) seemed desirous of returning to Protection. With regard to Lord Campbell's Act, it was undoubtedly true, as had been pointed out by the hon. Member for London, that there was something more in that Act than the question of how far it bore upon the shipping interest, since it was passed to provide a remedy for injuries sustained, either by the fault or negligence of railway companies, or any other carriers by land or sea. By the old common law a remedy could not be obtained in cases where death ensued, and Lord Campbell's Act simply extended the principle formerly applicable to cases of injury short of death, to cases where death ensued either on board steamers, or sailing vessels, on railways, or any other conveyance, an extension to which he thought no one could entertain a reasonable objection. Merchant shipping was placed in a rather more favourable position by a clause in the Merchant Shipping Act, which only rendered owners of vessels liable to a certain amount. If Lord Campbell's Act were inquired into by the Committee, it would be better that the inquiry should be limited to the effect of that Act on merchant shipping, and he would ask leave to insert words in the order of reference to that effect. He would therefore conclude by suggesting that the Resolution should be amended so as to read, "A Select Committee to inquire into the state of British Shipping, and into the operation of the burdens and restrictions especially affecting Merchant Shipping."

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Select Committee appointed :—

"To inquire into the state of Merchant Shipping, the operation of the burdens and restrictions especially affecting Merchant Shipping, and of the following Statutes: 9 & 10 Vict., c. 93, an Act for compensating the families of Persons killed by Accidents; the Merchant Shipping Act (1854); the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act (1855); the Passenger Act (1855); and the Chinese Passenger Act (1855)."

CORRUPT PRACTICES PREVENTION ACT (1854) AMENDMENT BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. MELLOR said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act (1854), and to make further provision for the detection and punishment of bribery, treating, and undue influence at Parliamentary and Municipal Elections. He felt much encouragement in bringing forward his Motion by the discussion which took place the other night on the notice given by the Secretary of State for the Home Department in reference to withholding the issue of the writs for Gloucester and Wakefield. Such an unanimity of condemnation of the offence of what he might properly call the crime of bribery, was then exhibited by the House that any Member who would point out more stringent provisions than those which the law already provided needed but little apology for bringing forward the subject. A deep feeling prevailed in the country that the House was not in earnest in endeavouring to put down this offence, and it was this feeling which induced him at the close of last Session to divide against the Motion for the appointment of a Commission to inquire into corrupt practices at Gloucester, because he could obtain no pledge from the Government that they would take any steps on the Report of the Commission to punish the persons who might be found guilty of bribery. The Report of the Gloucester Commission contained striking evidence of the prevalence of the opinion that the House was not sincere in its attempt to put down bribery. The right hon. Member for Wells, late Secretary of the Treasury (Sir W. Hayter) in his evidence before the Committee, speaking of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act 1854, said, "I confess that I ought to be acquainted with that Act, but practically I have always considered it a dead letter." This was an expression of the opinion of a Gentleman who was a party to that Act. He went on to say, "Everybody acquainted with election matters knows it is almost invariably the practice to send to the different agents the money necessary for the election expenses. I have never known a contest of any sort in which that was not done, notwithstanding the Act. I think it useless. No doubt it is wrong not to observe an Act of Parliament. I am not saying it is not; but what I say is, that practically this Act of Parliament is uniformly disobeyed." Mr. Price, the late Member for Gloucester, speaking of the Act before the same Commission, said, "I always looked upon it as that sort of homage which is paid by vice to virtue." Now, if the House was to be looked upon by the country as a set of shams and impostors, well and good; but he hoped he should induce the House to come to a different conclusion, and to take some measures to show that they really were in earnest in doing something that would put a stop to this detestable offence. He was not alone in his opinion, nor were those Gentlemen who had given this evidence of the utter inutility of many of the provisions of that Act of Parliament. It was based, as it appeared to him, on the notion that the publicity given to election accounts would render candidates and agents more careful, and would, in point of fact, tend to curtail the expenses of elections. No doubt, this desirable result had been to some extent realized whenever the Act was honestly carried out, but its deficiencies were occasioned by want of power to compel the performance of its own enactments. It had become a mockery and a delusion, and the Commissioners stated that it was rather a cloak for bribery than a means of detection. A letter had lately appeared in The Times addressed to Lord Brougham, and written by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Suffolk, which afforded a most eloquent, just, and faithful account of the existing state of things, and of the law with reference to bribery and corruption at elections. It stated that—

"The prevalence of this crime in more than half the electoral boroughs of the kingdom; the inadequacy of the laws in being to the repression of the offence; the utter failure of every attempt hitherto made by legislation, by punishment, by exposure, by disfranchisement, even to check this practice; and the discredit thus brought, not only upon the country, its laws, and character, but all free constitutions, and the very name of liberty itself, seem to render it imperative upon the Government and the Legislature to make one more effort, and resort to some yet untried means to remedy this great evil."

The conclusions, however, at which his hon. and learned Friend arrived, and the suggestions which he made for endeavouring to put a stop to the abuse by a system of promissory oaths and declarations, seemed to him altogether idle, and must prove futile in practice. Men who would palter with their consciences by signing the declaration required by the existing law, according to which they bound themselves not to appoint any agent for election expenses without giving notice to the auditor, would attach as little weight to any system of oaths that could be devised. Declarations and oaths would touch the consciences of honest men, but would in no way restrain those unscrupulous aspirants to the honour of a seat in that House by whom bribery was now knowingly practised. The true remedy in the case was an increase in the severity of the punishment to which the bribers or the bribed were exposed. All the witnesses who were examined before the Gloucester Commission, and particularly one or two of great experience—Sir Maurice Berkeley for instance—gave it as their opinion, that if the House were in earnest to put down bribery, it might easily do so by passing a more stringent Act. Sir Maurice Berkeley said, "Bribery cannot be put a stop to unless severer measures of repression against the briber are resorted to." Now, the existing law made bribery, or the exercise of undue influence, a misdemeanour, punishable by a fine or imprisonment. When they talked of a more stringent measure, therefore, they meant something more than fine or imprisonment. It was obvious that the subordinate agents were generally persons of little standing and means, and that the sending them to prison was merely to enable them to live in prison as comfortably as at home; the fine would be paid by the person who employed them, and they would receive their weekly wages during the whole time they were in prison. This was no punishment whatever; to show that bribery was regarded as a degrading crime it was requisite to affix to it a degrading punishment, and he therefore would propose a stringent measure, and that was to give a larger discretion to the Judge, and enable him to impose the penalty of hard labour as well as that of imprisonment. He did not desire, as was contemplated by his learned Friend, in the letter to which he had referred, to subject the guilty parties to two years' penal servitude; neither would he adopt the view of a noble and learned Lord by making the crime felony, with a punishment of two years upon the treadmill. He merely proposed that the Judge should, if he thought fit, have power of ordering that the prisoner be kept to hard labour for a period not exceeding six months during the term of his imprisonment. The crime of bribery, was not unlike that of manslaughter, which might deserve any punishment from transportation for life down to a nominal fine, it was of various degrees, and he therefore made this power not arbitrary but discretionary. It was no wonder that men were found to accept bribes, not only from stress of circumstances, but from the belief that the act was not really looked upon as a crime, when they saw persons of superior education and position coming amongst them and resorting to such practices to obtain personal elevation. This feeling was graphically expressed by one of the witnesses before the recent Election Commission, who said, "how could a poor man be blamed for taking a little money, when twenty-four lawyers were each taking their twenty-five guineas and two guineas a day!" One of the main features of any anti-bribery Bill must be the production of a feeling of insecurity between employer and employed—between the briber and the bribee. This could only be done by giving to that one who gave information or evidence against the other an indemnity such as was given to witnesses who gave evidence before Commissions of Inquiry into these practices. There was a remarkable instance of the importance and necessity of this in the Gloucester Report. On the election in 1857 for the borough of Gloucester, two petitions were presented to that House, one on the part of the Conservatives, the other on the part of the Liberals. They failed from want of proper evidence, and the Committee dismissed both petitions. Attempts were made to prove five cases, but they wholly failed; whereas it had been elicited by the Commissioners who were armed with this power of granting indemnities, that at that very election no fewer than 109 persons had been bribed on the Conservative side. Such a fact alone showed that the existing modes of procedure and rules of evidence were wholly inappropriate to the discovery of a crime which it was to the interest of both parties to conceal. He therefore proposed to give to either the party offering or the party receiving a bribe an indemnity against the pains and penalties which he had thereby incurred, provided that he would come forward and furnish evidence upon which his accomplice might be convicted. Another necessary provision would be to abolish the right which a witness now had of declining to answer any question which he thought fit to say tended to criminate or degrade himself. A very remarkable instance of the way in which the existing privilege of witnesses might be used for the purpose of defeating the ends of justice had lately occurred at Norwich, where a gentleman, a banker and a magistrate, had refused to answer a question on the ground that it tended to criminate him. He trusted that the attention of the Lord Chancellor had been directed to this case. Did this gentleman still remain in the commission of the peace? Was he a criminal and afraid of justice? And if so, was he fit to remain on the bench? At all events, his refusal had rendered abortive one of the most prominent cases that had presented itself of trying the effect of our criminal law upon the practice of bribery. To meet such cases for the future he proposed that any person refusing to answer before a tribunal authorized to inquire into bribery on the plea that the answer would criminate himself should be deemed guilty of contempt of court; but he would not be so unfair as to make an answer thus extorted evidence in any indictment against the witness himself, unless it were one of perjury. If a man gave a false answer upon oath he must of course take the consequences; but he (the hon. Gentleman) would not seek to convict him of bribery by his own confession. Without these two provisions the House might go on legislating for ever against bribery without effect. Another provision of great importance would be comprised in the Bill. Nothing was more notorious than the way the present enactment, which required all payments to be made through the election auditor or election agent, was evaded. Of this, too, the Gloucester Commissioners had detected a remarkable instance. The sums expended, as returned to the election auditor, were, for Sir Robert Carden, £1,021 10s. 11d.—it was really wonderful to see the particularity to which this account condescended—for Mr. Price, £464 11s. 6d., and for Mr. Monk the same. Now the sums ascertained by the Commissioners to have really been expended (and they were probably under the mark) were, for Sir Robert Carden £2,600, and for the other two candidates £2,300. He (Mr. Mellor) had lately seen a letter from a defeated candidate, in which it was stated that his side had spent £3,000, and the other £5,000; but on being curious enough to look at the published accounts he found the two sums modestly set down, the one at £670 and the other at £570. At present there was nothing to enforce the delivery of correct accounts, and to meet that difficulty he (Mr. Mellor) proposed to make it a misdemeanour for any person, whether candidate or not, to pay any money for any expense incurred during an election, except through the agent for the election expenses under the Act, the amount being returned to the auditor as provided by the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act. By these means, although he did not, of course, suppose that the Bill would render bribery impossible, some vitality would at least be introduced into the legislative enactments to prevent bribery, until time and opportunity concurred to effect its complete suppression. There was yet another provision to which he would refer. One of the most insidious forms of corruption was the colourable employment of voters as messengers, runners, and so on. At Gloucester 150 persons had been so employed on the one side, and 112 on the other, whereas the Commissioners said that 30 would have been an amply sufficient number. The Hull Committee had likewise reported a similar practice which had prevailed at the last election for that borough. They stated that it had been proved before them that 487 persons were thus employed on behalf of Mr. Hoare, and 493 on behalf of Messrs. Clay and Lewis; that 300 of those employed for Mr. Hoare were voters and were paid sums varying from 2s. 6d. to £3 5s. each, for which few of them had rendered any adequate services. He (Mr. Mellor) proposed to make it a misdemeanour knowingly to employ any person who was on the register of voters; and he thought it would be advisable to make the penalty also attach to the employé, with of course the same provisions as regarded indemnity as he had already described in the case of bribery. The Gloucester Commissioners had pointed out that the municipal elections were a very fertile source of bribery at the parliamentary elections, inasmuch as the effect of a bribe at the former was to retain the voter as it were for parliamentary elections; and he proposed, therefore, that his Bill should be applicable to both; for he believed that there had never been such extensive corruption at municipal elections as had prevailed during the past year. The Gloucester Commissioners pointed out that the constitution of certain friendly societies offered an easy means of extensive bribery. These societies were to be met with on both sides; there were "Reform Clubs" and "Conservative Associations;" so that a candidate had nothing to do but to become a liberal contributor to the funds of one or the other to ensure the support of a large number of mercenaries whenever a vacancy might occur. He (Mr. Mellor) thought that cases of this kind might be dealt with under the provisions which he had suggested. He had likewise added a short—and which he had no doubt would prove a useful—form of indictment; and he had carefully considered the question of costs. Proposals had been made for the appointment of a public officer to conduct prosecutions for corrupt practices; but he thought it a sufficient reason why such a course should not be adopted that public prosecutions invariably entailed an enormous expense upon the country. For instance, the prosecution of the British Bank directors had cost the country very little short of £20,000; a bill for £17,500, followed by another for £1,200 or £2,000, having already been sent in. What he proposed was, that the costs of prosecuting indictments in cases of bribery where the magistrates had committed or held the accused party to bail, and where the Judge thought it a proper case, should be defrayed in the same manner as the expenses of prosecuting other indictments; but, in order to prevent vexatious proceedings, he would compel parties preferring indictments without first applying to the magistrates to commit the accused, to give security for costs to the amount of £200 under penalty of the proceedings being stayed. Such were the clauses which he proposed. He did not pretend to say that they would constitute a complete cure for bribery; but he was anxious to limit his suggestions to such things as he hoped would not meet with much opposition, so that if any sudden disaster should happen (which he trusted would not be the case) they might not be sent back to their constituents without having provided means in some measure calculated to give vitality to the laws against bribery and corruption. He would call on the House, in conclusion, to adopt these proposals, to show the country that they were in earnest in the strong language with which they had so often characterized the resort to undue practices in the election of Members, denouncing the cases revealed as "horrible disclosures," in terms which the greatest moralists could not complain of, and describing the practice as a cancer eating into the vitals of the political system. The hon. Member concluded by moving for leave to bring in his Bill.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he did not rise to oppose the introduction of the Bill, but to express his gratification that an hon. Gentleman on the other side of the House proposed to introduce a measure the effect of which, it was hoped, would be to check, if not utterly to put an end to, bribery throughout the kingdom. At the same time he could not help expressing his regret that no intimation in a distinct and satisfactory form had been given by any member of Her Majesty's Government that the great measure of Reform which was now promised to the House and the country would be accompanied by a measure to put down the practice of bribery; for having a much larger experience in this House than his hon. and learned Friend, he might venture to tell him that no measure that could be brought forward in this House had the least chance of success unless it were seriously and earnestly undertaken, and cordially supported, by the Government. His hon. and learned Friend had alluded in terms from which he (Sir F. Kelly) could not differ, to the effect of the Corrupt Practices Act of 1854. That Act had failed in respect of many of its objects if it had not proved entirely useless, but he attributed that result to the fact that the intention of its framers had been altogether disregarded and lost sight of in the passing of the Bill through the House. It was the intention of its original framers that all money whatever applied to any election purposes should in the first instance be paid into the hands of some public officer, and that any one who paid money as election expenses, except through that officer, should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour, and be liable to a severe punishment; but the punishment was taken away, and a nominal pecuniary penalty alone inflicted. He agreed with his hon. and learned Friend that a promissory oath could be seldom carried into effect; and he believed that it never occurred to any Member of the Committee who sanctioned the principle of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act of 1854, that that Act was intended to impose a promissory oath against the commission of any offence whatever. It was intended merely that an oath should be taken that no money for election purposes should be paid by any one whomsoever, whether candidate, or relation, friend or agent, of the candidate, except through the authorized public officer; but the provisions referring to this point were so mutilated in their passage through the House that he hesitated not to admit that the Bill, though it had not proved altogether a dead letter, had in many respects almost entirely failed in the effect anticipated from it. Although he could not venture to criticise a Bill that was not before them, this much he might say with regard to the measure now proposed by his hon. and learned Friend, that he entertained no hope that any mere addition to the severity of the punishment to be inflicted upon acts of bribery would be accompanied by the slightest beneficial results. The punishment of bribery at that time was such, that if gentlemen of condition and respectability entertained the remotest notion that on conviction it would be carried out, bribery would have been done away with long ago. But the severity of a punishment did not always deter from the commission of a crime, and the way in which the offence was now committed, or to speak more plainly, the way in which the money to be spent in bribery was supplied by the candidate and passed through many hands to the electors bribed, was such as to throw a protecting shield over the persons from whom it emanated, but who must know, or at any rate entertain a suspicion, often a belief, that its ultimate employment was to be in bribing voters. With respect to the Bill of the hon. and learned Member, he should rejoice to see it laid on the table. He had no doubt that it would receive due attention from Her Majesty's Government, and every clause would receive from him the most earnest consideration, though he did not suppose that the Bill, if carried, would put an effective stop to bribery. His hon. and learned Friend had stated that he anticipated, as he well might, that he (Sir F. Kelly) would acquiesce in a clause which would make bribery penal, and include it in the class of misdemeanours, making it punishable in any one, by whomsoever the offence was committed, to pay any money for the purpose of any election, except into the hands of an election auditor. A clause to the same effect was printed and laid upon the table as forming part of the Bill of 1854; but unfortunately, from the scruples of Members, who were afraid that the penalty might be abused, and from the severely penal character of the results which might follow an indictment, the clause was rejected, and the merely nominal penalty, to which he had alluded, was imposed upon those who paid money for election purposes except through the hands of an auditor. He was glad to find also that his hon. and learned Friend had reverted to the practice of paying money to voters, and to relatives and friends of voters, under the excuse of employing them as messengers at elections. This was one of the many modes by which the provisions of the Act were evaded. Great credit was due to his hon. and learned Friend for calling attention to the question, but until the House adopted some measure which would provide that every farthing of the money spent in an election, whether legal or illegal expenses, should be placed in the hands of some public responsible officer, whose position in society was such that purity and integrity in the discharge of his duties should be secured, in his (Sir F. Kelly's) opinion bribery would never be effectually prevented. He would not enter, at the present moment, into the provisions of the measure about to be introduced, but he appealed to the two noble Lords opposite to look not only into the clauses of the Bill, but into every suggestion which might be made which was calculated in any way to lead to a measure which would put an end to bribery. When the Bill was before the House he would render the hon. Gentleman the best assistance he could, and he hoped to receive a like assistance from him upon the Bill which he (Sir F. Kelly) was shortly to move. He thought that, with the assistance of the Government, and every Member of the House who was anxious to remedy the present state of things, they would be able to frame a measure which would have the effect of putting an end to an evil which had become a blot and stain upon the representative institutions of the country.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: It is not my intention, Sir, to oppose the introduction of the Bill which my hon. and learned Friend behind me has moved for leave to bring in, while I shall, at the same time, refrain from giving any pledge upon the part of the Government as to the opinion we may feel ourselves obliged to pronounce with respect to its details when it comes on for consideration. The object which my hon. and learned Friend has in view is one which I am sure every man within the walls of this House must regard as in the highest degree deserving of attention, and the accomplishment of which is most important in order to secure the proper working of the constitution of the country. The subject is one, however, upon which I am afraid some sort of laxity of opinion prevails in many of our constituencies. It appears to me that in several places the electors—especially those of the lower class—do not look upon the receipt of a bribe as an offence of that moral dye which we consider it to be; and, so far from concurring with those who contend that the House of Commons is more open to censure in the matter than the country at large, I believe, upon the contrary, that a stronger feeling against bribery prevails in this House than among the public generally out of doors. But be that as it may, I hope that some measure may be devised—whether it be that which my hon. and learned Friend now proposes, or that which the hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke last leads us to infer he has in contemplation—which now, after the experience which we have have derived from a general election, may be more effectual in the attainment of its object than the Corrupt Practices at Elections Act has been found. I would remind hon. Members that upon a former occasion we, when in office, and when it was proposed to appoint a Committee with the view of inquiring into the operation of that Act, urged upon the House the expediency of deferring any such investigation until after the experiment had been tried of the mode in which the measure would operate at a general election. The result, I think, has shown that the advice which we then gave was sound, and that we stand in a better position now to revise the Act than would otherwise have been the case. In answer to the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir F. Kelly), who says that, so far as he is aware, no intimation has been given by any Member of the Government that this important subject has at all occupied their notice, I can only say that he could hardly have been in the House when, a few days ago, my right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department stated that he and his Colleagues had directed their attention to the framing of a measure with respect to it, and that he hoped to be able to submit such measure to Parliament. I can assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that Her Majesty's Government are not indifferent to the importance of such legislation, and that we shall be most happy carefully to consider any proposal, come from what quarter of the House it may, which we think is calculated to secure that which is a common object. I may add, that I trust we shall, before the Session closes, have succeeded in devising some means which may deal more effectually with an offence to which we all desire to put an end, than the Act which I have just mentioned. That Act has, however, I may observe, been the result of a bonâ fide intention on the part of the Legislature to abolish bribery; and, if it has failed to do so, its failure is not to be attributed to any want of inclination or determination on the part of the House of Commons, but is owing rather to the inherent difficulties by which the question is beset.

MR. STEUART said, the question was one which ought to be treated in conjunction with a measure for introducing an improved system of trying Election Petitions.

MR. SPEAKER informed the hon. Member that he was out of order in alluding to the question of Election Petitions, leave not as yet having been given to bring in the Bill.

MR. STEUART was of opinion that bribery was to be put an end to not so much by increasing the severity of the punishment attached to it in the case of those who should be found to have been guilty of it, as by making detection, as far as possible, a matter of certainty, and punishment sure. All that he was going to say about petitions was that bribery might be investigated without a petition at all, on the memorial of electors, by an officer of the House, or by a Commission, as at Gloucester and Wakefield. He also thought the suggestion a very valuable one, that where an inquiry was directed into corrupt practices in any borough the expenses of that inquiry should fall upon the borough. He sincerely hoped, as the noble Viscount had acknowledged the difficulty of dealing with the question, if they should be found not speedily to agree upon any practical remedy, a Committee of Inquiry would be appointed, when their united efforts might lead to some good result.

Leave given.

Bill to amend "The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act (1854)," and to make further provision for the detection and punishment of bribery, treating, and undue influence at Parliamentary and

Municipal Elections, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MELLOR, Mr. PAGET, and Mr. DENMAN.

ELECTION PETITIONS ACT (1848) AMENDMENT BILL.

LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

MR. MELLOR said, he then rose, pursuant to notice, to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Election Petitions Act. His object was to amend the practice as to the withdrawal of Election Petitions by repealing the 8th section of the Election Petitions Act of 1848. The House was aware that at present the practice was that any person having presented a petition complaining of an undue return might, by letter to the Speaker, with notice to the parties, and on payment of any costs incurred, withdraw that petition without any inquiry. It must be in the recollection of every hon. Member that many instances had occurred in which petitions had been withdrawn under very peculiar circumstances. A very remarkable compromise, for instance, had taken place at Berwick, after the last election, when a petition which had been lodged had been withdrawn, and the writ had been allowed to issue, although, had the circumstances since disclosed been then known, he, for one, would never have consented that a new writ should issue. His Bill would provide that the House should be informed of the grounds on which a petition was withdrawn, and this would of itself furnish some check on the presentation of frivolous and vexatious petitions. They all knew that at present on the last day of presenting petitions a gentleman usually appeared with a large number of petitions, informing hon. Members that undue practices prevailed at the last election for the places they represented. These petitions were never intended to be proceeded with; they were mere jobbing compromises by electioneering agents. To put a stop to this practice he proposed to repeal that section enabling parties to withdraw a petition, and to provide that they should only do so on leave of the House and on cause alleged in a petition to be presented, stating on what terms it was to be withdrawn, so that the House might take the means of ascertaining the bonâ fides of the whole proceeding. He thought this would be an effectual mode of checking the evil, and undoubtedly all sides must be anxious to put an end to it. The only other amendment he proposed was to give Election Committees the same power with reference to the examination of witnesses, provided in the other Bill with regard to trials on indictments. If a witness declined to answer a question on the ground that it tended to criminate or degrade himself, he proposed that no proceeding be taken against him in respect of any answer he might have given in evidence. He hoped there would be no objection to the introduction of the Bill.

WAREHOUSING PLACES (MANCHESTER, &c.), BILL.

COMMITTEE. LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Mr. HADFIELD moved that the House do resolve itself into a Committee to consider Warehousing Places (Manchester).

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. HADFIELD moved to resolve—

"That the Chairman be directed to move the House, That leave be given to bring in a Bill for enabling the parish of Manchester, and the Boroughs of Birmingham, Leeds, Sheffield, and Bradford, to be appointed Warehousing Places."

He believed it was more than fifty years since the system of bonding warehouses first began. At present there were 110 towns, harbours, and creeks, possessing them. Of these sixty-two did not import; and of the remaining forty-eight, twenty-seven imported to a trifling extent only. One half the entire collections of the Customs were in London. There were nine places where the whole annual collection amounted to £6,664 only, and the cost of collection was £8,884, involving a loss of £2,200. The experiment of establishing in an inland town a bonded warehousing place had been tried at Manchester with success, though as yet the town paid the expenses itself. The revenue during the last year paid at Manchester was £155,000, and the cost of collection only £850, being but 11s. 6d. per cent. By extending the system to other towns consumption would be much increased. There was no risk of loss to the revenue during the transit from the port of import, because the duty was paid upon the goods just as they left the port. No frauds had been complained of in Manchester. The Bill which he proposed to introduce would extend to four other towns the privilege at present enjoyed by Manchester.

Mr. BEECROFT seconded the Motion, observing that his constituents, the people of Leeds, were anxious to obtain the privilege of bonding—a system which would not only benefit trade and increase the revenue, but would tend to check the practice of adulteration.

Mr. LAING said, he could not enter into the subject without in some degree anticipating the statement which would be made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Monday next. He would therefore simply say that the Government did not object to the introduction of the Bill; but when both the Bill and the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement were before the House, it would be seen what course it would be best to take with respect to it.

APPEAL IN CRIMINAL CASES BILL.
SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. M'MALLON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that on the 7th of July, 1858, a Bill for securing the object which he now had in view was brought in, and had passed a second reading, by the very large majority of 145 to 91. The Bill which he now proposed was substantially the same, the only difference being that a great many Members had objected to the Bill which was at that time brought in, because it was supposed to give a right of appeal to the Crown, where the party was acquitted, and he had so worded the present Bill that no one could appeal for a new trial unless the party who was unjustly convicted. Another objection then made was, that the Bill provided facilities for allowing bills of exception, admitting of a great many technical objections. He, therefore, had struck that part out. There was one other provision which he thought the opponents of the Bill laid great stress upon, and which was a provision assimilating the powers of the Courts in this country to those of the United States of America, and allowing the Judges, having criminal jurisdiction, who were not satisfied with the verdict, to direct a new trial. Therefore he trusted, as he had upon the present occasion endeavoured to meet all the objections which had been urged against the former Bill, the House would agree to the second reading of this Bill. The object which he had in view in bringing forward this Bill was to meet an anomaly in the administration of the law in this country, which he humbly submitted was a disgrace. If a person was sued for £20 or £10 in any superior Court of Justice in this country, he might have as many new trials as the justice of the case demanded, and he might have bills of exceptions, or even go to the House of Lords; but if he was charged with an offence by which he forfeited, not alone his property, but, it may be, his life, and character, and all that was most dear to him, he had no redress whatever, against caprice or error in judgment of the First Judge of Assize before whom the case was heard, except by appeal to the Home Office. It was quite clear that that was an anomaly which was wholly indefensible, and it was one which all persons who had paid any attention to the administration of the criminal law in this country for some years past, had agreed ought to be removed. The present Lord Chancellor had expressed the objections to the present system very pithily in a question which he put to

Baron Parke, before a Committee of the Lords in 1848. He said,—

“In a civil case, a party against whom a judgment is pronounced, however trifling the amount, has a right to an appeal in the shape of a writ of error, motion for a new trial, or an absolute right to a bill of exceptions; does it not appear hard, and certainly inconsistent, that in a criminal case, where his liberty, his character, and his life are at issue, he should be deprived of that right; and more particularly is it not so, where the case may be tried before a tribunal composed of persons not educated in a knowledge of the law?”

This was not a direct statement, but it might fairly be taken as an indication of Lord Campbell's opinion on this subject. Lord Denman, before the same Committee, pointedly said,—

“Supposing the Judge has made a mistake, it is against all principle to leave it in his breast whether it shall be revised or not.”

Before the same Committee Sir Fitzroy Kelly said, that he had moved for a return, with a view to his own Bill of 1844, of cases of misdemeanour, removed by certiorari, and tried in the Court of Queen's Bench, or at the Assizes, and he added,—

“I may state, that the general result, so far as my memory serves me, is this—that in about one-third of the cases in which motions were made, the verdicts were set aside; either by verdict of acquittal or arrest of judgment the accused was ultimately delivered. In another third, the verdict was in some way altered, but it did not appear what was the ultimate result. The remaining third were cases in which the verdict was affirmed. To the best of my recollection, confirmed by my own experience, for many years something approaching to one half of those cases in which the verdict was set aside, and ultimately the party accused was delivered, were cases in which the jury had come to what the Court afterwards deemed a wrong conclusion in point of fact. That would be one-sixth part of the whole. Something approaching one-sixth part of the whole where the verdict was set aside as being against evidence.”

Now, if that was the case in such instances as these, which had arisen before Courts presided over by the highest Judges of the land, what must have occurred in other courts, such as the courts of assizes and quarter sessions? Was it not probable that least one-sixth of the verdicts returned were against the weight of evidence? He could also quote the authority of a Judge—Chief Baron Pollock—who lately presided at one of the most remarkable trials of the present day. It was material to consider what were his opinions when he was Attorney General, and when he was examined before the Criminal Law Com-

“ Another thing is this—for the present number of Judges to do it would be utterly impossible. And then you come to the great difficulty of materially increasing the number of the Judges. Supposing the Bar could furnish the increased number—which is perhaps doubtful—but supposing it could furnish six more Judges to be added to the present fifteen—I beg to know how those Judges could be kept up to the mark for their business.”

I do not suppose, of course, that the hon. and learned Gentleman, or any legal Member of this House, would be influenced by the prospect of business at the bar being increased by the adoption of criminal appeals ; but no less competent an authority than Lord Denman had pointed to considerations of this kind as reasons for the demand for a Court of Criminal Appeal. His Lordship said :—

The question of the costs incurred by new trials in criminal cases is not a mere question of expense, but involves the very essence of this measure, because it is only a mockery to give the right of appeal to a prisoner, and at the same time to insist upon his paying the costs. The hon. and learned Gentleman, or whoever drew the Bill, has indeed held out the prospect of the prosecutor being able to get his costs from the prisoner ; but really the clause has almost the look of an ironical provision. The hon. and learned Gentleman must be aware that a motion for a writ of certiorari, to be sued out before one of the courts in Westminster Hall, is a remedy which, to the vast majority of persons convicted at quarter sessions and assizes, is perfectly nugatory and inaccessible. The cases in which prisoners would generally be able to avail themselves of the Court of Appeal would be political ones, or cases about which a good deal of public feeling had been excited. There would then be meetings held, and a great deal of discussion, not always of a very calm or sedate character ; and then subscriptions would be raised sufficient to carry the conviction before the higher Court ; but in most instances prisoners, debarred from availing themselves of this remedy by its costliness, would still be glad to have recourse to those dark and secret proceedings at the Home Office of which the hon. Member complains ; and, my opinion is, that the present administration of the law would continue with scarcely any alteration. The truth is, that if the House goes the length of conferring a right of appeal on every prisoner who is convicted at assizes or quarter sessions, they can scarcely hesitate before long to grant the principle that the expenses of the appeals should be defrayed from some public fund. That was the opinion given by Mr. Greaves, in his evidence before the Lords' Committee, for he did not shrink from advising that appeals should be conducted at the public expense, which he thought would be moderate. Of that, however, the House will itself be the judge. At all events, it must understand that if the Legislature confers an absolute right of appeal on every prisoner that is convicted, it cannot hesitate to enact that his costs shall be defrayed out of some public fund—either out of the county rate, or out of votes granted for that purpose by Parliament. With a view to show how utterly nugatory an appeal would be without such a provision, I will refer the House to the extensive class of offences with reference to which an appeal is already given—I mean those for which persons may be summarily convicted. I may first remark, however, that the course of legislation has not recently been in favour of conferring this right of appeal to the quarter sessions. Thus, the Aggravated Assaults Act, under which more than 2,000 persons were convicted in the year 1858, and about 1,500 sentenced to imprisonment, generally with hard labour, allows no appeal whatever. In cases, however, where the prisoner possesses the right of appeal it is remarkable how seldom it is made use of. In the year 1858 no less than 18,630 individuals were convicted in England and Wales under the extremely general and rather arbitrary provisions of the Vagrant Act. How many of these does the House think appealed to the quarter sessions ? Just ten. In the same year 7,379 persons were convicted of offences against the Game Laws, of whom only fourteen appealed ; and out of 11,211 convictions for malicious trespass and damage of property only two appeals are recorded, of which one was rewarded with success.

The hon. Member has spoken about the propriety and necessity of assimilating our criminal to the civil law in regard to appeals ; but has he proposed anything like

cedure. So sound a lawyer was he considered, and the Government of the day had so great a respect for his opinions, that he was employed by them to draw up this Report. In this Report which was presented in 1856 or 1857, he said,—

“The system itself, however, is such as cannot fail to lead to mischievous results, even though it be administered in the best manner, and with the most laudable motives. In the first place, the investigation is a private one, and consequently facts may there obtain credence which, if disclosed, might be contradicted or explained. Secondly, it is very doubtful whether there be any jurisdiction to administer an oath on making an affidavit to be submitted to the Home Office. This, in addition to the secret mode of proceeding, no doubt leads to false statements being made, and that, too, with perfect impunity. Thirdly, no notice of the application, it is believed, is ever given to the prosecutor. The truth is that the law, allowing no direct means of obtaining a new trial, or revision of the sentence, an application is made to the Home Office in every case where any materials can be obtained for that purpose, and if sufficient materials can be produced to throw a reasonable doubt upon the correctness of the verdict, the Home Office is placed in a most unfortunate position, as there is no power to order a new trial or fresh investigation to take place. Three courses alone are open—to let the sentence be executed, to grant a pardon, or to mitigate the sentence. It is to be remembered that the very cases in which the Home Office is most likely to be misled are ever the most important of all, and therefore it is of the last importance that they should be properly determined, and not only so, but in such a manner that the public may be convinced that they have been so determined. Nor is it to be forgotten that it is at least a very doubtful question whether it be expedient that the solemn verdict of a jury, given after an open trial, should in any case be treated as a nullity, unless the proceedings are such as to satisfy all reasonable persons that such verdict was erroneous.”

Such was the opinion of Mr. Greaves, who when examined himself before the House of Lords in 1848 stated that every wrong ought to be redressed before a proper legal tribunal. Wrongs were done in criminal as in civil cases, and parties should have a right to redress in criminal and civil cases. Mr. Greaves was asked what remedy he proposed? He said, “I propose as a remedy an absolute and unconditional right to every person who is convicted to appeal to one of the common law Courts of justice at Westminster Hall.” He (Mr. M'Mahon) did not believe it was necessary that he should trouble the House with more authorities. They had heard him read the opinions expressed in reference to this question by Lord Denman, the Lord Chief Baron, and Mr. Greaves; and, in fact, he was not aware of any authority of eminence in this country who had ever declared in favour of the appeal to the Home Office as against the legally established tribunals of the country. In the Report of the proceedings of the Committee of the House of Lords, which sat in 1848, there was a question put to Mr. Baron Alderson by Lord Campbell, from which it might be presumed that no right of appeal in criminal cases existed in France or America. He should state that such was not the fact. In France a party convicted had, where a defect or mistake had arisen on any matter of law, an absolute right of appeal to the Court of Cassation. In France a party might be convicted by a bare majority, as in Scotland; but if it was expressly provided by the Code d'Instruction Criminelle, book 2, title 2, c. 4, article 351, that if the accused was convicted only by a simple majority “the Judges shall deliberate amongst themselves on the same point, and if the opinion of the minority of the jury is adopted by the majority of the Judges, so that in uniting the number of voices, this number shall exceed that of the majority of the jury and the minority of the Judges the opinion favourable to the accused shall prevail,”—and by the 352nd article it was provided. “If, except in the case provided for by the preceding article, the Judges are unanimously convinced that the jury though observing the forms are mistaken in substance—the Court shall declare that it supersedes the judgment and will remit the affair to the following session to be submitted to a new jury, of which none of the first jurors shall form a part.” He was aware of an instance within the last two years, in which a Judge in the county of Hereford expressed a decided dissent from the verdict of a jury convicting an accused party of an offence, and stated that he would not pass sentence on the man, but would refer the case to the Home Office. In France the Judge would have an absolute right to postpone the case to another session, and have the party tried before a new jury. In America the uniform rule for many years, at least since 1830, had been to grant a new trial in criminal cases, and thus to extend to those cases the same principles which were established in civil causes. In an American work of very high authority — Wharton on the Criminal Law, it was said that in recent times with the exception of a few cases in which Mr. Justice Story and another Judge attempted to disturb it.

been to extend to criminal cases, so far as the revision of verdicts is concerned, the same principles which have been established in civil actions."

And that though the Judges there hold that by the principles of the common law every Court of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery can grant a new trial, yet, to prevent all doubt, in most of the States provision is made by statute for the purpose. The American Judges say that it is more consistent with the spirit of humanity which pervades the common law that a new trial should be granted by the Court than that the prisoner should depend on the mercy of the executive. One of the grounds on which such a practice was not followed in England appeared to be the mistaken belief that courts of assizes and quarter sessions were inferior courts. In America the position of these courts was perfectly understood. Although the criminal courts and quarter session courts were subordinate to the Court of Queen's Bench, yet they were not inferior courts, and were empowered with authority to do justice by setting aside wrong verdicts. About ten years ago it was established by the decision in a case which originated in the Recorder's court at Chester, that this was a mistaken principle, and that courts of assize, of quarter sessions, and the other criminal courts, though they were subordinate to the Court of Queen's Bench, yet were not inferior courts in the proper meaning of that term. In New York, so long ago as 1830, it had been held that a Court of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery was not an inferior court, and was, therefore, invested at common law with full power to grant a new trial on the merits. Chief Justice Marcy in pronouncing this decision had beautifully explained the point which was now in issue. He said:—

"It is a settled rule of law in England never to grant a new trial in cases of treason and felony. If by the error of the jury or the Judge an innocent man is condemned, he is sent to the mercy of the Crown for redress. This mercy is but a miserable relief for the injury he has suffered. It may save his property from forfeiture and himself from the ignominy of the gallows, but the foul blot remains on his reputation. Time does not obliterate it; the grave does not cover it; it is an inheritable curse that must and will be the portion of his posterity. It is mockery to tell a man who has been condemned that his redress is in a pardon. He feels, and ever will feel, that he has received an incurable wound from that sword which he, in common with his fellow-citizens, had put into the hands of the magistracy for their protection. The policy in respect to new trials in criminal cases which the English courts have pursued has never been countenanced by our courts, and would never be tolerated by our people."

He apprehended that the principle adopted in America was the true principle—not only of law, but of justice and of general jurisprudence—consistent with common sense and common right; and he trusted the people of this country would not tolerate any longer the practice which had been pursued here. In Mr. Greaves' evidence before the Committee of 1848, that gentleman showed that in ancient times a man convicted had thirty or forty days, at least, to arrest the judgment, and suggested that the grounds of arrest of judgment were bad law or wrong verdicts. The Mirror of Justices, of the date of Edward I., was referred to by him, and the observation of Lord Coke, who cited the Mirror, and stated that the practice of granting time for arresting judgment "had gone in desuetudinem, and that great expedition was now made in pleas of the Crown concerning the life of man. Sed de morte hominis nulla est cunctatio longa." In modern times we seem to be departing from the humanity of our forefathers in that respect. The present Bill was an attempt not to innovate, not to establish anything new, but to return to the ancient usage of the law, and to depart from the brutal system which had prevailed, at least during the 16th and 17th centuries, when men were hanged for stealing thirteen pence, hanged for stealing 5s. worth out of a shop, or for picking a pocket when a party accused could not have a witness sworn on his behalf, and could not, although he were dumb, have a counsel to speak for him. The whole of that system was a disgrace to the country, and was gradually being removed; and he believed the Legislature would be wiping away a last blot from the escutcheon of the administration of justice and criminal law by following in this respect the example of the other countries he had named, and would thereby place the administration of our criminal law on a footing equal to that of any other country in the world. At present the granting of an appeal on points of law was altogether in the discretion of the Judge, and there was no provision whatever with regard to appeals on questions of fact, which he agreed with Mr. Greaves in thinking of even greater importance than those on matters of law. That gentleman, in his examination, stated:—

"If I must make an election between the two, I would certainly prefer an appeal upon facts to an appeal upon law, because I am quite clear, in trials before learned Judges, that mistakes more frequently take place in matters of fact than in matters of law; and it is obvious to any one who considers the subject that mistakes in matters of fact generally go to the entire guilt or innocence of the prisoner, whereas a mistake in matter of law very frequently turns upon some technical point, where the prisoner has been guilty either of an offence of the same degree, or some one very nearly approaching to it; as, for instance, a man may have been convicted of a forgery, and the document set out in the indictment may have been misdescribed as an order, whereas it is a mere warrant for the payment of money. I only put that as an instance to show that a man may be guilty, and escape through a mere technicality in point of law; whereas, I think, when he is convicted wrongfully on a point of fact it goes entirely to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner."

His Bill proposed to make the right of appeal no longer conditional, but to grant the party an absolute right both as to questions of law and fact. Sir Frederick Pollock, the present Chief Baron, whose opinion ought to be entitled to great respect, had given much attention to the consideration of plans by which the raising of mere technical objections, through which it was sought to defeat or delay justice, would be prevented, at the same time that an acquittal would be secured to the innocent. That learned personage having weighed the difficulties, was of opinion that the motion for a new trial was the only effectual remedy. He said:—

"One obvious course would be to adopt, in all criminal cases, the practice which is now open to the convicted party in case of misdemeanour before the superior Courts—namely, a motion for a new trial, founded upon a verdict being either against evidence or against the truth of the case, as made manifest by affidavits to be submitted to the consideration of the Court, subject, of course, to such rules with respect to the reception of affidavits as the experience of the Courts in other cases have established. These remarks equally apply to inferior Courts, who are incapable of granting a new trial in misdemeanours as well as felonies. During the last session I moved for a return of the result of all prosecutions for perjury and conspiracy in the Court of King's Bench since the year 1800, together with the result of the prosecutions as to new trials, and the cases in which parties have been called up for judgment. The session ended before that return was complete, but I allude to it now for two reasons. I have very little doubt it would prove, by the number of instances in which new trials have been granted, and the defendants have been afterwards acquitted, or the prosecutors have declined to go on with the prosecution, that the motion for a new trial is essential to the administration of justice in criminal as well as civil matters.

The same mischief obtains in criminal, against which a new trial is the only protection, as in civil cases, and the only remedy is an application for a pardon where sometimes there ought to be an appeal for justice. If no better mode can be adopted, I think there ought to be allowed a motion for a new trial." (Second Report, Appendix, pp. 79, 80.)

He would now come to the various remedies which had been proposed. His attention was first called to the subject in 1844, by a Bill which Sir Fitzroy (then Mr. Fitzroy) Kelly, introduced. The substance of that Bill was, that any person convicted wrongfully might appeal to any of the Courts at Westminster for a new trial, and the Court might, if it thought proper, order a new trial, and send the accused party back to be tried again. If a party had been tried at the quarter sessions, the Court would have no authority except to send him back to be tried again at the quarter sessions. If he had been tried at the assizes he must go back again to be tried at the assizes. The Bill also gave an absolute right to an accused party, if the Judge should misdirect in point of law, to take exceptions as in a civil case, and go to the Court of Exchequer Chamber or the House of Lords. That Bill was read a first time, but not a second time. The next Bill, which was introduced by the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Wm. Ewart), Lord Nugent, and Mr. Aglionby, was, likewise, not carried beyond a first reading. In 1853 a Bill was introduced by Mr. Butt and Mr. Ewart, to secure an appeal in criminal cases; and that Bill, too, was only read a first time. The subject then dropped from 1853 to 1858, when he (Mr. M'Mahon), believing it one of great importance, asked the Member for Youghal (Mr. Butt) whether he might take it up; and accordingly, in 1858, the Bill which he now proposed to the House was carried to a second reading by the majority to which he had already referred. The difference between his plan and other Bills was this:—By the existing state of the law, if a party were indicted either at assizes or sessions, he might remove the indictment by certiorari, by giving security for the payment of the prosecutor's costs on being convicted. There was no limit to that now. Formerly it was thought that under that law only an indictment for misdemeanour could be removed; but in 1852 there was a very remarkable case where an indictment for felony was removed by certiorari, and tried at the civil side of the assizes. It was now, therefore, well known that there was no difference between misdemeanour and felony in being removed by certiorari. If, therefore a party were indicted for felony or misdemeanour, and chese to remove the indictment by certiorari, giving security for the costs of the prosecution if convicted, it would be removed into the Queen's Bench, and tried at the civil side, having all the same incidents as a civil cause with reference to a new trial. There might be new trial after new trial until the Court above was satisfied that justice had been done. Now, the difficulty which had to be dealt with was this—If a party moved before the verdict, then he would have a right to a new trial until justice had been attained; but if he omitted to move before the verdict, then he had no redress whatever, except from the Home Office. It was only for about 200 years that new trials had been granted in civil cases. In 1655 was found the first instance. So lately as 1665 the Court of Queen's Bench refused an application for a new trial, on the ground that the damages were excessive, saying that the defendant had his remedy by attainting the jury. The practice of granting them dated only from Charles II. and James II. In the reign of James II. there was an instance of a new trial being granted in a criminal case—a case tried at the Hull Sessions or Assizes. This case, which was a charge of having used traitorous words—a case not at all likely to be favoured in those days—was removed after verdict, and the Court of Queen's Bench granted a new trial. But in 1811 an application was made to the Queen's Bench, in the time of Lord Ellenborough, for a new trial after conviction, and Lord Ellenborough, declaring it most important that that Court should not, without precedent and authority, intrude upon all the inferior jurisdictions of the kingdom, refused the application, on the ground that if granted there would be no end of such investigations. Lord Ellenborough and Mr. Justice Bayley were the only Judges present, and his Lordship disposed of this grave question by stating that “great inconvenience would arise if, without precedent and distinct authority, that Court was to infringe on all the inferior jurisdictions of the kingdom; and there was no reason to suppose that, if they were to do so in one instance, they would be restrained from doing so in all.” He also expressed doubts “whether the Court had the power of entering into an examination of the verdicts which might be delivered in courts of inferior jurisdiction.” In reply to those observations he would only say that Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench were as fond of their own ease and as desirous of irresponsibility as any other persons; and he believed that, if the Court had been equally anxious to discover whether the power which was referred to was actually inherent in it, the decision would have been influenced by very different considerations. The remedy which he proposed was virtually only an overruling by statute of this division by providing that if on a trial a party were wrongfully convicted and had such just confidence in his own innocence that he believed upon a new trial he must be acquitted on the merits, then such a party might apply for a certiorari, give security for costs, and get another trial. This course was supported by the opinions expressed by the Criminal Law Commissioners in their Report, in which they said:—

“It appears to us that the law of England is at present very defective as regards the means afforded for the correction of errors in criminal proceedings, and especially such as are frequently, and, indeed, are almost necessarily incident to the trial by jury. In this respect, indeed, the law is inconsistent in entertaining the motion for a new trial in some instances, and denying it in others without any adequate reason for the distinction, and is thus faulty either in denying a new trial where it would be consistent with justice to grant one, or in granting a new trial where it ought properly to be withheld. The instances in which a new trial is grantable are confined to those where the prosecution is for a misdemeanour only, and is pending in the Court of Queen's Bench. We cannot but observe that the distinction thus made in the first instance between indictments for felony and those for misdemeanour pending in the Court of Queen's Bench is not warranted by any intelligible principle; it would indeed seem to be more reasonable that as the penalties for felony are usually more severe than those which attach to a mere misdemeanour, larger means for the correction of error should be afforded in the former case than in the latter. The distinction between cases of misdemeanour pending in the Court of Queen's Bench, and those pending in other criminal courts, seems also to be destitute of any sound principle. It may, perhaps, as to prosecutions removed from inferior courts into the Court of Queen's Bench, be said, that it is to be presumed that they are of more difficult investigation, and therefore that more ample means ought to be allowed for accurate inquiry and for the correction of errors. This may occasionally be so, but the presumption cannot possibly warrant so wide a distinction as that which is made in practice; the difficulties which give rise to the application for a new trial are frequently of a nature not to be foreseen, and often depend on the conduct of witnesses, or of the jury, or the direction of the Judge, or presiding magistrate, and not at all on the nature of the cause itself. Besides, as a defendant in a cause depending in the higher court has always the benefit of being tried before one of the Judges of the superior courts, the proceedings are less likely to stand in

His proposal was simply this: that if a party had been wrongfully convicted and felt such a just confidence in his innocence as to believe that upon a new trial he would be acquitted on the merits, he might apply for a certiorari and get a new trial in giving security for costs. The Bill which he proposed had been framed in such a way that it would not allow trumpery or technical objections to be taken to regular legal proceedings; and no man would be encouraged to move for a new trial who did not feel that on the substantial merits of his case he would be entitled to an acquittal. If, indeed, such objections were allowed to prevail the Courts of Westminster would have nothing to do but to hear applications for new trials from assizes and quarter sessions courts. An objection which had formerly been urged to the proposal was, that it would establish an appeal for the rich and not for the poor. But the practice which at present prevailed, which had existed for two centuries, and to which no objection was made, was open to the same exception, for it was virtually an appeal for the rich man alone, as the poor man must be supposed incapable of giving security for the costs of removing his case by writ of certiorari. What he proposed was in effect but to extend the privilege of the writ of certiorari after the trial had taken place. The real answer to the objection was that, if a man were believed by his neighbours to be innocent, he would not be suffered to remain without the means of moving for a new trial. No doubt, in Dr. Smethurst's case ample funds would have been provided by the public who believed in his innocence, had they been required. His Bill did not enter into minute details, but a remedy could be applied in the manner he was about to state. The security for costs was given to the Crown, and if the authorities connected with the Home Office believed that their exaction would operate in any particular case with harshness, nothing could be more easy than to waive the right. There was yet another way of meeting the difficulty. A clause might be introduced to provide that where the Chairman of quarter sessions or the Judge at the assizes reported to the Court of Queen's Bench that in a particular case there ought, in his judgment, to be a new trial, the security should be dispensed with. This would meet the case of the poor man as well as the rich. He believed that no substantial objection existed in the Bill, which would, if carried, have the effect of reviving an ancient and humane principle in the administration of justice, of animating in a beneficial manner the laws of this and foreign countries, and of putting a stop to the excitement which was at present raised in the public mind whenever it became necessary to make an application to the Secretary of State for the Home Department. By other Bills it had been proposed to make the appeal generally to any of the superior courts; but, regarding the Queen's Bench as the Court which exercised a supreme control in criminal matters, he believed that as long as that system was applied, to that court likewise should appeals continue to be directed.

MR. W. EVARTS, in rising to second the Motion, said he should have some difficulty in doing so if he were understood to pledge himself to the details of the Bill, to which the legal Members of the House would probably discover objections; but adhering as he did to the principle that the power of appeal in criminal cases ought to exist he had great pleasure in seconding the Motion. Many years ago he had introduced a Bill for a similar purpose, which shared the fate of others superior to his own, and he, therefore, hoped the present measure might successfully accomplish this most desirable object. Many years ago, he had brought under the notice of the House cases in which persons who had been convicted and transported had afterwards to be pardoned by the Crown, and were illrequited for the suffering which they had undergone by a sum of money. He had hitherto been unable to procure a return of the number of cases in which the Crown had exercised its prerogative of pardon; but he believed that if, without injury to the public service, it could be granted, it would be more to the purpose than the return of the number of appeals in civil actions which had been moved for by the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk (Sir Fitzroy Kelly). He should strongly recommend his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. McMahon), to refer his Bill, if it were now adopted, to a Select Committee, which would examine witnesses and collect opinions as to the expediency of the several proposals on the subject of criminal appeals; and their labours would doubtless result in the production of some measure of a practical and beneficial character. With that understanding he had much pleasure in giving his support to the Bill, and to the humane and just object which it was intended to achieve.

“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Sir, the importance of the question brought under the consideration of the House by the Motion for the second reading of this Bill cannot easily be overrated; for as it seems to me, the adoption of the principle on which this Bill is founded must completely alter the whole character and operation of the criminal law as now administered. Notwithstanding the importance of the subjects which we discuss in Committee of Supply—holding as we do the purse strings of the nation, and disposing of the property of the subject—everybody, I think, must perceive that we have at present before us a matter of still greater moment from the effect which it exercises over these institutions on which the safety of life and property depends. I wish, therefore, to bring the matter clearly before the House, in order to induce it to give to it that attention which it certainly demands.

And before I proceed to consider the merits of the proposal which has just been made, as it might perhaps suggest itself to some Gentleman that the situation which I hold would bias the opinion which I am about to give respecting the propriety of granting an appeal in criminal cases, I would take the liberty of calling the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. and learned Gentleman does not propose to abolish the prerogative of the Crown, though he certainly appears to intimate that he would be able to render its exercise to a considerable extent unnecessary; he does not substitute anything, he merely adds one step to the criminal procedure of the country. My belief is, that if this Bill is passed, as at present framed, it will have very little practical operation, and that the duties of the Home Secretary will remain very nearly what they are at present. On the other hand, I can conceive that arrangements might be made which would lead to the complete relief of the Home Secretary from those painful and embarrassing duties which are cast on him by the revision of criminal sentences. For myself, I can declare—and I dare say that I shall have the assent of right hon. Gentlemen who have filled in former years the office which I now hold—that there is no part of its duties which are more painful to me, about which I feel greater anxiety, or as to which there is less reward to be gained in public estimation than the revision of criminal sentences. Consequently, if I were to be guided merely by personal feelings I should give my vote in favour of any measure which tended to diminish the frequency of the exercise of that class of duties. But on a question of this sort I hope I may be believed in the assertion that I have endeavoured to form a perfectly sincere opinion, without reference to any personal feelings or individual bias, and that the sentiments to which I am about to give expression, except for the greater consideration which I have necessarily been obliged to bestow upon the subject, would be exactly the same were I now sitting on the opposite side of the House.

The hon. and learned Gentleman by whom this measure has been introduced has said that all authority is in favour of criminal appeal. He has not shown one practical grievance, but has relied on authority for the establishment of his case; and then taking a view of the remedies that have been proposed he says that his own is the best, and calls on the House to adopt it. In the study that I have given to the subject I have been led to the conclusion that the weight of authority, so far from being, as in the opinion of the hon. and learned Gentlemen, favourable to the change, is decidedly opposed to it. He referred, I think, to the Committee appointed in 1848 by the House of Lords to consider the Criminal Law Administration Amendment Bill. Baron Parke and Baron Alderson were examined before the Committee on the very question to which this Bill refers, and both gave a very decided opinion against criminal appeals, that is, the power either of the Crown or the prisoner to move for a new trial in criminal cases. That opinion was not only concurred in without any modification, but was even stated in stronger terms by Lord Denman, who was then Lord Chief Justice, Lord Lyndhurst, and Lord Brougham. The evidence of those two eminent Judges was sent round to the other Judges, with a request that they would give their opinion on the question referred to; and the following Judges assented to the opinion of Barons Parke and Alderson,—namely, Mr. Justice Patteson, Mr. Justice Coleridge, Mr. Justice Wightman, Mr. Justice Erle (now Chief Justice of the Common Pleas), Mr. Justice Coltman, Mr. Justice Maule, Mr. Justice Cresswell, Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams, Lord Chief Baron Pollock, Mr. Baron Rolfe (the late Lord Chancellor)—altogether by twelve Judges, besides the Lord Chief Justice. I think after this statement the House will hardly be of opinion that the weight of authority is on the side of the hon. and learned Member who has introduced this measure. The chief argument put forward by the advocates of criminal appeals is, that there is not sufficient ground for the distinction, as regards new trials, between the procedure in civil and that in criminal cases, and that the criminal should be assimilated to the civil law in that respect, and this is, in a few words, the ground on which the hon. and learned Gentleman has rested his case. I admit there does appear to be a certain prima facie presumption in favour of this assimilation; but it is, nevertheless, a fact that the almost universal practice throughout the civilized world is in the opposite direction. Russia, Austria, Spain, Naples, Saxony, Holland, Sardinia (except in cases relating to the press), Tuscany, Modena, Rome, Sweden, and Denmark have no trial by jury, and in those countries there is no question of a new trial in a criminal case. In the German States, in which trial by jury is established, and in the kingdom of Greece, the law sanctions criminal appeals in three cases — first where two persons have been convicted for the same offence; second, where, after a conviction for murder or manslaughter, the person supposed to have been killed is proved to be alive; and, third, where some of the material witnesses against the prisoner have been subsequently convicted of perjury. This shows that even these countries that have trial by jury do not go very far in the permission they grant for appeals in criminal cases. In France and Belgium, the privilege of appeal in criminal cases is carried a little further. If the Court immediately after a verdict has been given, and before sentence has been pronounced, are unanimously of opinion that the jury was mistaken in declaring the prisoner guilty, they may send the case to another jury; but the Court possesses this power ex officio, to be used at their own discretion, no one has a right to make any application to them to exercise it, and the Court itself can only take this step immediately after the verdict, and before the sentence. That is the furthest extent, as far as I have been able to discover, that the law goes, in any continental country, with regard to criminal appeals. The hon. and learned Gentleman has referred to the Court of Cassation in France; but he should remember that that Court has only jurisdiction as to matters of form, and that there is no appeal to it on matters of fact. It has merely jurisdiction casser—to quash, as we term it—a proceeding on the ground of its informality—not to grant a new trial on any matter of fact, or to hear any new matter. Excepting in the cases before enumerated, there is no appeal as to matters of fact. The case of the Lemoines is an illustration of this arrangement:—

“The appeal to the Court of Cassation of Madame Lemoine against the sentence of twenty years’ hard labour, pronounced on her by the Court of Assizes of Tours, for burning alive her daughter’s illegitimate child, came on yesterday. As is always the case in appeals to the Court of Cassation, it was based entirely on technical grounds; and in this case they were:—1. That the forms prescribed for the deliberations of juries and the prescriptions of Article 343 of the Criminal Code, had been violated by the jury having publicly proceeded to the election of a foreman, on the juryman designated by lot for that post having declined to accept it, whereas the selection of foreman ought to have taken place in private. 2. That certain articles of laws of the 24th of April, 1790, and the 20th of August, 1810, had been violated by the minutes of the trial not setting forth with sufficient clearness that the verdict of the jury had been publicly read. The Court, after hearing pleadings, decided that the reasons assigned were not sufficient to invalidate the condemnation, and it rejected the appeal.”

The hon. and learned Member (Mr. M’Mahon), said that by the law of the United States there was no distinction between civil and criminal appeals, but he did not give his authority for that observation.

MR. M’MAHON:—My authority is Wharton’s Criminal Law of the United States.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS:—Well, I can only say I have referred to Kent’s Commentaries on American Law; I can find not the smallest trace in that work of any power to move for a new trial in criminal cases; and I have considerable difficulty in believing that any such power exists. I, therefore, venture to affirm that the distinction between civil and criminal cases with regard to new trials is recognized almost universally in all countries whether they have trial by jury or not. I do not wish to press the argument from usage and custom to a greater extent than this—that there could not have been such a general and constant acquiescence in a matter affecting the lives and fortunes of the entire community unless there were some good reason for the distinction. What that reason is I shall not state simply on my own authority, but shall rely on the opinions of several eminent lawyers. Before the Committee of 1848, Lord Denman expressed very succinctly his reason for the distinction, he said:—

“What I would state in a word, as my objection to the general power, is that there would be no antagonism ; there are no adverse parties as in civil cases.”

And that principle is explained somewhat more fully in the letter of Mr. Baron Rolfe, now Lord Cranworth, addressed in answer to the circular letter of that Committee :—

“With respect to the inexpediency of any right of appeal in criminal cases I beg leave to add, in addition to what has been stated by Baron Parke, that a new trial would very rarely indeed be practicable. In civil cases the plaintiff has a direct personal interest in the result of his cause, and when a verdict obtained by him is set aside, and a new trial is ordered, he is obliged, in order to gain the object of his suit, and save himself from the obligation of paying the defendant his costs, to take proper steps for bringing all necessary witnesses to a second trial. But this is not the case in criminal prosecutions ; a large proportion of prosecutors come forward only because they are bound to do so ; the whole proceeding is rather a burden imposed on the prosecutor than a measure which he voluntarily adopts for the sake of personal redress ; and I conceive that in nine cases out of ten when a new trial is ordered there would be so much difficulty in getting the prosecutor and witnesses together that no second trial could efficiently take place.”

These, then, are in general terms the grounds of the difference which has hitherto been observed between civil and criminal trials. It may be urged, however, that, while there is some weight and strength in the reasons for the distinction between the two classes of cases, there is still a great practical grievance to be remedied—that there is a large number of improper convictions by juries, and that there ought to be some judicial means for revising them. But will any Gentleman present take upon himself to affirm the frequency of wrong convictions by juries in criminal cases ? If not, the whole groundwork of the proposed measure fails. I will quote the views of one or two eminent legal authorities on this point. Baron Parke, now Lord Wensleydale, when examined before the Committee, said :—

“I think that the complaints of the present mode of administering the criminal law have little foundation, for the cases in which the innocent are improperly convicted are extremely rare. Some, no doubt, there are ; and I consider it is impossible in any human system of administering justice to avoid such misfortunes occasionally. There are many cases in which the guilty escape, but very few in which the innocent are punished ; and having now had more experience upon the bench in the administration of criminal justice than any other Judge I can say for myself, that I can hardly call to my recollection any case with which I am personally acquainted in which I think that a person really innocent has been convicted by the jury.”

Lord Denman, whose authority and experience will be hardly disputed, expressed a similar opinion :—

“Juries are extremely unwilling to fall into the error of wrongly convicting. I believe there are a great many very wrong acquittals, and even conscientiously sometimes, from good motives and very respectable feelings, but unfortunately contradicting the truth, and bringing the administration of justice into some contempt, and giving impunity to great offenders.”

Lord Brougham coincides in that view,—

“My impression and belief,” he said, “most undoubtedly is that there are very rare occasions indeed on which there is a wrong conviction.”

And Justice Wightman also said,—

“As far as my experience goes, I entirely concur with Baron Parke in thinking that the conviction of a really innocent person is so rare that there is practically no sufficient necessity for applying a remedy which would be attended with such obvious impediments to the due course of criminal justice.”

The weight of evidence is, therefore, I contend, in favour of the belief that wrong verdicts in criminal cases, at least when they are against the prisoner, are of rare occurrence. But if a wrong verdict is given, and the Judge is dissatisfied with it, what is the almost universal practice ? It is that the Judge communicates his dissatisfaction to the Home Secretary ; and I find it stated by Baron Parke, and assented to by Lord Lyndhurst and Lord Brougham, that such a Report is universally acted upon. [Sir GEORGE GREY : Hear, hear !] My right hon. Friend (Sir George Grey) who has had much greater experience as Secretary of State for the Home Department than I have, assents to that statement. I maintain, therefore, that no proof of any practical and substantial grievance has been brought before the House, and that none really exists.

Descending from these general grounds, the hon. and learned Member referred to the case of Smethurst as an illustration of the necessity for a measure such as he has introduced ; but I must say I entirely differ from him as to that case affording any ground whatever for the adoption of criminal appeals. The case was a difficult one, undoubtedly, and it was my duty to give the closest attention to it, and do my best to master its details ; but I cannot discern in the circumstances of that case any argument whatever in favour of a Court of Appeal. I think I may say with the utmost confidence that had application been made to the Court of Queen's Bench under the terms of this Bill, within the first four days of the term after last August, for a new trial on the ground of misdirection by the Judge, it would necessarily have failed. The case, I believe, was left by the learned Chief Baron to the jury—and I speak not only my own opinion, but the opinion of persons much more competent to judge than I am — with perfect legal propriety. And I confidently venture to affirm that no Court would have entertained an application for a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. My advice to Her Majesty to grant a pardon was entirely founded on medical considerations. There was scarcely any dispute as to the facts brought out in evidence, but the question turned on the medical inference to be deduced from them; and it was upon the opinion of eminent medical practitioners as to the bearing of those facts that I rested my advice. Medical science with regard to poisons is, unfortunately, in a somewhat imperfect and uncertain state; and the same imperfection and uncertainty are necessarily communicated to the legal questions with which it is connected. You might grant appeal after appeal, and have examinations before all sorts of Courts, and you would never get over the fundamental uncertainty which arises from the present imperfect state of medical science. Then, again, supposing that the propriety of granting a new trial in Smethurst's case had turned on the question whether the Judge was dissatisfied with the verdict of the jury, I am not prepared to say that that would have led to any result remarkably favourable to the prisoner. The Judge who tried the case was at first certainly inclined to think the verdict right, although he subsequently concurred in the course taken by the Crown in not carrying out the sentence of the law. Therefore I most confidently maintain that the case of Dr. Smethurst, properly understood, does not afford the smallest ground for the measure of the hon. and learned Gentleman. I will ask my hon. and learned Friend this question: Supposing there had been a second trial of Dr. Smethurst, and the second jury had confirmed the verdict of the first, is he of opinion that the function of the Crown was suspended and that the prisoner ought to have been hung? Unless he affirms that proposition, he must admit that the Bill derives no support from the case of Dr. Smethurst. I must abstain altogether from allusions to more recent cases now pending decision, but I feel satisfied that if these cases could be submitted fully to the House it would be convinced that they have no more application to the present Bill than the case of Smethurst.

Another objection urged against the present system is that it involves a dark and secret investigation by the Home Office, and the hon. and learned Member has attempted to raise a prejudice against recourse being had to the prerogative of pardon by the mode in which it is exercised. But if any Gentleman votes for the Bill on the ground that the procedure of the Home Office is dark and secret he will do so on a wholly insufficient ground, inasmuch as the Bill does not in the slightest degree interfere with that part of the system, and does not propose to substitute criminal appeals for the prerogative of the Crown.

I wish now to show some of the objections to the remedy proposed, and the probable consequences with which the Bill is pregnant, in the event of its being passed. One of its first manifest consequences, which must strike every one, is the delay and uncertainty which it would import into the administration of criminal law. It is an elementary principle laid down by all writers on criminal jurisprudence that punishment is effectual in proportion as it is speedy and certain; and the result of the proposed measure would therefore be to deprive the administration of the criminal law of much of its effect. Upon this point Lord Brougham said before the Committee of 1848:—

“The criminal law depends for the effect, more or less, which it has in deterring from crime by example of punishment, upon the speediness with which execution of the sentence follows trial. But in this case you would have a prisoner found guilty at York in the first fortnight in July, but no sentence, even in the most flagrant case of murder, ever could be executed till the middle of November following. For certainly in every case of capital conviction, and I believe in every serious case, the moving for a new trial would be a matter of course.”

Another important feature in the question is the expense which the multiplication of trials and the necessary addition to the number of Judges would cause. Lord Brougham gave the following opinion as to the probable additions to the bench that

" Another thing is this—for the present number of Judges to do it would be utterly impossible. And then you come to the great difficulty of materially increasing the number of the Judges. Supposing the Bar could furnish the increased number—which is perhaps doubtful—but supposing it could furnish six more Judges to be added to the present fifteen—I beg to know how those Judges could be kept up to the mark for their business."

I do not suppose, of course, that the hon. and learned Gentleman, or any legal Member of this House, would be influenced by the prospect of business at the bar being increased by the adoption of criminal appeals ; but no less competent an authority than Lord Denman had pointed to considerations of this kind as reasons for the demand for a Court of Criminal Appeal. His Lordship said :—

" I think there is another reason for the outcry, which is a great desire, I think, on the part of many active and able persons attached to the law to see a new court and a new course of practice which would be popular and striking, and give a new scope for the display of their talents."

The question of the costs incurred by new trials in criminal cases is not a mere question of expense, but involves the very essence of this measure, because it is only a mockery to give the right of appeal to a prisoner, and at the same time to insist upon his paying the costs. The hon. and learned Gentleman, or whoever drew the Bill, has indeed held out the prospect of the prosecutor being able to get his costs from the prisoner ; but really the clause has almost the look of an ironical provision. The hon. and learned Gentleman must be aware that a motion for a writ of certiorari, to be sued out before one of the courts in Westminster Hall, is a remedy which, to the vast majority of persons convicted at quarter sessions and assizes, is perfectly nugatory and inaccessible. The cases in which prisoners would generally be able to avail themselves of the Court of Appeal would be political ones, or cases about which a good deal of public feeling had been excited. There would then be meetings which the hon. Member complains ; and, my opinion is, that the present administration of the law would continue with scarcely any alteration. The truth is, that if the House goes the length of conferring a right of appeal on every prisoner who is convicted at assizes or quarter sessions, they can scarcely hesitate before long to grant the principle that the expenses of the appeals should be defrayed from some public fund. That was the opinion given by Mr. Greaves, in his evidence before the Lords' Committee, for he did not shrink from advising that appeals should be conducted at the public expense, which he thought would be moderate. Of that, however, the House will itself be the judge. At all events, it must understand that if the Legislature confers an absolute right of appeal on every prisoner that is convicted, it cannot hesitate to enact that his costs shall be defrayed out of some public fund—either out of the county rate, or out of votes granted for that purpose by Parliament. With a view to show how utterly nugatory an appeal would be without such a provision, I will refer the House to the extensive class of offences with reference to which an appeal is already given—I mean those for which persons may be summarily convicted. I may first remark, however, that the course of legislation has not recently been in favour of conferring this right of appeal to the quarter sessions. Thus, the Aggravated Assaults Act, under which more than 2,000 persons were convicted in the year 1858, and about 1,500 sentenced to imprisonment, generally with hard labour, allows no appeal whatever. In cases, however, where the prisoner possesses the right of appeal it is remarkable how seldom it is made use of. In the year 1858 no less than 18,630 individuals were convicted in England and Wales under the extremely general and rather arbitrary provisions of the Vagrant Act. How many of these does the House think appealed to the quarter sessions ? Just ten. In the same year 7,379 persons were convicted of offences against the Game Laws, of whom only fourteen appealed ; and out of 11,211 convictions for malicious trespass and damage of property only two appeals are recorded, of which one was rewarded with success.

The hon. Member has spoken about the propriety and necessity of assimilating our criminal to the civil law in regard to appeals ; but has he proposed anything like such an assimilation in his own measure? In civil cases the plaintiff and the defendant have an equal right of moving for a new trial; but in the Bill before us an unilateral right of appeal is given to the prisoner, but withheld from the prosecutor. But, if there is anything in the argument for assimilation, both parties should be endowed with the privilege of appeal. I am far, however, from recommending that the Crown should have any such right; I believe it would be highly disadvantageous, and I have no desire to see any innovation made in the ancient rule of our law, that a plea of autrefois acquit is to be held sacred, and that no person should be put in jeopardy twice for the same offence. It is vain for the hon. and learned Member to talk of assimilating civil and criminal procedure, if he gives an appeal to the prisoner and withholds it from the prosecutor. But I will take the Bill as it is drawn, and, supposing there be a unilateral appeal, I will ask the House to consider what would be the consequences. Upon that question I am able to give the opinion of some experienced Judges, which I think will have some weight with the House. Lord Denman said,—

“I think there are grave objections to anything which will give countenance to the opinion that wrong convictions are of frequent occurrence, and that a new court ought to be erected, or the present courts empowered to correct them by motions for a second trial. One consequence of such power might be a degree of laxity of juries in considering their verdict and less reluctance to convict on doubtful evidence, because the new trial might correct their mistake. And, after all, the second trial could not guarantee the security of the truth; the second jury is not more infallible than the first.”

Lord Brougham said,—

“Most undoubtedly if it were thought that you might set an error right by moving for a new trial, there would be a good deal less of that sort of awful feeling of responsibility under which both Judge, prosecutor's and prisoner's counsel, and jury act; whereas at present they feel that what they are doing is remediless if any error is committed. I believe you would have very frequent errors committed. I am quite sure upon jurors it would have an effect, and this is a question about jurors rather than about Judges.”

The English system of criminal jurisprudence is marked by a singular tenderness towards the person accused. It is always understood that the prosecutor's counsel abstains from any strong remarks in his speech; the Judge takes care that no unfair advantage is taken of the prisoner, and if there is a doubt it is given in the prisoner's favour. There is a total abstinence from that system of—I hardly like to say, “hunting down”—a prisoner of which we have sometimes met with instances in foreign courts; but, at all events, there is great forbearance shown in the manner in which the case is pressed against the prisoner. It is not accidental, but it is owing to the feeling of all persons concerned that the verdict on the facts is absolutely irreversible. As regards questions of law, as the hon. and learned Member has stated, there are full means of appeal at present. In order that the House may see how favourable is the position of the English prisoner compared with that of a prisoner under some of the most civilized systems of law on the Continent, I will read a statement which draws a contrast between the English and French systems of jurisprudence. I do not do this with the view of making any invidious comparison between the two systems; I assume that there are sufficient grounds for the rules of criminal law which are followed under the highly civilized system of jurisprudence which exists in France; but I merely wish to draw a contrast for the purpose of showing what is the position of the English prisoner compared with that of prisoners under other systems, and that it is possible materially to alter that position to his disadvantage.

“1. In France all prosecutions are instituted and carried on by the public prosecutor; in England they are almost always left to private individuals, generally persons of limited means.

“2. In France an accused person is put upon his trial by a report (called a mise en accusation) of magistrates or Judges (Tribunal d'Instructions): in England there must be the verdict of a grand jury, or a coroner's jury.

“3. In France an accused person is most rigidly questioned, both before and at his trial, not only as to the circumstances of the particular case, but as to other charges which may have been made against him, and as to all the events of his life. A history of him is given in the acte d'accusation, and his character, habits, and disposition, as well as those of his friends and relations, are minutely described, and he is examined as to all these matters by the President in the presence of the jury. As the trial proceeds he is called upon to explain the conduct imputed to him, and to admit or deny the particular facts alleged by the witnesses. In England no questions can be put to the accused either before the magistrate or at his trial, but he is at full liberty to make any statements which he thinks likely to be in his favour. The investigation is confined to the single offence with which he is charged, and previous charges, or even convictions, cannot be brought forward against him until the jury has decided that he is guilty of that offence. His previous bad character cannot be given in evidence to prove his guilt, but he is allowed to bring it forward, if good, to prove his innocence.

"4. In France the accused may be found guilty by a bare majority of the jury; in England the whole number must concur; if one only refuses to join in such a verdict it cannot be pronounced."

That is a perfectly accurate description, and it may be added that there is a rule in English law which is never departed from, that a penal statute must be construed strictly. If there is any doubt as to the verbal construction, that doubt always avails in favour of the prisoner. What would be the position of the prisoner if the rules of law which the hon. and learned Gentleman seeks to establish were substituted for the present law? The counsel for the prosecution would be able to say with truth, "Gentlemen of the jury, if your verdict against the prisoner should be wrong, he has an appeal, and it can be set aside; but if you acquit him your verdict is irreversible; therefore, incline to the side of severity, and not to that of mercy. If you are wrong, there is an appeal for the prisoner, at present at his own expense, though we hope it will soon be at the public expense; but if he is acquitted, the Crown and the prosecutor are concluded by your verdict, and the decision is unchangeable." The whole feeling of the Court, which every one familiar with the proceedings of a criminal court knows is tender and merciful towards the prisoner, would be reversed, and there would be found not only a sentiment, but a rational ground, for giving an advantage to the prosecutor against the prisoner.

The House must also bear in mind that if this remedy were afforded, although it would be practically unavailable in the great majority of cases without the assistance of public funds, it would be infallibly called into operation in all important cases.

victed, to give notice of motion for a new trial within the first four days of next term, and then by affidavits, and all the means which could be set to work in political cases, to apply to the Court for a new trial? I would also ask whether the Judges would not be placed in an embarrassing and difficult position? I cannot but think that the operation of this remedy with respect to criminal cases of that sort is a matter for the serious consideration of the House, and that there are good reasons for maintaining the present doctrine of the law, that as a verdict is conclusive against the Crown, so it shall be conclusive against the prisoner—subject merely to the interference of the prerogative of mercy. We have not only English cases to deal with; there are important criminal prosecutions in Ireland, as well as in England. Everybody acquainted with Ireland knows that in cases which used to come under the Insurrection Act, and which are now commonly called agrarian offences, in which the feelings of the country are involved, there is the greatest possible difficulty in the administration of the criminal law. I certainly should be the last person who would wish that any innocent person should be convicted, and if convicted, that he should not have a proper revision of his sentence; but I ask any hon. Gentleman who is aware of the necessity of protecting witnesses before the trial, of removing them to a colony or some place of safety after the trial, and of the difficulty altogether which there is in administering a system of trial by jury for a particular class of offences in Ireland, at seasons when the public mind is somewhat agitated or excited, what would be the effect of the changes which the hon. and learned Member proposes by his Bill to introduce? Then, the Scotch law is also to be considered. In Scotland, a simple majority of the jury can find a verdict, and if a simple majority can find a verdict I hardly know how it would be possible, in cases of any difference of opinion, to refuse the appeal which the hon. and learned Member seeks. Certainly, if the present law can be defended with regard to Scotch cases, the arguments must be infinitely stronger when applied to English cases where unanimity of the jury is required.

These seem to me to be the principal consequences which would flow from the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman. I trust that the House will take them seriously into consideration, and then determine whether such a Bill is one to which they can give their consent. This is not the time for discussing the clauses of the Bill, and therefore I do not wish to dwell upon minute points; but there is one clause, the 15th, which is worthy the attention of the House. By that clause the hon. and learned Member proposes to give the Court a power of entering a verdict of acquittal, after cause shown both by prosecutor and prisoner, without remitting the case to a second jury. Now, that certainly is a power which hitherto has been unknown to our constitution. That is to say, it is giving the Judges the power of reversing the decisions of Juries in criminal cases.

Before I sit down I wish to say a few words as to the bearing of the measure on the prerogative of pardon. The hon. and learned Member does not propose to alter or vary that prerogative; and therefore, whatever objections it is liable to will remain in full force, as far as the prerogative itself is concerned. But it is material to consider, if appeals are admitted in order to diminish the frequency of the interposition of the Crown in the way of pardon, what is the nature of that prerogative. We have heard of its unconstitutional character, of "the dark and secret" procedure by which it is brought into effect, of the Secretary of State not being able to cross-examine witnesses, and of his setting aside a verdict without going through the judicial investigation upon which the decision of the jury was founded. No doubt, all those objections stated in that naked manner have a certain degree of truth; but the House ought to remember that they are objections founded upon a partial view of the subject—that they are founded on the supposition that the Crown has a general power of revising the verdicts of juries. Now, the Secretary of State, or the Crown under his advice, has no power of aggravating the consequences of a conviction. The prerogative only extends to the mitigation or remission of a punishment. The Secretary of State can never put on the black cap. He is not armed with the sword of justice. He has no authority in any instance for making the condition of a prisoner worse. He has only the power, as I stated before, of mitigating the effects of the verdict of a jury. We hear on certain occasions much of the mischievous effects of official forms, and if any technicality of office produces any inconvenience it is stigmatized as "red tapism"; but, when it comes to a question of mitigating the sentence of a prisoner nothing is said of red tape or official forms—we are told, on the other hand, that judicial forms are of the utmost benefit. Let the House remember that the appeal to the Home Office is cheap, direct, rapid, and unaccompanied with any official forms; and that whatever importance they may attribute to the cross-examination of witnesses, or to the technical rules of a court of justice, it is of essential advantage to the poor prisoner who has no means of seeing counsel for motions to obtain writs of certiorari that his access to the Home Office should be easy and unencumbered with forms and expenses. However gloomy and secret may be the procedure of the Home Office, let it be observed that from those gloomy and secret recesses no bill of costs ever emerges, and that the poorest prisoner in the country may, at the cost of a sheet of writing paper, obtain a revision of his sentence. I must say that I think the House will be indisposed to underrate the importance of that difference. It is of great importance that the relative bearings of this question should be understood. With their permission I will state to them a case furnished to me by Mr. Waddington, who has been for some years Under-Secretary in the Home Office. He says:—

"Some years ago, at the end of the Winter Assize, a very distinguished Judge called upon me at the Home Office respecting a case which he had just tried. A poor old cripple, he informed me, had been charged with committing a rape upon a strong, healthy young woman; the offence was sworn by the prosecutrix to have been committed in open day, on the ground-floor room of a house looking upon a well-frequented street, and in which there were several other persons (some of them women) at the time, none of whom heard any noise, screaming, or struggling. The charge was not made until long after the alleged event, and to render the thing quite complete, the girl was pregnant, which she attributed to the violation in question. The Judge, as may be supposed, summed up most strongly for an acquittal; but the girl was what the newspapers call an 'interesting' witness, swore most positively, and carried the jury with her. The man was convicted and sentenced to a long period of transportation. The Judge now came in haste to express his entire dissent from the verdict, and to apply for a free pardon, which, after a very few days, the Secretary of State granted. I omitted to state that this poor wretch was a pauper, without a friend or a shilling in the world. How would the poor cripple have fared under the hon. and learned Member's Bill? He must first have employed an attorney to instruct a barrister to apply for a writ of certiorari to bring up the indictment, and have paid the expenses of the writ and its execution; the next steps would have been to apply to the Court (by attorney and counsel still) for a rule nisi for a new trial, and to serve one copy of the rule, when obtained, upon the prosecutrix, and another upon the Attorney General."

I observe that the hon. and learned Gentleman has taken great care to provide that a copy shall be served on the Attorney General.

"The next, to instruct counsel to make the rule absolute. The next, to get the record sent down again for trial by what is called a procedendo or a venire de novo, or something of that sort. The next, to apply to a Judge to be let out on bail, or remain in prison until the assizes. The next, to prepare his defence for the second trial. The next, to appear again, and hold up his hand as a culprit at the bar, and to tremble while the well-remembered story was repeated with the same appearance of guileless innocence as before. All this he must have done and endured, and he might, very possibly, have been convicted again after all."

That is a perfectly accurate and unexaggerated picture of what would be the consequences of the remedy afforded to poor prisoners by the hon. and learned Member's Bill. I think the House must see that it would be utterly impossible to abolish or take any steps to make any considerable inroad on the power of pardon, unless—which I cannot for a moment imagine—they would wish to place the great majority of prisoners in a far worse position than they are, under the present law, at the present time. That I may not be supposed to express any ill-considered opinion, I will call attention to another passage in the letter of Lord Cranworth:—

"I would further suggest that in my opinion, even if there were an unlimited power of obtaining a new trial in criminal as well as in civil cases, this would not supersede the present practice of applying to the Secretary of State. Such applications are not by any means confined to cases in which it is alleged that parties actually innocent have been convicted; and even where that is the ground of the application it is very often (I should say, so far as I have had any personal experience, generally) founded on some additional matter which by no analogy drawn from civil proceedings could have warranted the Court in granting a new trial. Your Lordship's long experience in Westminster Hall makes it quite unnecessary for me to call to your recollection that no new trial is ever granted on the ground of there being additional facts not brought forward on the former trial, unless the Court is satisfied by affidavit that the new evidence could not by reasonable diligence have been brought forward in the first instance."

I think the House must be of opinion that on those grounds it will not be desirable to trench on the prerogative of pardon; but there are other reasons why it is necessary that a discretionary power should be maintained. The hon. and learned Gentleman says in his Bill that application must be made to the Court within the first four day of the following term. Certainly there is an ample proviso at the end, which, if construed liberally, would go far to nullify the preceding part of the clause. It provides that, under special circumstances, the Court may allow applications to be made at any time. That may be ten years afterwards, and until we have the benefit of the construction the Court may put on the meaning of "special circumstances," it is impossible to anticipate what would be the operation of this Bill. The House will observe that the question of time is of great importance with respect to the power of pardon. That power is frequently exercised not strictly in reference to the verdict of the jury. Where a sentence is of long duration, sometimes for the life of the prisoner, or for five, seven, ten, or more years, circumstances arise during the period of punishment which render it either necessary, or at all events highly expedient, that the power of pardon should be exercised. There is one case of not very uncommon occurrence where the medical officer reports that the prisoner cannot be longer confined without danger to his health or life, and it is always the practice to pardon, in order to save a prisoner's life. Then it sometimes happens that accidents take place on public works—that a prisoner, through the falling of a heavy stone, has had his hand or leg crushed, and is maimed for life. In cases of that sort the usual practice has been to make some remission of the prisoner's sentence. Occasionally a murderous attack is made by a prisoner on warder or turnkey, and another prisoner interferes to save life or otherwise to protect the officer. In those cases and in cases of striking good conduct it has always been the practice to have some consideration in mitigating the punishment. In fact, prisoners under sentence, when numerous, must form a sort of community—must be specially governed by rules adapted to them; and it is necessary there should be vested in the executive some power of mitigating the extremes of legal sentences. For these reasons I think the House must see that under no circumstances would it be possible to abolish the prerogative of pardon or to substitute for the important power of mitigating the condition of the prisoner the expensive and circuitous remedy promised by this Bill. I must apologise for the length at which I have troubled the House. I have stated what are the objections to the Bill as it stands, the principle which it involves, and the consequences to which it will probably lead. I leave the question with perfect confidence in the hands of the House, and with the full assurance that they will deliberate upon it with a general regard to the great and permanent interests of the country which are involved in a departure from the existing practice which this Bill proposes. I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. DENMAN said, that he had but very recently emerged from the humble position of a sessions barrister; but as he thought he might add one or two new considerations to this important question, and as the House might wish to hear the opinions of one who had been engaged in the active pursuit of that branch of the profession, he ventured to address to them a few observations. During an experience of many years it had frequently fallen to his lot to be the advocate of prisoners charged with indictable offences, and he believed he might safely say that, of hundreds who had been acquitted and convicted, in only one instance of conviction had it ever occurred to him to suspect that the verdict was not a right and true verdict. In that one instance he doubted whether the prisoner had been rightly convicted, and he expressed his opinion to a brother barrister sitting near him; and within two minutes he overheard his client use an expression which convinced him that, without the slightest doubt, he was guilty. As far as his experience went, he believed that criminal justice was satisfactorily administered; except in this one respect—that he had frequently seen persons acquitted who, he felt sure, were guilty. As to the Bill now proposed, he should not be sorry to see the question of whether there should be an appeal in criminal cases—some different kind of appeal from that which at present existed—re-discussed by the country and by a select Committee of that House. He did not concur with the right hon. Baronet, the Home Secretary, that there had been no alteration in the law bearing on this question since 1848; because, in consequence of the Committee of 1848, the House would recollect great changes had been introduced with regard to appeals from quarter sessions, and the criminal law had been placed in a very different position.

The practical question now was, whether the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman now before the House, if it were passed into law, would improve the administration of justice; and in his opinion it would do more harm than good. The provision with regard to the payment of costs by the prisoner made it obvious at once that it was a remedy for the rich and not for the poor. The question of costs required a great deal of consideration. If the prisoner could not pay them, who was to pay them? Either the country or the prosecutor. If the country paid the costs, how could that be reconciled with the present state of the law, which did not allow a man, even though acquitted, to obtain the costs occasioned by his prosecution? It would be giving an advantage to the convicted man over the innocent man who had been actually acquitted. If the prosecutor was to pay the costs, who would prosecute? One of the great difficulties in the administration of the criminal law was to find prosecutors willing to come forward; but this difficulty would be much increased if prosecutors were to have the prospect of being involved in motions for new trials, and of having to hang about the courts indefinitely until the matter was disposed of. Even when prosecutors did get their costs allowed them, everybody knew that as a general rule they never were indemnified for the expenses they incurred. A noble and learned Lord, who had presided over the Court of Queen's Bench, and whose evidence on this subject had been somewhat misquoted to-day, once had his house broken into, and some of his most valuable property stolen. He prosecuted the thief to conviction, and, though all the expenses were on the most moderate scale, and not a farthing more than necessary was spent, the prosecution cost him £73 beyond the sum allowed him for costs. This was by no means an uncommon case. He did not wish to be understood as being opposed to the fair consideration of any alteration, whatever that might be, in the present state of things, with which he did not feel the unmixed satisfaction which the right hon. Gentleman had called on the House to feel. On the contrary, upon a review of the whole subject he was of opinion that a case had been made out for a further consideration of this question. A recent case had at least shown that there was considerable ground for inquiry into the present system, and had the hon. and learned Gentleman's Motion taken that form he would have gladly supported it. But the practicability of such an inquiry would be considerably impaired by the passing of a Bill like this, which left altogether out of consideration one of the main difficulties of the subject—the question of costs. It might turn out on inquiry that the present system was the best that could be devised. He did not attach much value to the objection raised against the Bill, that to avoid unjust delay in hearing appeals it would be necessary that the Judges should sit all the year round. If it were once made out that criminals ought to have the right of such appeals, the Judges ought to sit all the year round, if necessary, to hear them. If any change were made, it ought to be of a much more comprehensive nature than that proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman. To pass this Bill as it now stood would be to impede instead of assisting further consideration. It would be establishing a system of appeal for the rich, and not for the poor; it would lead to great delay, and render proper convictions more difficult than at present. In fact, if its provisions became law as they now stood, the old Horatian maxim would have to be altered, instead of raro, it would be

“*Crebro antecedentem scelestum
Deseruit pede poena claudo.*”

MR. PHILIPPS said, that although he had not the good fortune to receive a legal education, it had been his lot to be concerned in the trial of prisoners for many years, and he should therefore have been very glad to be relieved of some portion of the responsibility attaching to that duty. It was not however the duty of the House to consider what might be agreeable to private feelings, but what upon the whole would be advantageous to the public at large. He could not perceive that this Bill would be the slightest improvement on the present system. Instead of conferring any benefit on prisoners, it would most likely deprive them of advantages which they at present possessed. It was unfortunately impossible, owing to the fallibility of human judgment, to exclude false evidence without at the same time excluding much which might be true; but if this proposed tribunal were established it would deprive prisoners of the advantage of equitable and moral evidence which might now be received in their favour. He had great doubts of a Court of Appeal being for the benefit of the accused; he was disinclined to think that it would prove injurious to the interests of the public. The measure would have the effect of either ousting the Home Office of its jurisdiction or of postponing its jurisdiction to a later period after the appeal had been heard and dismissed; and he thought it would be a fearful responsibility for the Home Office to interfere with a verdict which had been sanctioned by two tribunals. No ground whatever had been laid for imputing blame to the proceedings of the Home Office. As far as his experience went, he had always found the greatest readiness and the greatest anxiety there to attend to all cases brought under its notice. Under these circumstances he must vote against the second reading of the Bill.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, if he were asked whether an Appeal Court ought to be established he should certainly answer in the affirmative: but if he were asked to decide whether the Bill before the House would prove a satisfactory solution of that difficulty in the criminal law of the country he should certainly reply in the negative, and that he believed the machinery it proposed to carry out its object was incapable of practical operation. Under these circumstances he was constrained to say he should vote for the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department. He could not, however, concur in all the arguments urged by the right hon. Gentleman in the admirable speech he had just delivered. The right hon. Gentleman, in opposition to the measure, had based one of his arguments against a criminal appeal on a case which had recently attracted much attention, without apparently perceiving that his illustration cut both ways. He argued that if a second Court were to be appointed, the council for the prosecution would for the future say to the jury, “You need not hesitate about convicting the prisoner, because there is an appeal which will set you right if you are wrong;” but surely he had forgotten that this might be said with just as much justice in reference to the present practice. The right hon. Gentleman, as he truly said, could not sit at the Home Office with the sword of justice, nor put on the black cap; but the Secretary for the Home Department did sit practically as a Judge of appeal, reversing the verdict of the jury and pardoning the criminal; and a counsel for the prosecution who would condescend to use such an argument might say now to a jury, “You need not be so careful about your verdict; convict the prisoner, and if you are wrong Sir George Lewis, the Home Secretary, will reverse your decision." The Home Office was, in fact a sort of court of appeal; and what he contended for was, that whatever was done by the Home Office in regard to setting aside the verdict of a Jury should be publicly known and the reasons that had influenced the Secretary of State openly stated, otherwise juries would become careless about discharging their duties; they would say it was useless for them to give such attention to these cases if their verdicts were to be set aside without any reason being given for reversing their decision. The machinery of this Bill was utterly impracticable. He was not a little surprised to find that the Court of Appeal which was already in existence—somewhat analogous to the Court of Cassation—in which seven Judges sat to decide on questions of law reserved for them, was utterly ignored, and the business of hearing these appeals was thrown on the Court of Queen's Bench, which had already more work than it could get through. According to the hon. and learned Gentleman a great proportion of the convictions took place at the summer assizes, and his Bill proposed that in the event of an appeal the convicted party should apply to the Court of Queen's Bench within the first four days of the next following term. On those days the Court already had to hear a great number of applications for rules nisi, so that, generally speaking, an appeal would be heard from six months to twelve after notice had been given of it. In capital cases the attorney, if he were up to his business, would of course take good care to set his appeal down at the bottom of the list, in order to prolong his client's life as long as possible; so that a murderer tried in July, 1861, might not get his second trial until July, 1862. To bring out a man for execution some twelve or fifteen months after his sentence had been pronounced, would shock public feeling, so that the ultimate result would be the impossibility of carrying capital punishments into effect. The applications for new trials would be on affidavits, and it would be so easy to make out a strong prima facie case in affidavits, that it would be utterly impossible for the Judges, in nine cases out of ten, to refuse the application in the first instance. Cases of alibi, for instance, might be presented in a much stronger form in affidavits than in viva voce evidence. There would in this way be 500 or 600 cases standing on the paper for argument term after term.

The imposition of this labour on the Court of Queen's Bench would be impossible, and would prove subversive of the first principles of criminal justice. In the ninth section, the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to enact that sentence might be immediately passed after the verdict was pronounced, and should be in force until the verdict was set aside; though very properly by the tenth section cases of capital punishment were excepted, otherwise it would be left to a man's executors to move in arrest of judgment; but in many cases the greater part of the sentence would have been undergone before the appeal could be heard. What would be the advantage of the right of appeal to a boy sentenced to three or four months' imprisonment and a whipping, or to a man who got six months' with a fortnight's solitary imprisonment? The disagreeable part would have been got through long before the appeal came on. He was sincerely desirous that this subject should be fully discussed by the House in order that a practical scheme for the establishment of a system of criminal appeal should be devised. For instance, an experiment might be made by giving the Secretary of State power to refer the consideration of capital cases to the Court of Criminal Appeal now existing. The responsibility in such cases was too great to be devolved on a single individual. This Bill was incapable of being worked, though the hon. and learned Gentleman deserved the greatest credit for having taken up what was a most interesting and difficult subject. He hoped the Government would take it into their serious consideration whether some alteration in the present system of reversing sentences might not be devised, which would have the advantages of publicity and regularity.

MR. GEORGE said, he was desirous of doing full justice to the tone and manner in which his hon. and learned Colleague had brought forward the present question; but he could not support his Bill, which he thought most objectionable in its character. He must express his hearty concurrence in the able and comprehensive arguments of the right Secretary for the Home the best consideration to the subject, he had come to there was no foundation either in point of const or of criminal justice. to say that, in his opinion be highly detrimental, the administration of criminal justice in this country, and especially in Ireland. Such a measure, if passed, would be an indirect mode of repealing capital punishment—a question which should be considered in itself, and be treated according to its own particular merits. The Bill would also have the effect of introducing into our courts of justice a great increase in the crimes of perjury and subornation of perjury. He thought it necessary even in the interests of the prisoner himself, as well as of humanity, to oppose the passing of such a Bill as that before the House. Punishment, to be effective, should be prompt and efficacious. Now, the effect of this Bill would be to obstruct the course of criminal justice, and to render it impossible to administer it promptly. As he understood the measure, it was proposed that there should be affecting every place of criminal jurisdiction, power by certiorari to remove the case into a superior court for the purpose of having the questions, both of law and fact, re-argued before another tribunal, with the view of having the whole case again tried by another jury. If the privilege were given to the prisoner or defendant to resort to those proceedings, upon what grounds should it be refused to the Crown? In another point of view he thought this Bill most mischievous in its character. Every one acquainted with the course of criminal justice must be aware of the great difficulties placed in the way of the prosecution in obtaining convictions. It was often impossible to sift satisfactorily at the moment the evidence produced for the defence, and it was only incidentally that the prosecutor was able to discover how far the defence, whether in the shape of alibi or otherwise, was true or not. If those difficulties be great upon the occasion of the first trial, they would be absolutely insurmountable upon a second trial, taking place many months afterwards. The counsel for the Crown were bound to set forth the whole of their case at the outset without reservation, so that if there were an appeal the party accused would have time to study it in all its points, and where a dishonest defence was to be set up the witnesses would have time to fully instruct themselves how to swear up to all the

the prisoner from the moment of his trial to the delivery of the verdict, not by his own counsel only, but by the Judge. Every precaution was taken to give him a fair trial—not the slightest advantage was taken of him; the Judge never failed to place prominently before the eyes of the jury the slightest point that might be favourable to him, and if any doubt was left on the mind of the Judge on any question of law, he was the first to desire to reserve it for the decision of a superior Court. Subsequently to the trial, if any ground for doubt arose whether the jury had not been hasty or mistaken in their verdict, the Judge and the counsel for the prosecution would be the first persons to bring the case under the notice of the Home Office, in order that the prerogative of the Crown might be exercised if need were. If this Bill were passed into law as it now stood, it would be impossible to refuse the Crown the same privilege as the prisoner. Under the present system, when an error was committed, it was on the side of mercy; but how it would be if this new system were established it would be difficult to say. What, if this Bill became law, would become of the noble principle of mercy that characterized our criminal law in the case of murder—that of autrefois acquit—under which, once a man was acquitted of the crime of murder, he could be never tried again for the same offence, however strong might be the additional evidence that had arisen? He much regretted that his hon. and learned Friend had brought forward this Bill, and if it were pressed to a division he should vote against it.

Mr. MELLOR said, that this was a question of deep importance to the administration of justice. It would be better to abolish capital punishment altogether than to make the distinction which his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Marylebone (Mr. Edwin James) had suggested, namely, to allow an appeal in capital cases, and none in any other criminal cases. He quite agreed that there was no analogy between criminal and civil cases, in respect of the mode of procedure. In criminal cases the onus probandi was on the Crown, but in civil it most commonly lay with the defendant. The Judge always charged the

tion of a prisoner. He thought that the present feeling in favour of an appellate jurisdiction in criminal cases arose principally from the cases of Mr. Barber and Dr. Smethurst; but neither of them would have had the benefit of a revision of his sentence under any appellate tribunal such as that now proposed to be established. In Mr. Barber's case the facts that showed his innocence were not discovered for many months after the trial. Then, to take the case of Dr. Smethurst: in a civil case a new trial was seldom granted except the Judge was dissatisfied with the verdict; but, as he (Mr. Mellor) understood, the Judge was not dissatisfied with the verdict in Smethurst's case, although he thought the case was one in which the prerogative of the Crown might, under the circumstances, properly be exercised in Smethurst's favour. In criminal cases, where the Judge was dissatisfied with the verdict, it was better for the Secretary of State to grant a free pardon than that there should be a second trial. It was a principle of law that once a man was tried and acquitted he should not be tried again for the same offence; but if the proposition now before the House was acceded to, how could they refuse the Crown a second trial? Surely if the House granted the prisoner a second trial, they should not, if they had the interest of justice at heart, refuse it to the Crown. Believing that the proposition before the House would so alter the whole course of criminal procedure as to do mischief and cause confusion, without doing any real benefit to the class in whose favour the hon. and learned Member for Wexford was so anxious to interfere, he felt that he must vote against the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. HENLEY said, he would not have troubled the House if he had not been anxious to guard himself, in the vote he was about to give, against being supposed to have an absolute opinion against any rather made them more prominent. The hon. and learned Gentleman could not shut out the question whether the Crown was to have a right of appeal as well as the prisoner. Now, for his own part, he did not think that anything could bring him to consent to a man being placed twice upon his trial for the same criminal offence. What was the House asked to do? Here was a complicated machinery, every clause of the Bill showing the difficulty that beset the framer of the Bill. His hon. Friend near him had spoken, for example, of the difficulty of obtaining witnesses. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. M'Mahon) had made a strange provision in respect to witnesses. In cases tried at the summer assizes in July no motion could be made for a new trial until the opening of Michaelmas Term early in November. During this period of three months the witness would be under his recognizance; so that in the case of an offence committed perhaps in April, and which came before the Court of Sessions or Assizes in July, no witness could stir one step until November came and until he knew whether he was liable to be called again upon his recognizance. The captain of a ship or a person about to proceed to the Continent or elsewhere could not go abroad during this period, if he had the misfortune to be a witness in such a case. Would it be possible to keep the recognizances thus hanging over the heads of witnesses, or if it were, would the public endure it? It was true the hon. and learned Gentleman provided that if from any cause a party did not appear, and if no reason were given for his absence, the evidence he had previously given might be used against the defendant on the second trial. But it was most desirable that this secondary evidence should not be admitted unless in cases of absolute necessity, for the demeanour of witnesses affected their evidence with juries quite as much as what they said. The question of the witnesses the ground from under him in regard to the analogy in civil cases, because he would not let the Crown come in, but only the prisoner or defendant. There was great force in what had been said, that less care would be taken by juries in convicting prisoners than at present, if a prisoner had a right to demand a new trial. After an experience derived from trying nearer 3,000 than 2,000 prisoners before juries he could assert that they were very careful in convicting prisoners. He was bound to say that although there were many cases in which juries acquitted the prisoner where he could not agree with them, it was very rare indeed that in cases of conviction there was not good ground for the opinion of the jury. Then the Bill would be inoperative in the case of persons sentenced under certain circumstances to an imprisonment of three or four months; for their terms would expire before the appeal could be obtained. Now, it was not equal justice to say that persons sentenced to six months' imprisonment and upwards should have an appeal, which those sentenced to shorter terms were not to enjoy. He opposed this Bill also because it would open the door to an appeal by those persons who had money in their pockets, and shut out the great mass of prisoners who might be poor, and for whom no subscriptions could be raised. These parties would, indeed, be in a worse position than before, because they would lose the advantage they now had in the care and caution of juries. The jury might say, "Oh, if we are wrong the prisoner has an appeal;" while those parties, wanting means, would have no opportunity of getting an appeal. He regretted that the prerogative of mercy belonging to the Crown had new to the House; but being convinced that the present Bill would do more harm than good, he should vote against the second reading. The hon. and learned Member had quoted great authorities and high names in favour of his Bill; but if they had had these strong convictions, and had not discovered great difficulties in the way of acting with advantage to the public he believed that those learned persons would have introduced some measure for the amendment of the law. The opinions quoted were abstract opinions, the value of which was somewhat diminished by the fact that they had never been carried out in practice. For these reasons he should oppose the second reading of this Bill.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he wished to state some of the reasons that would induce him to divide against the Bill. With the exception of the hon. Gentleman who seconded the Motion for the second reading no pretence of any kind of support had been put forward by any hon. Member who had spoken on this proposition. The support of the hon. Secunder was of a very questionable character, for he had recommended the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. M'Mahon) to refer the matter to a Committee or Board of Inquiry, to see what could be done for the amendment of the law. The only real cases in which such a Bill could, by analogy with civil cases, be demanded, were either those in which the verdict was against the weight of evidence; or, secondly, those in which new and material evidence was discovered after the conviction, the existence of which was unknown at the trial. With respect to a Motion for a new trial in civil cases on the first ground, although the motion was made in banco before the full Court, yet practically it was an appeal to the Judge who tried the cause; because the Court seldom or never sent a cause for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, unless the Judge who tried the cause was dissatisfied with the result. Under the existing system, if the Judge were of opinion that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, he would be appealed to by the counsel or by the friends of the prisoner. He would then be asked to make a report to the Home Secretary, and the course taken by the Home Secretary was also guided by the opinion of the Judge; so that practically there was the same appeal with the same result as could be obtained by the present proposition. The other case, of the discovery of new evidence, was so infrequent that it did not call for new legislation, especially legislation attended by so much inconvenience. He had endeavoured in vain to ascertain what practical and tangible mischief the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to get rid of by this Bill. He (the Solicitor General) admitted it was an inconvenience that the Home Secretary should have to decide such momentous questions as he had now occasionally to consider in criminal cases; and had his hon. and learned Friend brought forward a proposal to remedy that inconvenience, by transferring the consideration and decision of such questions to another tribunal, he should have given such a proposal his attentive consideration; but the Bill before the House went much further than that. His hon. and learned Friend had spoken of what he called the anomaly of removing criminal cases by certiorari into the Queen's Bench, and of motions for new trials in cases tried by that Court. But he would rather retain that slight anomaly than adopt the present measure, for the sake of obtaining a theoretical and superficial uniformity of procedure. It must be remembered that writ of certiorari was, in practice, only granted in cases in which it was believed difficult questions of law would arise. However anomalous the power of removing a cause by a writ of certiorari might now appear it was, no doubt, at the time it was introduced very necessary, in consequence of the absence of a Bill of exceptions in criminal cases, and the consequent impossibility, on an ordinary criminal trial, of setting right the miscarriage of a Judge in matter of law arising at the trial. Besides, by the 16th of Vict., c. 30, s. 10, the facility of obtaining a writ certiorari was much limited; so that the anomaly was so trifling that it afforded no argument whatever in favour of the proposition now before the House. The foundation of the measure was in itself a fallacy fatal to the success of the scheme. Its foundation was an alleged analogy between a civil action and a criminal prosecution. But his hon. and learned Friend himself was obliged to admit that no such analogy existed by withholding an appeal from the Crown. A civil case was a contention between two parties for victory; and the only interest the public had in it was to provide efficient tribunals for hearing it. How different was a criminal case? It was the duty of the Crown to watch over the safety of the subject, and in case of injury to any one to endeavour to discover the party who had inflicted it, and to bring him before a jury of his countrymen. But the Crown had no bias; it was as much the defender of the man in the dock as it was of the party for an injury against whom the prisoner was arraigned. Everything was allowed in favour of the prisoner. In trials of actions, juries were often locked up to deliberate because they had not come to decisions. But how did juries act in the case of prisoners placed in the dock? Why it was a "household word" in every one's mouth, that "a doubt must go in favour of the prisoner." The result was, that if any one jurymen out of the twelve entertained a serious doubt of a prisoner's guilt the prisoner was acquitted. But let it only be known that the verdict of a jury carried no finality about it; that it might be set aside by an ingenious counsel, on the 6th of November, in Westminster Hall; that the law as well as the facts might thus be set aside; and juries would cease to bestow the care which they at present gave in order to arrive at a proper decision. Under all the circumstances, then, he could not hesitate to give his opposition to the Motion; but being at the same time fully sensible that an inconvenience existed in connection with the present state and practice of the criminal law, he would give his fullest consideration to any measure which he thought likely to provide the proper remedy for the evil.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR said, he should have been better satisfied had he heard an intimation from the Solicitor General of his intention to lay before the House a remedy which, it was on all hands admitted, was required to meet an existing evil. He thought the omissions in the present Bill were better than some of its intentions. The Bill did not interfere with the Royal prerogative of mercy. That, he thought, was wise, and his own experience supplied a case in which it had been beneficially exerted. In 1846 he was called on to defend one of two persons charged with a murder in Yorkshire. Both were convicted; and they were sentenced to death by Mr. Justice Patteson. Shortly after the trial, the prisoner whom he defended expressed a wish to communicate with his attorney. The attorney went to the prisoner, and at once drew up, at the dictation of the prisoner, a statement by which he, fully and in detail, took upon himself the commission and guilt of the crime, and entirely, and without equivocation exculpated his fellow prisoner. This was brought to him

(Mr. Digby Seymour); he at once ran up with it to the Judge's lodging, obtained admission to the Judge, and handed him the document, and the result was that it was laid before the Home Secretary, and the prerogative of mercy was stretched out to save the life of a man condemned to death the day before. If that prerogative had been taken away a life would have been sacrificed. He also remembered a case of rape in the south of England, which excited great attention not many years ago, and in which the prerogative of mercy was again most properly extended, after the case had been sifted with the utmost care and attention. He hoped, then, that nothing would ever be done to deprive the Home Office of this prerogative. But ought nothing to be done in the way of improvement? He thought that the appeal in criminal cases would not be left dependent entirely on the consent of the Judge who tried the case; because in effect the judgment of the Judge was assailed by the appeal itself. The right of appeal should not be left on its present narrow basis, he would suggest the practice pursued in civil cases in tendering bills of exceptions to the Judge's ruling, or to the reception or rejection of evidence, about the application of which to criminal cases the Judges were divided in opinion, might, by the removal of the doubt, perhaps bring about the desired reform. He thought the whole question might very well be considered by referring the Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he also thought the subject might be beneficially referred to a Select Committee. He could not assent to the argument that the power lodged in the Home Office, in conjunction with the extreme caution of juries, was so efficient, that rarely did an innocent person suffer punishment; for he himself remembered several cases which were exceptions, where persons had been convicted who had afterwards been found to be innocent, and who, had the right existed of appealing to a second jury, would have been able at once to show their innocence. The revision of sentences by the Home Secretary was a very defective mode of dealing with them. The prerogative of mercy he did not desire to see altered, but that was very different from a revision of verdicts by the Home Secretary. The power was most frequently exercised on behalf of criminals who, from their position in society, or from being members of a powerful profession, excited an unusual degree of interest in their cases. This had happened in the instances of Smethurst and Dr. Kirwan. He did not approve of giving the right of appeal in all cases, but in those only where the life of the criminal was forfeited by the verdict, or where he would be subject to penal servitude. Seeing that the feeling of the House was strong against the Bill, as it was strong in favour of the principle which it embodied, it might be desirable that the Bill should be withdrawn; but if the proposer pressed the measure to a division he (Mr. Longfield) would vote for the second reading.

MR. M'MAHON, in reply, said, he was glad that the question had been subjected to so long a discussion. He thought he could show that the Court of Criminal Appeal, to which the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone had expressed a preference, would be an inefficient court for the purpose contemplated by the Bill, inasmuch as its members were ever varying, and it sat only twice in each term. Instead of the best it was the worst possible court to appeal to. The practice of Russia, of Greece, and of Belgium had been appealed to by those who opposed this measure; but, countries deriving their constitution and laws from ourselves, and making extensions on their principles, were the proper subjects of comparison for us; and in Wharton's American Criminal Law, quoted in Kent's Commentaries, to be found in the library of the House, it was distinctly laid down that appeals in criminal cases were allowable, and ten distinct classes of cases were enumerated in which the appeal would lie. The opinions of the Judges in these matters were not infallible guides; they were at all times opposed to any reform of the law; if their recommendations had been acted upon, our pleadings must be in Latin up to this day. The late Lord Ellenborough opposed the abolition of the punishment of death for stealing to the amount of 5s. in a "shop" remarking that, this agreed to, the next step would be to cease hanging for stealing 5s. from a "dwelling-house," and then we should not know whether we were standing on our heads or our heels. The legal authorities cited by the Home Secretary were not Judges who had had much practice or experience in criminal courts. But, as the House had fully discussed the subject, nothing would be gained by answering in detail the objections that had been made to the measure; even on the part of those who opposed it, there seemed a general agreement that some alteration was required; but inasmuch as the details of the Bill were not approved, he would not press his Motion. At the same time, however, he was certain that no better or more carefully drawn Bill than this would ever be prepared by any one or by all of the hon. and learned Gentlemen who had objected to this; and that if an appeal were ever to be allowed, the mode of procedure must be framed on the model of this measure.

QUALIFICATION FOR OFFICES ABOLITION BILL.

SECOND READING.—DEBATE ADJOURNED.

FIRST NIGHT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. HADFIELD said, that as he understood there was no objection to the second reading of this Bill, he would not ask the House to go into a discussion of this Bill at that hour; he proposed, therefore, that it be read a second time, only to fix the Committee for the 29th of February, and to take the discussion on that day.

LORD LOVAINE said, that many hon. Members on his side of the House had strong objections to the measure that cancelled some of the provisions of the Test and Corporation Act, and was an invasion on a great measure. The House ought not to be called on to assent to such a Bill at the close of a long debate on another subject.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS, if the House wished it, would not object to the postponement of the discussion: but he believed that the measure was not of the importance with which it seemed it had been regarded. It was true that the Bill proposed to interfere with the settlement of so important a measure introduced by the noble Lord who now represented the City of London, relative to the Test and Corporation Acts. When the Bill for settling the great question of the Test and Corporation Acts was before the House, the declaration now proposed to be repealed was suggested on the part of the then Government as the condition on which they would accede to that measure. Regarded, therefore, in the nature of a compact between the different parties in the State and as a security for the Established Church, he admitted that the view taken by the noble Lord opposite was a sound and correct view. But the question, nevertheless, arose whether the declaration had any really substantial effect, and was any security for the Established Church; or rather, whether it was not to some extent capricious and vexatious in its operation? The declaration—which was, in substance, a pledge taken by persons holding offices, never upon the true faith of Christians to exercise any power or authority which the situation which they held might confer upon them to injure or weaken the Protestant Church, as by law established—had to be subscribed before magistrates by persons filling municipal offices and all offices under the Crown, the holders of which had previously been in the habit of taking the Sacrament as a qualification. He could not say how many officers were included in the Act; but his impression was, that the great majority of the officers under the Crown were included in it. As a matter of fact, the declaration was not made by the great majority of persons holding office under the Crown, and the omission was cured by the annual Indemnity Act. On the other hand, with regard to municipal officers, it had been held that it was competent for the town council or other municipal body to require persons to make the declaration before taking office; and in these cases persons might be subjected to disqualification, and the Indemnity Act did not apply. The question, therefore, was, if by an Indemnity Act they virtually repealed the law with respect to a large class of officers, was it worth while to maintain it with respect to another class of officers with regard to whom it did not operate for the protection of the Established Church, and when enforced was enforced capriciously and vexatiously. Upon these considerations, he was prepared to give his vote in favour of the second reading of the Bill.

MR. NEWDEGATE was of opinion, that the measure would have the effect of destroying the analogy which at present subsisted between the Members of this House and the members of municipal bodies; but the question was of too important a nature to be disposed of within the half hour before the adjournment of the House.

MR. HADFIELD said, that if the hon. Gentleman persisted in his Motion, he had no alternative but to consent to the adjournment. He would, therefore, name Wednesday, the 29th instant, for the resumption of the debate.

Debate adjourned till Wednesday 29th February.

EXPLANATION.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he wished to set right a mistake which had gone abroad, that the measure proceeded on the same principle as that of his learned Friend Sir Hugh Cairns. He stated a few nights ago

PRIVATE BILLS.—RESOLUTIONS.

On the Motion of Lord REDESDALE it was Ordered,

That this House will not receive any Petition for a Private Bill after Tuesday the 20th Day of March next, unless such Private Bill shall have been approved by the Court of Chancery; nor any Petition for a Private Bill approved by the Court of Chancery after Tuesday, the 15th Day of May next.

Ordered,

That this House will not receive any Report from the Judges, upon Petitions presented to this House for Private Bills, after Tuesday, the 15th Day of May next.

Ordered,

That the said Orders be printed and published, and affixed on the Doors of this House and Westminster Hall.

Resolved,

That no Bill originating in this House, and included in either of the Two Classes of Private Bills in Standing Order No. 178, be read a Second Time after Tuesday, the 21st Day of February, except with special Leave of the House.

LAW OF PROPERTY BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee, read.

LORD ST. LEONARDS in moving "That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill," explained the provisions of the Bill, which he said was intended to remedy certain defects in the law, which in consequence of alterations which had been introduced by the House of Commons into his Bill of last year, had failed of its intended effect in some important particulars. His Lordship spoke in so low a tone that the details of this purely technical subject could not be followed.

LORD BROUGHAM thought their Lordships must be of opinion, as he was sure the profession at large would be, that they were under great obligations to his noble and learned Friend for devoting, as he did, his leisure and retirement to the amendment of the law. This very important Bill, he believed, had not come before their Lordships for the first time.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR entirely agreed with the Bill of his noble and learned Friend, and he thought their Lordships and the public were deeply indebted to his noble Friend for his perseverance. He felt there would be but little danger of the present measure being rejected by the House of Commons, although he was sorry to say, with all his respect for that House, that he thought it was not in advance with regard to legal reform, and that upon many occasions most useful measures, which had been sent down by their Lordships, had been thrown out by it.

HONG KONG.—MR. CHISHOLM ANSTEY. QUESTION.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he is prepared to lay upon the Table of the House the papers for which an Address was moved last Session, with reference to certain charges made by Mr. Chisholm Anstey, Attorney General of Hong Kong, against certain Officials there; and also with reference to the suspension of Mr. Anstey in his office of Attorney General.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the papers were ready; and he trusted that the hon. and learned Gentleman would renew the Motion he made last Session. The papers would then be produced in a few days.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE. QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the transactions relating to the Duchy of Savoy are so peculiar in their character that perhaps the noble Lord will permit me to ask, Whether he has yet determined upon the propriety of producing the communications between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of France, respecting the contemplated annexation of that duchy to the French Empire?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I have considered that subject, and have communicated with Her Majesty's Ambassador in Paris, and I have come to the conclusion that it would not be proper to produce the papers for which the right hon. Gentleman asked the other day. I am quite willing, however, to state the general purport of those papers. In the beginning of July, in consequence of a despatch from Mr. Harris, the British Minister in Switzerland, Count Walewski was asked by Earl Cowley whether there was any truth in the rumour that there was a project on foot for the annexation of Savoy to the Empire of France? Some conversation passed between them, but Count Walewski's remarks were not explicit on the subjection which Earl Cowley asked for information. Some time after this Count Walewski assured the noble Earl that there was no intention on the part of the Emperor of the French to propose the annexation in question. On the former occasion Earl Cowley stated that such a proposal would be viewed with disapprobation by Her Majesty's Government, and the language he held was approved by Her Majesty's Government. On the second occasion Her Majesty's Government directed a despatch to the British Ambassador in Paris, expressing the satisfaction with which Her Majesty's Government had received the assurance that no such project was in contemplation.

MISCELLANEOUS CIVIL SERVICE EXPENDITURE, &c.

ANNUAL SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. WISE, pursuant to notice, rose to move that, in the opinion of the House, it would be desirable to appoint every year a Select Committee to inquire into the Miscellaneous Civil Service Expenditure of the preceding year; into the payments made out of the Consolidated Fund; and into those on account of the Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues. The hon. Member said he hoped hon. Members would not consider it waste of their time to give a little attention to the subject of his Motion. Whether they looked to the past expenditure of the country or to the fact that £55,000,000 were now required for the debt and defences of the country, the necessity for a stringent inquiry into the expenditure was apparent. It had been often proposed that the Estimates for the year should be referred to a Select Committee; but that he had always opposed, for he could not help regarding the scheme as a device to cast off from the Executive Government the duties and responsibilities which properly belonged to their office. But the proposal he now made was of an entirely different character. The desirableness of assisting the Treasury to exercise a further check and control over the national expenditure, and of assisting the House to come to some just conclusion on the matter, and to enable them to exercise a beneficial influence over the expenditure of the money they had to vote, could not be denied. He should be satisfied if the House would adopt the principle of his Resolution; but at present the Civil Service Estimates, as they came before hon. Members, were a snare to them. With the exception of the Army and Navy, and the Estimates for the British Museum, with one or two others, it was impossible for the House to come to a just conclusion upon them. He was therefore disposed to believe, without any want of confidence in the Government of the day, whoever they might happen to be, that an annual review by a Committee of the House of the expenditure and revenue of the Woods and Forests Department, of the charges on the Consolidated Fund, and of the miscellaneous expenses in connection with the Civil Service, would be attended with a considerable reduction in the amount of outlay. He was convinced he only echoed the general opinion of the country when he said that the Miscellaneous Estimates were increasing with excessive and alarming rapidity. Independent of the ordinary sources of expenditure, there were many secret drains upon the public funds, so mysterious and complicated that they seemed almost to evade the control of the Treasury, as they certainly defied the investigation of the House. The people of this country placed large sums of money in the hands of the Government with cheerful

listen to the questions which were always being addressed to them by their constituents as to what was done with all the money voted every year, and prove themselves really and truly the guardians of the public purse, by demanding a proper system of inquiry into the annual expenditure of the country. It was the practice of the occupants of the Treasury bench to declare that they were not responsible for the amount of expenditure, and that it was forced upon them by the House of Commons. Were hon. Members willing to accept that declaration and the responsibility which it devolved upon them? Were they prepared to admit that no inspection of expenditure was required, and that no reduction in its amount could be effected? He believed most hon. Members were agreed that the Civil Service Estimates were too large, that many of the charges upon the Consolidated Fund ought to be otherwise provided for, and that the Lands and Forests revenue fell below what it might be made by proper management. He was satisfied that the examination of a Committee would lead to the saving of thousands, if not millions of money, without any injury to the strength or efficiency of the public service. He wished to call the attention of the House to an important Parliamentary paper which had been issued, giving an account of the increase in the Civil Service Estimates for the last twenty or twenty-five years. In the year 1839 the total amount of these Estimates was £2,651,000, while last year they came to £7,880,000. In 1817, when we were at peace, they were only £1,480,000, and before the Reform Bill, in 1830, £1,872,000. The average for the ten years ending 1827 was £2,115,000; for the ten years ending 1837, £2,269,000; for the ten years ending 1847, £3,016,000; and for the last ten years, £5,710,000. The expenditure for the twenty years ending 1839 was £43,226,000; and for the twenty years ending 1859, £94,955,000. It was instructive to compare the totals of each class of expenditure in 1839 and 1859:—Public buildings, parks, &c., 1839, £197,000; 1859, £793,000. Salaries and expenses of public departments, 1839, £723,000; 1859, £1,413,000. Law and justice, 1839, £666,000; 1859, £2,544,000. Education, science, and art, 1839, £175,000; 1859, £1,328,000. Colonial and consular, 1839, £339,000; 1859, £428,000. Superannuation and allowances, 1839, £200,000; 1859,

£242,000. Miscellaneous, 1839, £217,000; 1859, £985,000. It was stated that the Houses of Parliament, new and temporary, had cost the country no less than £2,716,000; and yet if any hon. Member would take the trouble, as he had done, to walk round the building, he would find that the stone was already in a state of decay, that numerous fissures were apparent, and numerous experiments going on to arrest the cracks. Buckingham Palace, he was sorry to say, was in much the same condition. But they had only to look at St. Paul's, Somerset House, the Banqueting Hall, or the Horse Guards to see that their ancestors did not make such errors as we did in the selection of stone. If there had been a Finance Committee appointed regularly every year he was sure that this matter would have been minutely and carefully inquired into, and no doubt some of the enormous expenditure might have been saved, or, at least, laid out to better purpose. The grants for harbours of refuge were considerable, no doubt; but the country did not grudge it, they wished to be a great maritime people, and they were willing to pay the cost; and all that was asked was that the money should be economically spent, and that value should be got for the money. He found that as much as £26,000 a year was spent in hiring departmental offices, and he could not help thinking that a miserable and wasteful plan of carrying on the government of a great country like this. Surely they might find a national building for the National Debt Office, which was to be regarded as a national institution if any was. A great many buildings were also rented for the use of Commissions; and he might mention, by the way, that since 1830 no less than £831,171 had been spent in Commissions. During the last twenty years the furniture in the public departments had cost £450,000. He freely admitted that the gentlemen connected with the Treasury and the offices of the Secretaries of State were generally not extravagantly provided for in that respect. He believed that in those departments the duties were very efficiently discharged. But still, taking the expenditure in the whole of the public departments together, it would be found that it was exactly doubled. This increase of expenditure did not arise—he was happy to say—in the charges for the two Houses of Parliament, which were in 1852, £89,000 and last year £80,000. As far as the House of Commons was concerned, the whole expenditure was £52,000, of which £41,000 was supplied by fees. Probably in no public office in the metropolis, were economy and efficiency so combined, and all who had had experience of the House of Commons and its officers knew that the latter had always discharged their duties with an efficiency and a courtesy which deserved general thanks. Between 1839 and 1859 they had spent £6,000,000 in printing and stationery. In 1856, the item was £458,000, but he was happy to see that last year it was reduced to £337,000. He should be very sorry to curtail the printing of useful documents, but he thought the printing should be limited to papers of that kind. The stationery and official postage items were both very much abused. Gentlemen connected with the Science and Art Department, for which the charge was £93,000 a year—did not study economy in those respects. He received from time to time from that department, in common, he supposed, with every Peer and Member of Parliament, bushels of papers, which went into their housemaids' baskets. He had recently received one, rather more than usually attractive. It was in a huge official envelope, bearing on the outside, "Henry Cole, Science and Art Department, South Kensington—On Her Majesty's Service," and consisted of an almanac printed on a large sheet of paper. This almanac was sent him at the public expense; but he did not wish to obtain that publication in that way—he could afford to pay for his own almanac, and really he thought the Treasury ought to check this sort of nonsense. The next item to which he wished to direct attention was the Secret Service money; they imagined that they could not do without Secret Services, but under that head there had been an expenditure during twenty years of £954,600, and he very much doubted whether the secret information which had been obtained was worth the money. Then he found that of late years there had been a very great increase of salaries. When any complaint was made of increase of salaries they were generally told that a great number of salaries were paid in lieu of fees. In 1854 the fees amounted to £138,000; last year they had dwindled down to £111,000, and of that sum the House of Commons' fees supplied £41,000; so that the fees did not amount to any very large sum, and could not contribute as largely to salaries as was represented. He had a great respect for both Law and Justice, but he thought the expenditure under that head, which had enormously increased, required revision. The item was £2,500,000 with the addition of £718,000 charged on the Consolidated Fund. He did not say that the charge on the Consolidated Fund was improper, because the Judges ought to be provided for in that permanent form. Into the important item of Education, Science, and Art, there was a Commission inquiring at the present time, but he was anxious to call attention to the fact that the expenditure under that head had increased from £175,000, in 1839, to £1,328,000 in 1859. He hoped the country was receiving an equivalent for that expenditure. They voted last year £230,000 for pupil teachers, and his experience taught him that the pupil teacher system was becoming a failure; that they married very early, if they were attractive young women, or went out as governesses; and that in one way or the other they left the service of the educational staff, so that they lost the services of these pupil teachers as soon as they had completed their gratuitous education. The Inspectors of schools cost £61,000 or £62,000 a year, and yet he feared that we had a very imperfect system of education. The next item was the Consular and Colonial expenditure. He was pleased to think that the Committee which sat on the Consular system two or three years ago had not been without its effect, and he sincerely trusted that Her Majesty's Government would carry out the recommendations of that Committee. Her Majesty's late Government entered very warmly into the question, and were, he believed, prepared to adopt measures likely to lead to great and beneficial changes. The Colonial charges were very large indeed, amounting in five years to £22,000,000. Then there were the Superannuation and other items, into the details of which he would not enter, but he begged to call the attention of the House to Class 7. Those Estimates were generally laid on the table at a very late period of the Session, when there was no time for investigation. They were termed temporary charges, but he was sorry to say, after the first appearance of an item in that class, it was generally continued for ever afterwards. One of his great objections to that portion of the public expenditure was that it included large sums for the improvement of the metropolis. With all respect for the metropolitan Members, he objected to the large sums invariably demanded for metropolitan purposes. In counties they built bridges, made public gardens, and discharged at their own expense all the duties which No. 7 of the Estimates did for the metropolis. For instance, they had recently voted for Battersea Park, Chelsea Bridge, and Vauxhall embankment, no less than £525,000. The next portion of his remarks would embrace the second portion of his Resolution. With regard to the Consolidated Fund the items comprised in it were never brought before the House; they were printed in a blue-book at the end of each Session, but something more was required than an inquiry within the four walls of the Treasury. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had, in 1854,, expressed an opinion that there was no point on which the House was more apt to be led into laxity than that of laying on the Consolidated Fund charges which it ought not to bear, the consequence of which was that in some measure they escaped the control of Parliament and were forgotten, and the right hon. Gentleman also said that it would be advisable to establish some means by which the attention of the House would be drawn periodically to these charges. That was exactly the principle which he (Mr. Wise) wished to carry into practical operation. The first item on the Consolidated Fund was £385,000 for the Civil List; and with that he had nothing to do, as it was a fixed charge on the revenue of the country—the only observation he would make with regard to it was to express a hope that Her Majesty would live many years to enjoy it. The present charges on the Consolidated Fund for the Civil List amounted to £1,900,000. The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated in the year 1834, that of this sum there were 34 items which amounted to £970,000; but at this moment it was difficult to say whether any hon. Member would understand them. There were, he believed, 100 or 200 Acts of Parliament relating to them. Then came the Duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster, which cost from £50,000 to £60,000. He was glad to observe that there had been a great improvement lately in the revenues of the Duchies of Lancaster and Cornwall, for a few years ago they used to bring in very little and cost a great deal. In the Duchy of Lancaster there was a Chancellor, a Vice-chancellor, an Attorney General, and fifty other officials; in short, to use Burke's words, "all the apparatus of a kingdom to manage a country gentleman's estate." But if they had no right to inquire into the Civil List they had a full right to inquire into the management of the Lands, Woods and Forests, belonging to the Crown. By an Act passed in the reign of George IV. it appeared that the expenses of collection were the first charge on the revenues, then pensions, and whatever was left went to the State. It was high time that this mode of proceeding was altered, and the Committee on Public Monies was of the same opinion. In their Report they expressed an opinion, "that these charges should be brought under the system of votes for expenditure, just like the charges respecting other branches of the public revenue." But in answer to this Report the Treasury had made a minute to the effect that "My Lords" were of opinion that, considering the peculiar nature of this revenue, it was advisable to postpone any further consideration of this point until a further investigation took place preparatory to a new surrender of the Crown Lands to the public, and a grant of a new Civil List to the Crown. He never could understand the reason of the Treasury for recommending this postponement. Mr. Huskisson, Lord Monteagle, and other public men whose judgment should have great weight, were of opinion that the control of Parliament ought to be exercised over these revenues quite as much as over any other branch of the public revenue. According to a Parliamentary paper lately delivered, the revenue of the Crown Lands, Woods and Forests, from 1816 to 1859 was £13,273,295, and the expenses upwards of £6,000,000. The income for 1858-9 was £446,771, and the sum received by the Consolidated Fund was only £280,040, from which was to be deducted a Vote on Estimate 2, of £23,000, so that it cost £190,231 to get £256,540. In 20 years the total revenues from that source amounted to £6,705,917, out of which was to be taken £2,214,000 for management, and £995,000 for permanent improvements, leaving a net profit to the State of £3,495,000. This was as much as if a country gentleman, with a gross rental of £3,300 had to pay £1,100 for management and £500 for permanent improvements, leaving himself with an income of £1,700. What tenant for life would admire that state of things? Yet it exactly represented the position of the country with reference to the revenue of the Crown lands.

No doubt the gentlemen at the head of the department had effected considerable improvements of late; but there was still a vast amount of unseen and uncontrolled expenditure. Leaving the Lands, and travelling now to the mysterious recesses of the Woods and Forests, it appeared from this paper that the receipts of the Woods and Forests from 1803 to 1859 had been £2,589,183, and the receipts £2,085,304. In 1859 the receipts were £47,181, and the expenses £52,984; in 1858 the receipts were £68,743, and the expenses £58,170; and in 1857 the receipts were £63,811, and the expenses £55,469. In order that it might not be thought that he had selected an exceptional period he would take the four years ending 1852, in which he found that the receipts were £186,000 and the expenses £188,000. In the four years ending 1856 the receipts were £307,000 and the expenses £245,000. For the three years ending 1859 the receipts were £175,000 and the expenses £166,000; making for that period of 11 years a total of receipts of £673,000 and of expenses £600,000. Taking now three of these Crown forests, it appeared that in that of Dean the receipts last year were £11,900 and the expenses £11,300; in the New Forest £16,000 had been received and £11,000 expended; and in Windsor Forest, which from its vicinity to the Castle was exceptionally placed and required additional outlay in salaries, upon labour, and maintenance of deer, &c., the receipts had been £5,000 and the expenses £19,000. When the large establishments and expenses connected with the Woods and Forests were complained of, it was urged that they were absolutely requisite for the management of this extensive property, which amounted nominally, in forests alone, to 103,000 acres; but he believed it was the fact that they had not a really beneficial interest in more than 30,000 acres. A few years ago the Treasury directed three gentlemen of eminence to visit these portions of the Crown property, and they proceeded during their term of inspection to Delamere forest, which he would take as an example of the injudicious mode of treatment that had sometimes been adopted. The Commissioners reported that the 4,000 acres of which the forest was composed "was in every respect unsuited to the growth of oak, and that such a crop ought never to have been planted upon it; the trees had been planted in such places and of such sizes as to preclude all chance of their success; that considerable loss had been sustained by an unskilful mode of cutting down trees; that a very large amount in value of thriving larch trees, admirably suited to the soil in which they were growing and approaching rapidly to good timber, had been displaced to give room for stunted thriftless oaks, which were of no present value and never could attain any." He desired in an especial manner to direct the attention of the Secretary to the Treasury to the arrears which were permitted to occur in the rent accounts which were made up to April in every year. In 1857 the arrears which were thus permitted to remain due amounted to £220,241; in 1858 to £206,680; and in 1859 to £202,248. The Treasury certainly ought to have the power of checking this system, which seemed, at all events, to have existed for three years, and which must be attended with very injurious effects, as it permitted so large a sum as £200,000 to remain in the hands of the country agents and stewards charged with the collection of the revenues of the Crown. Another subject highly deserving of consideration was the manner in which the capital account was made up; for if there was one paper more unsatisfactory and mysterious than another of those laid on the table of the House it was the capital account of the Estates and revenues of the Crown. Within the last thirty or forty years Crown property to the value of £2,409,203 had been sold, and this system of constant sales and re-investments was attended with inconvenience and enormous expense. Last year an amount of no less than £13,037 was paid for legal expenses and plans incidental to these sales of Crown lands; and though it might be extremely desirable to consolidate this property, which was scattered through almost every county in England, and so to get rid of a large army of receivers, surveyors, stewards, and agents, he thought the improvement might be more judiciously effected than by this perpetual system of buying and selling, adding to the expenses and diminishing the revenues. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had, a few years ago, taken the wise and judicious course of removing a great number of charges from the Consolidated Fund to the Estimates for the year; and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman, whom he believed to be at heart a sincere financial Reformer, would persevere in the same

beneficial direction. There were a number of changes which, in his opinion, might with great advantage be removed from the Consolidated Fund to the yearly Estimates, where they would be exposed to the consideration and criticism of the House. Among these he placed the charge for the Lunacy Commission of £12,500; that for the Audit-office of £6,300, which was in addition to the sum of £32,466, appearing on the Estimates for the expenses of that office. Then there was the sum of £10,000 for secret service money, in addition to the £32,000 in the Estimates; and this item he should like to abolish altogether, believing that it was opposed to the openness of the English character, and that the country had never derived any substantial benefit from such expenditure. The sums of £10,000 for the government of the Isle of Man; £17,000 for the augmentation of stipends to the Scotch clergy; and £20,300 to the West India clergy might in like manner be transferred advantageously to the Estimates. The salary of £20,000 to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland ought, perhaps, to be retained on the Consolidated Fund as long as the office itself was maintained; but it should be remembered that in addition to this £20,000 there were further payments on foot of Castle expenses to the amount of £4,378, and to the Household of £6,431 yearly. The allowance of £2,769 to the in-coming Lord-Lieutenant for his outfit was classed under the head of Contingencies, but the House would bear in mind that within a comparatively few years there had been eight Viceroys appointed. The allowance of £2,000 a year to the High Commissioner of the General Assembly of Scotland, and of £2,000 to the itinerant preachers, he should also like to remove; and last, and not least, he was particularly desirous that the £180,000 paid for diplomatic services should be brought into the Estimates. A Resolution which he proposed last Session was rejected by a majority of twenty-eight in a House of 256 Members, but he still hoped that Parliament would see the advisability of exercising a control over the expenditure in that department. The diplomatic service cost the country last year £268,898, and the consular service £252,796, making a total of £521,694. Besides this charge on the Consolidated Fund, he found that in the last eleven years there had been expended on the same account — miscellaneous, £248,000; special missions, £133,000; Embassy-house, £253,000; chapels, £96,500; rent and outfit, £108,000, and £70,000. So that, if some supervision were not exercised over these sums, they would go on increasing until in a few years the cost of these united diplomatic services would amount to millions, instead of thousands. He had given a plain unvarnished tale, with the object of inducing the House to adopt some measures that might more effectually check this stream of expenditure, which received but a very inadequate consideration, when the period of late sittings and hot nights came on, and when Members were tired and the House was impatient to enter on other business. The only conclusion at which he had been able to arrive was, that the people of England had too much money. Southey had said that a Government never could be too rich, but that the same observation did not apply to the people who were governed. To impose taxation was easy, and to disburse it was agreeable; but the payment of taxes, except in cases of great national emergency, was a process that was always painful and disagreeable. A rigid reform in the expenditure might be very annoying to many of those persons who represented ignorant incapacity and distinguished destitution; but to the people of England a more rigid economy would be very acceptable. Before placing any new burdens on the public, the House ought to inquire whether the money it had already granted was properly expended. There was no wish to diminish the efficiency of the national service, or refuse anything that would be for the national advantage. All that was asked was, that the public money should not be wasted, that the revenue should really be used for the public benefit, and the little interests of little men should not be allowed to interfere with the great interests of a great country. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Resolution.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he rose to second the Resolution, but after the able manner in which the subject had been introduced, he would only allude to one or two points. Some said the Government was to blame for the excessive expenditure, others blamed the House; but he feared that the enormous increase in the Estimates of late years could not be ascribed to the Government or the House of Commons alone, but that Parliament, the Government, and the public were all more or less involved in the blame. So many parties were interested in a large expenditure that the public had become apathetic, and this was among the influences at work which had induced the House to relax its scrutiny of the Estimates. It had been said that only the upper classes were interested in this expenditure. But on examination it would be found that the amount of the expenditure by which this particular class was benefited was really very small. The middle class had a very large share in the advantage of this expenditure, and so had the class of mechanics and workmen, the largest recipients of all, though out of the 63,000,000 of revenue collected, it was impossible to say that that class contributed more than 20,000,000, and that only indirectly. There was a combination of the influence of all classes to urge on an increase of the expenditure. Gentlemen who had attended the discussions on the Estimates must have observed how frequently those discussions turned, not upon the extravagant expenditure, but upon there not being enough spent in different departments. Some hon. Gentlemen took up the case of the officers employed in the administration of the Poor Law, others that of the mechanics in the different dockyards, or the officers of the Customs' Department. From both sides of the House they heard arguments why there should be an increase in the expenditure for the benefit of particular parties. Another principle also operated in the same direction. The Executive of the day, in order to carry out certain views of local government, would place on the Consolidated Fund certain sums as charges in relief of local expenditure. The House sanctioned the practice, and the central Government gained greater control in a certain department of administration. But the result to the country was that the expenditure was raised to more than it would have been had it been borne either by the general or the local government alone. It was simply burning the candle at both ends. The education grant, large as it was, had in a great measure been swollen in that way. Then sums had been granted in aid of county rates—for prisons, county police, the medical poor law staff, and a variety of establishments of that sort. By the Act of 14 & 15 Vict. the office of Woods and Forests had been divided into two—the office of Public Works and that of Woods and Forests. The result was that each office cost nearly as much as one did before. The cost of the old office was £28,000 a year; that of the Woods and Forests was now £23,000, and that of Public Works £26,570. There were two accounts kept at the Woods and Forests—the capital account and the income account—and many items appeared in one which did not properly belong to it, and ought to appear in the other. He looked upon the notion of the Crown at any future time reclaiming these lands as a mere myth. It would be a most dangerous proceeding; it would altogether alter the relations between the monarch and the people were the Sovereign to depend for his revenue upon any income arising from estates, and not voted by Parliament. The arrangement was a mere matter of form, but that form was a wholesome reminder of what was due from Parliament to the Sovereign, and also of what was due from the Sovereign, by showing that the maintenance of the Crown came from the same source as the Crown itself. He objected to the items of expenditure for the improvement of the Crown property, as, on the settlement of a future civil list, those would be used against the country. It should be understood, if there was any intention of retaining the estates, that no more expense should be incurred merely to increase the value of the property. He could describe it as nothing more nor less than a fraud upon the people. Knowing how impossible it was to get the Estimates fairly passed, and that it was only by going before such a Committee as his hon. Friend proposed that the results of this expenditure, and the grounds of them, and the reason why they should be discontinued, could be properly analyzed, he felt that no better plan could be devised than that which his hon. Friend suggested. He therefore cordially seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed:—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it would be desirable to appoint every year a Select Committee to inquire into the Miscellaneous Civil Service Expenditure of the preceding year; into the payments made out of the Consolidated Fund; and into those on account of the Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues.”

MR. LAING observed, the House was very much indebted to the hon. Member who had made the present Motion, for having brought under its notice a subject of great importance, and one which excited out of doors a considerable amount of public interest. The expenditure on the civil service was not very well understood, and a very general impression seemed to prevail throughout the country that it had gone on of late years increasing to a very alarming extent, and that, too, notwithstanding it was supposed to be in a great degree under the control of the House of Commons, and, not like the expenditure for military and naval purposes, influenced by circumstances which might render a large outlay unavoidable. It was, therefore, that the civil service expenditure was regarded as affording the best test of the economy of Parliament, and it was for that reason, among others, that he held the opinion that if the specific Motion before the House—that of a Standing Committee to examine the expenditure of the preceding year—should be deemed to be well adapted to secure the end for which it had been brought forward, and which every hon. Member must be anxious to attain, it should be at once acceded to. It was quite clear, at all events, that, so far as the convenience of the Government, and especially of the Gentleman holding the office he had the honour to fill, was concerned, the appointment of the proposed Committee would be most acceptable, as relieving them from a very heavy responsibility; but as responsibility could not be thrown to any degree upon one of two bodies without pro tanto relieving the other from its pressure, it was a point well worthy of consideration whether the accomplishment of such a result would in itself be expedient. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Wise) had, it was true, contended that the objection which he had just pointed out might, in a great measure, be removed by submitting to the notice of the Committee, not the Estimates of the ensuing, but those of the past financial year; but as nearly four-fifths of the expenditure of one year were made up of sums which reappeared in the Estimates for the next, it was quite clear that the Committee, in sanctioning those items, would, to a very considerable extent, remove from the shoulders of the Government any responsibility which might attach to their re-insertion, and would furnish the Minister with a satisfactory answer to any such inconvenient questions which might be addressed to him by the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams) as to the largeness of the amount which the House might be asked to re-vote under any particular head. Be that, however, as it might, he felt it to be his duty to lay before the House the real state of the Civil Service Estimates, in order that hon. Members might be in a position to judge upon whose shoulders it was most desirable that responsibility with respect to them should be permitted to rest. He should not, in endeavouring to effect that object, go further back than the financial year 1852-3, or just previous to the period, when a large amount had been transferred from the Consolidated Fund to the Estimates, inasmuch as any calculations based upon their previous amount would, because of that change, be completely illusory. As an instance, the hon. Gentleman who had brought the question under the notice of the House had referred to the greatly increased expenditure in connection with the public offices last year as compared with the year 1846; but it was important, in dealing with that subject, to bear in mind that the increase was to be accounted for by the transfer from the Consolidated Fund to the Estimates to which he (Mr. Laing) had already alluded; the fact being that, instead of there being any increase, there was in many instances a slight diminution in the salaries of officers employed in our public departments. But, to proceed to the statement of the civil service expenditure, taking the financial year 1852-3 as a starting-point, he found that in that year the sum voted under that head was £4,407,000, while in 1859 it was £7,840,000, thus showing, in the expenditure in the latter over the former year, what at first sight appeared to be an actual increase of £3,433,000. It must be borne in mind, however, that of that amount £1,500,000 must be laid to the account of the transfer which in 1853—[An hon. MEMBER: 1854]—had been made to the Estimates from the Consolidated Fund. That being so, hon. Members could not fail to perceive that, for the purpose of fair comparison, they must deduct that sum of £1,500,000, which would leave the real increase of expenditure for the whole of the civil service, as between the two years which he had mentioned, somewhere about £1,900,000. And how, let him ask, was that amount made up? Chiefly of items which were the result of legislation for which Parliament itself was responsible. Now, the first great item of increase during the seven years ending in 1859, which he should mention, was that under the head of education, science, and art, in which there was an increase of £860,000; the next was that which came under the head of law, justice, police, prisons, convicts, &c., in which the increase for the same period had been £550,000; that under the head of harbours being

£150,000; of public buildings, parks, &c. £150,000; of stationery, postage, telegraphs, &c., £100,000; making altogether a total increase of rather more than £1,800,000. There were, however, in addition other charges made in the Civil Service Estimates last year, which were in reality connected with naval and military objects, as, for instance, a sum of £130,000, which had been voted for the purpose of laying down a telegraph to Gibraltar, to enable us to communicate with that fortress and also with our fleet in the Mediterranean; and a sum of £60,000 in connection with the exchange upon remittances to troops in China, which, together with some smaller amounts, made up a sum of £200,000. This added to the £1,800,000 he had before enumerated amounted to £2,000,000, the total increase for the seven years ending in 1858 being, as he had said before, about £1,900,000. Thus upon a limited number of items he had accounted for the whole of the increase during that period. With respect to the expenditure which was incurred for the public departments he thought it desirable to make a few remarks with the view of removing from the public mind the erroneous impression that money was lavishly laid out in connection with them in order to increase patronage, especially for the benefit of the upper classes of society. Now, if such were the case—which it was not—the charge would apply to the expenditure for the Treasury, the Colonial Department, and the other great public offices, inasmuch as clerkships in those departments were much sought after by young men of good family but scanty means. He, however, found that while the total expenditure for the Treasury was, in 1852, £54,400, it was in 1859 not more than £54,600; while in the case of the Colonial Office the expenditure, which in the former year was £38,815, was in the latter not more than £30,978. The only public office, in fact, in connection with which there had been any materially increased outlay in 1859, as compared with 1852, was the Foreign Office, and the increase in that instance was to be accounted for by the multiplication of telegrams and special messengers, caused by the increased activity of the diplomatic service of late years. In the case of the Poor Law Office there had been an actual decrease in the expenditure in 1859 as compared with 1852, the sum voted for it having been in the latter year £95,000, while in the former it had been only £59,800. Taking the Civil Service Estimates generally, indeed, he found that, while there was a great increase in that expenditure which might be said to come more especially under Parliamentary control, a very considerable regard to administrative economy was observable in the management of the public offices. There were, for example, a great many items in the Civil Service Estimates over which the Government could hardly be said to have any control whatever, as, for instance, in those cases in which new establishments were brought into existence owing to a Vote of the House of Commons, with a fixed scale of expenditure attached to their maintenance. His remark applied especially to the department of law and justice. That House had seen fit to extend the advantages of cheap justice to the country by establishing the County Courts ; but that had not been done without considerable expense to the country. When such a system was once set going they could not disorganize it by arbitrary reductions ; there was, therefore, but little control over such matters in the hands of the Government. He was afraid that in matters of expenditure a Committee would not be quite so satisfactory as the hon. Gentleman supposed ; and he could not give a better instance of what was likely to occur than that which happened in the case of a Committee over which the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Wise), presided—namely, the Committee on our Consular Establishments. The recommendations of that Committee were of great value, and led to great improvements in our consular system ; but, in so far as economy was concerned, the result would have been an increased expenditure of £40,000 or £50,000 a year had the Government, in revising the consular system, and carrying out the principles of the Committee, not been able to do so in a less expensive way. But by employing commercial consuls in the less important stations they would, he hoped, be able to carry out the recommendations of the Committee at the more important places, without any national increase of cost. He referred to that as affording the House a proof of the difference that existed between the action of a Committee and a Government. Indeed, he could hardly recollect an instance in which a Committee had sat to investigate any matters involving expenditure—such as harbours of refuge, designs for the Foreign Office, or other public works—in which the result of their labours, however beneficial to the public, had not been opposed to the interests of economy. Another objection to the appointment of this Committee was that all the large items on which the possibility of carrying out an extensive system of economy mainly turned related to subjects of such general interest that the House could hardly be expected to listen to the opinion of any Committee, however respectable, in the event of its recommending a reduction in them. Among these was the Vote for Education, by far the largest and most important to which his hon. Friend had referred. The annual increase that took place in the Vote for Education alone swallowed up over and over again all that could be economized in smaller matters. If they were only to have regard to economy nothing would be easier than to say how the expenditure for education could be cut down ; but, in the case of questions affecting the higher interests of the country generally other considerations had to be attended to. His hon. Friend referred to the Woods and Forests. There, again, a great difficulty—and that a constitutional one—stood in the way of such an inquiry as he suggested. If the Government or the country were absolute owners of the whole of the Crown property there might be no difficulty in saying what were best to be done. Probably it would be to convert the whole of their landed property into money, and invest it in securities, where no staff of officials or foresters would be required to guard it, because a large landed property scattered all over the kingdom, including a great amount of waste land, was just that sort of property that required all the supervision and economy of a private individual owner to manage it well. They all knew how the estates of joint-stock companies were ordinarily managed, and it was very probable that the State could not manage such matters better than a joint-stock company would do. But, then, there was the constitutional difficulty that the property belonged to the Crown, that we were not the real owners of it, and were not in a position to dispose of it. We had only made a bargain with the Crown, by which we agreed to manage it during the life of the Sovereign, and they could not with a due regard to constitutional considerations, sell that of which we only had the temporary usufruct. The management of the Woods and Forests had, however, been under the consideration of Committees of that House from time to time. Some years ago a Committee, presided over by Lord Duncan, took great interest in the subject, and many improvements were the result of its investigations. It was admitted that the department was much better managed now than formerly, and the gentlemen at the head of it, Mr. Gore and Mr. Howard, were exceedingly assiduous and attentive to their duties. He knew that they were anything but extravagantly disposed, and during the short time he had been in office he was able to say that they had endeavoured to manage the property in the best possible manner. He would say, in such circumstances, let the House watch the results, and if in course of time they were not satisfied, then let a Committee be appointed to discover abuses and infuse fresh vigour into the department. He believed the appointment of a Standing Committee would be open to the objection that it would relieve parties from responsibility to whom they ought to look for the right discharge of their duties; and he could not see that, with a responsibility resting partly on a Committee and partly on the Treasury and Woods and Forests, the system would work well. There only remained the question regarding the Consolidated Fund, and there also a difficulty arose on a point of political principle. The charges on the Consolidated Fund were those that, for certain reasons, they did not wish to subject to the fluctuating chances of an annual Vote of the House of Commons. Among these were the charges for the administration of law and justice, certain ecclesiastical and theological payments, and the grant to Maynooth, which were paid out of the Consolidated Fund to avoid exciting questions being raised in that House. In considering the appointment of a Committee to deal with these matters with a view to economy, the House should bear in mind that, on the question of transferring Votes of this kind to the Estimates, there was something to be said on the other side. Instead of leading to economy it was just as likely that there would be a pressure on them to increase the Votes, so that they might in reality have to pay larger sums than when the charges came out of the Consolidated Fund. He attached much force to this objection when he considered the increase that had been made in items which were annually open to revision. He had thus adverted, as shortly as he could, to the reasons which induced him, while agreeing in the object proposed by his hon. Friend, to doubt whether such a Committee as he had suggested was the best mode of attaining it. In doing so he had been obliged to point out that the abuses complained of arose very much from causes beyond the control of the administrative department; but before sitting down he was anxious to guard against being understood as meaning that every thing had been done that ought to be done to carry out economy in the public expenditure. If the Government were supported by public opinion and by that House in enforcing economical views, a good deal might yet be done,—he would not say to return to the Estimates of former years, but certainly to arrest that increase, which, if it went on as at present, would in a very short time be formidable indeed. Government really could not do much unless they were supported by the opinion of the country. If public opinion, as reflected by that House, was constantly urging a more liberal expenditure for objects of admitted utility, which, though, perhaps, separately forming but small items in the Estimates, yet made up a considerable aggregate, the Government could not long oppose a very effectual resistance. But if, on the other hand, they were supported by the House, there were some questions on which a good deal might be done. The question of education, to which his hon. Friend had referred, was one on which he did not say considerations of economy were paramount; but still he thought, if these were admitted to have due weight, a good deal might be done. Again, if every hon. Gentleman in that House who had a taste for architecture took every opportunity of enforcing it according to his own notions, with a total disregard of expense, a very large expenditure must be incurred, seeing the necessity there was for the erection of many public buildings. The same thing might be said in regard to harbours of refuge, in respect to which there had been a constant pressure from all parts of the country on the Government for the expenditure of a large sum of money; but if supported, as he trusted they would be, by public opinion and the House enforcing economy in these matters, he did hope the case was not altogether desperate. He could assure his hon. Friend and the House that the attention of the Government during the recess had been most earnestly devoted to this subject. He might say there was not a Vote in the Estimates for past years which he himself had not gone through carefully, anxious to make reductions. He could not venture to promise that the result of these reductions would be a very great diminution in matters which had gone far beyond control ; but he did venture to hope that when the Estimates were produced it would be seen their exertions on the side of economy had not been altogether useless. He thought the best course the House could take was to leave the whole responsibility for the present on the Government, watching their progress very closely, scrutinizing very jealously every subject of expenditure in the Estimates, and if, after giving them a fair trial, they were not satisfied with the results, let them come down on them with a Committee, not a standing or annual Committee under which the Government might shelter themselves, but a Committee which would be a reality, and would bring home to the Government a sense of their responsibility.

MR. BAXTER said, that he agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, that both the House and the country were exceedingly indebted to his hon. Friend for bringing this important question before them at so early a period of the Session. He was rather disappointed with the speech of his hon. Friend the Secretary for the Treasury. It was obvious to every one that something must be done to check the public expenditure, and keep it within reasonable bounds. There was an absolute necessity for economizing the national expenditure. Even Gentlemen who were inclined to be liberal, if not lavish, in voting sums of money for the army and navy, and for the defences of the country, ought most carefully to examine the Civil Service Estimates. The hon. Secretary for the Treasury (Mr. Laing) said it was the duty of every member of that House to scrutinize the Votes as submitted to Parliament, especially those proposed by the Government. Well, ever since he had the honour of a seat in Parliament, for the last five years, he had attended in that House almost every Supply night, and he must say the conviction forced itself on his mind that no great benefit would or ever could result to the cause they all had at heart, of national economy, by debating and dividing upon a few of those small items which formed together our Civil Service Estimates. During the period to which he had referred he believed he was correct in stating, that with three or four exceptions, every vote proposed by the Government had been carried without reduction, although, perhaps, in double that number of instances Votes had been expunged in consequence of there having been a very narrow run the year before ; but this he held to be a very small result ; and without objecting to each great subdivision of Votes, or examining each Vote carefully and seriatim, he did not think much progress would be made, or any great reduction effected until Gentlemen who, like his hon. Friend and himself, thought the expenditure was excessive, took a different course, and adopted such a plan as this at a very early part of the Session, saying to the Government, " We are not prepared to expend £7,500,000 on the civil service ; we think £7,000,000 or £6,500,000 quite sufficient, and we wish you to form your Estimates on that basis." He held, in point of fact, that at present the House had no efficient control over the public expenditure. They ought to throw on the Government the responsibility of bringing forward those Votes which were absolutely necessary, but with some such limit as he had suggested. He was disappointed that the Secretary for the Treasury had not been able to state that the Government had been enabled very much to reduce the civil service expenditure. He had had considerable faith in the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he was in hopes that he would have devoted his great abilities to this subject, and with success ; for he was firmly convinced, not only that a great saving might be effected without difficulty or detriment, but with considerable advantage to the public service. If any one doubted this, let him read the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) upon this subject when last in office, who distinctly admitted that there was a very great profusion in the civil service expenditure. Besides, the expurgation of Votes would save a great deal of the precious time of the House. His hon. Friend objected to this Committee, and there was a good deal of force in his objection to it, being a Standing Committee ; but he had looked in vain for any declaration of what the Government intended to substitute. The House and the country were agreed that the expenditure must be checked, and unless the Government were prepared on their responsibility to tell them that it should be reduced, he was to a considerable extent shut up to support the proposition of his hon. Friend ; and should the result not be satisfactory, then he thought it would be the bounden duty of the House to affirm some such Resolution as he had suggested. It was true that the mind of the country was not at present in a very economical mood, but sure he was the day would come when they would be forced by public opinion out of doors to devote more attention to this subject than they had hitherto done, and it would, without doubt, be one of the first great subjects discussed in the reformed Parliament. He thought they would show themselves exceedingly shortsighted, if, supposing there was no economical disposition on the part of the people, they attempted to blink what, in his mind, was one of the most important questions which could come under the consideration of the Legislature.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: My hon. Friend (Mr. Baxter) has stated that he was not entirely satisfied with the tone and general effect of the speech of my hon. Friend the Secretary for the Treasury. If that be so, it must be because my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury did not wholly succeed in conveying his meaning to the mind of the hon. Gentleman. Nothing could be fairer than what my hon. Friend said. He stated that we have at present to contend with this difficulty—that the mind of the country is not greatly set upon public economy, and that as we live under a popular Government, in which, in the long run, the scale of expenditure is undoubtedly determined by public opinion, we must naturally expect, that when the public feeling is such as my hon. Friend candidly stated, that feeling will be reflected in the tone and sentiment of this House, as likewise in the tone and action of those who compose the Executive. Under these circumstances, the hon. Gentleman, I am sure, would not form excessive anticipations as to any strong and decisive impression being produced by any particular Government on a course of feeling which has become established, habitual—I might almost say inveterate—for some years past. We have been tending in all respects towards a great and rapid increase of expense, and it is in the nature of things that the remedies to be applied to such a state of affairs should be feeble in their origin, and that their first results, at any rate, should be moderate in extent. It is vain to hope, unless you have the concurrence of a powerful feeling out of doors, that the efforts of any particular Administration, at any particular moment, will be attended with great results in the reduction in your civil and miscellaneous expenditure. The hon. Gentleman may say—if your power is small, you may, at all events, show that your intentions are good. Well, when we lay our Miscellaneous Estimates on the table and enter on their discussion, I think we shall be able to satisfy the House—I am sure we shall be able to satisfy the hon. Gentleman, than whom no hon. Member is more anxiously bent on economy—that we have given to this question our best attention. But he would find, from the statement of my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, that the great bulk of the increase in those Estimates is due to a very small number of subjects, and that out of that small number there are one or two which it is extremely difficult for the Government to control. I promise my hon. Friend, however, that when we produce our proposals in regard to them, it will be seen that, if little can be done at any given moment by any given Administration, we have yet sincerely endeavoured to examine into the means, both of checking the present rapid increase, and, where possible, of introducing a diminution in this important branch of our expenditure. I am sorry to say that one of the great offenders in this matter is, as has been already mentioned, the educational Vote. We have given the most careful consideration during the recess to this part of the Estimates. But we found ourselves confronted with this important fact—that a very assiduous and intelligent Commission was appointed two or three years ago to inquire into this whole subject; and that it was hardly possible for the Executive Government to propose, until that Commission had reported, any changes in the educational Vote materially affecting the principles on which it is founded. We have endeavoured, however, at this early date, both to check the rapid expansion of this branch of expenditure, and also—where we could do it without unduly trenching on the province of the Commissioners—to give Parliament an indication of the direction in which further improvement in the way of economy may be made. I am bound likewise to add, that I am satisfied the Commissioners take a very serious view of the great public evils involved in the rapid increase of this Vote, and that it will be a main object of their labours to recommend such changes as will control, if not altogether arrest, that increase. I regret to say my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury has rather understated than overstated this evil in describing the gigantic strides with which, from the smallest beginning, the educational estimate has advanced to £2,000,000 per annum. Those practically acquainted with this subject will tell you plainly that, if you continue to act upon the rules now in force, no very long course of years will have elapsed before this £2,000,000 reaches £3,000,000, or, indeed, a much greater amount. The growth of this expenditure not only tends to augment the national burdens, but has a most enervating effect upon the public mind; and therefore on moral considerations, as well as financial, it demands our most earnest attention. With respect to two or three other important sources of increase which have already been pointed out, I venture to say that it will be found that the Government have turned their best attention to them during the recess. With regard to the Motion now before us, I wish to distinguish between it and the course which the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Wise) invites us to take. I cordially welcome the hon. Gentleman as an ally in the cause to which he has devoted his energies, and in which he has shown not only so much zeal, but so much ability. I could not recommend the House to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman who spoke last, namely, that the House at the commencement of the Session should refuse to go beyond the limit of £6,500,000 in voting these Estimates, and that the Government should be compelled to frame them accordingly. It would break my heart to think that no other remedy was open to us. I do not think, even on the ground of prudence, it would be a fit mode of dealing with an important question. I thank my hon. Friend for drawing our attention to this subject; I am sure good will come out of this discussion. It is not that the mind of the people of England is obstinately fixed in these matters. It derives its tone in a great degree from the temper of this House. And when it is seen that we are in earnest on the subject of economy the public out of doors will, no doubt, soon be found in harmony with us. Although we are certainly acted upon by the popular sentiment, we can also in turn act powerfully on that sentiment. The House and the country, in truth, act and react on each other. But with respect to this Motion, I frankly own I do not think it is in a state in which it can be advantageously adopted. The hon. Mover included in his view at least three subjects; in fact, there are nearer thirty than three, each of which must obviously go before any Committee that has to enter on this vast field; so that instead of any one Committee being capable of investigating all the subjects it will require at least six Committees to get through all the business referred to them. Any Select Committee which had charge of the department of Woods and Forests and the Land Revenues alone would have sufficient work on its hands. Any Committee appointed to examine into the expediency of making further transfers from the Consolidated Fund to the Votes would find ample labour cut out for it. The hon. Gentleman has alluded to a particular item. It is an affair of £2,000—the salary, I think, of the Commissioners of the General Assembly. It would take a Committee more days than I should certainly like to sit to determine whether a multiplicity of items of that description ought to be transferred to the Votes or not. I am sorry it was not practicable to carry further the transfer already effected. It was with great reluctance that we stopped short where we did. But the inquiry was a very onerous one, and it alone would require the undivided exertions of a Select Committee to conduct it satisfactorily. As to the Civil Service Estimates, I venture to say no single Committee could embrace the business of reviewing that expenditure. It is so vast and so varied, and some of the questions involved in it are so difficult, that it would task the time and attention of several distinct Committees. In truth, the hon. Member has sketched out in his Motion views and objects that call for a much larger machinery than this House could supply and keep in operation from year to year. And here I come to a point on which I am at issue with the framer of the Resolution. A Select Committee of this kind appointed every year would not only not be a good measure, but would be a decidedly bad one. It would begin with taking away from the Executive its proper responsibility, and would end by resolving all responsibility into pure vapour; for it is impossible that a Select Committee could really be charged with the duties or the responsibilities of a public department from year to year. What the House of Commons can do in this matter must be done periodically. By periodically passing from one subject to another this House may be able, through its Committees, to do a great work in reviewing the Miscellaneous Estimates; and periodically, I grant, every one of the hon. Member's subjects is a legitimate subject for such an inquiry. But let us not deceive ourselves about the power and effect of these Committees. A Committee of this nature sat eleven years ago. What was the issue of its labours? Why, a recommendation to abolish the office of a Lord of the Treasury, whose salary was included in the Miscellaneous Estimates. [Murmurs.] I believe I am correct in stating that that was the principal and substantial measure which proceeded from them. Therefore I am not very sanguine as to the operation of such a Committee, unless it be appointed with a very special aim, and devotes all its best energies to the discharge of its duties. I hope that, for these reasons, the hon. Gentleman will not expect me to accede to his Motion. I give no opinion on the question whether the time has yet arrived at which it would be desirable to appoint another Committee on the Miscellaneous Estimates. Do not understand me to place any negative on that subject, I would rather reserve my opinion upon it. But I think, if I may say so, that having a new Administration in office, it might be as well if the House allowed us to lay our Miscellaneous Estimates on the table, and if the hon. Gentleman, or any other hon. Member reserved it to himself to consider whether it would be for the public interest that a Committee of this kind should be appointed. Such a Committee as is now proposed I hope the hon. Gentleman does not mean to press, for I certainly do not think it consistent with the duty of the Government to assent to it.

MR. BRIGHT said, he wished to make an observation upon the two speeches which had just been delivered from the Treasury Bench. If those speeches were logical and to be taken as authoritative there was no remedy for the present evils, of which nobody appeared to complain so loudly as the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Because, if no such Motion as his hon. Friend had proposed were adopted, it was quite clear that they were shut up to the plan which was now followed, and which, according to every speaker who had yet addressed the House, was leading us to a condition of things most alarming and deplorable. He always found the Chancellor of the Exchequer complaining on these occasions that the House and the country were not sufficiently economical, and yet every Chancellor of Exchequer refused to accept anything that would give the public departments the power to resist proposals of increased expenditure. Years ago it was a common thing for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when asked to sanction such proposals, to say, "What do you think Mr. Hume will say?" Mr. Hume was not there now, and unfortunately his mantle did not appear to have fallen upon any Member of the House. He had heard Chancellors of the Exchequer make this answer to those who besieged the Treasury for additional expense. Why did they thus use the great economist's name? Because they felt the necessity of having some power beyond their own to hold up in terrorem, even if it were only the pretence of a power. Suppose the Chancellor of the Exchequer had such a Committee as was now proposed to refer to and to fall back upon—not a Committee like the Library Committee, that nobody knew anything about—and he for one never heard of anything they ever did—but a Committee honourably chosen every Session, not packed for special objects, as they generally were—the Treasury might then say, when gentlemen came to them from all parts of the country demanding additional expenditure, "We cannot put such an increase into the Estimates. If we do, do you think the fifteen Gentlemen appointed by the House of Commons and before whom all these things must come, will agree to a proposal of this nature?" Thus between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Committee a very efficient check would be put upon many items of expenditure that were now voted without question. A few years ago a Committee sat to inquire into the Civil Service Estimates. One of the older Members of the Committee, not now in the House, told him that there was a young Member of the House connected by special ties with the Whig families, and it was his casting vote that destroyed that otherwise immortal Lord of the Treasury. What was the fate of that young Member afterwards? Why, they never put him on a Committee which had anything to do with the expenditure, from that day to this, and never would unless he repented of that most grievous sin. Another Committee was afterwards appointed. The noble Lord (Lord J. Russell), who was then Prime Minister, agreed that a fair Committee should be appointed to inquire into the expenses incurred by official salaries, and he fulfilled his pledge. The hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) was a Member of that Committee, he was another, the right hon. Member for Coventry (Mr. Ellice) was also upon it, and it was composed of the usual number of Members. The Committee examined Sir R. Peel, the present Prime Minister, the noble Lord now the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and many hon. Members then in the House. What did they recommend? There were many recommendations that they agreed to unanimously, there were many others upon which a large majority were agreed, and the total of the reductions they recommended amounted to from £70,000 to £80,000 a year. What was the result? The salary of the Judge-Advocate was reduced by £500, and that of the Secretary of the Treasury by an equal sum. The Government reduced the salary of a noble Lord at the Poor Law Board £500, whereupon thinking his services worth more, he resigned. [Mr. DISRAELI: The Secretary for Ireland.] Yes, there was the Secretary for Ireland. No one knew what salary the Secretary for Ireland received. It appeared that there was a great amount of dining and hospitality, a thing very well understood in Ireland, which was said to be necessary for that official, and the Committee were told that a high salary was necessary. However, the salary was reduced by £2,000, and these reductions, which did not amount to one-tenth part of what the Committee recommended almost unanimously, were all that had been carried into effect by the Government. He (Mr. Bright) had frequently remonstrated with the Treasury Bench on the subject but without effect. Then there were the Scotch Judges. Every one knew that if the work were equally divided between them there would be no persons with so little to do as the Scotch Judges. In fact, there were so many Judges and so scanty a Bar, that great difficulty was found in supplying the bench with men of sufficient ability. The Committee recommended that a reduction in the number of Scotch and Irish Judges should be made when a vacancy occurred. Very soon afterwards a Chief Justice died in Ireland. He put it to the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) who was then Prime Minister, whether it would not be proper for the Government to carry into effect the recommendations of the Committee, and reduce the number of the Irish Judges. The noble Lord made answer that he had consulted—whom did the House think? Why, the profession, every man of whom had entered it with the honourable ambition of becoming one of these Judges, and who, of course, saw that his chance would be very much diminished if the vacancy were not filled. The noble Lord said he had consulted gentlemen of the profession, and he did not think that there were too many Judges. The noble Lord, therefore, entirely disregarding the opinion of the Committee upon which he himself sat, made the appointment and filled up the vacancy. Unless Ministers took a different course from this, and adopted the recommendations of a Committee, and the changes they thought necessary, how could any reduction be made in our present growing and extravagant expenditure? Take the education Vote, for example. Was there ever anything in any country so monstrous and absurd as the proceeding in regard to this education Vote? The House voted money, they handed it over to some one to distribute it, and he ventured to say there were not five men in the House who knew into whose hands it went for distribution. The head of this department was a great Lord in "another place"—the President of the Council of Education—and this great Lord having nothing to do, of course required some one to help him. Accordingly, a Vice-President was appointed, and he had a salary. The appointment was made to relieve some one who had a salary from the necessity of doing anything for it. So another appointment was made of a Vice-President of the Council of Education. Another piece of patronage was made, and another salary was paid. This education Vote was expended for the most part upon one particular class and sect of the community,—it went towards the education supposed to be given by the Established Church of this country. It was not, for reasons well-known to many hon. Members, distributed in fair proportions among the various classes of the community. He confessed he thought it a monstrous thing to vote a sum which his hon. Friend quoted at something like £1,500,000, and which the Chancellor of the Exchequer said was getting up to £2,000,000, without any sort of a Report being made that enabled the House to examine the Vote minutely or control it at all. The Government ought to aid the House, as the House ought to aid the country, in checking and controlling such an expenditure. To do this would be the office of such a Committee as was now proposed—not a Committee packed with four Gentlemen from the Treasury Bench on one side of the House and four from the ex-Treasury Bench, all mixed up in the matter, and all hoping to enjoy the distribution of this expenditure, but an honest and fair Committee appointed by the House itself, and not influenced by the Government. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had spoken imploringly to the House in favour of economy, and complimented the Hon. Gentleman who made this Motion as an ally. If he were sincere in that—and could it be doubted?—a Committee composed of twelve or fifteen Gentlemen chosen from both sides of the House must be of use, if they could help the House to scrutinize these Votes. It would be much better to leave the money to fructify in the pockets of the people than to allow it to be expended, as at present, for fifty unnecessary objects, some of which were positively pernicious. He trusted that the House would agree to the appointment of a Committee, and he had no doubt that it would be of great service. He warned the House, however, that while £7,000,000 or £8,000,000 were squandered in this and other directions, the time would come when the subject must receive the most serious attention. He would say no more now, as other occasions would present themselves. But if there were any one of a truly Conservative spirit, who wished to see the institutions of the country founded upon an unquestionable and stable basis, so that they would last his time and his children's who came after him, he could not show this Conservative spirit better than in helping any Chancellor of the Exchequer to lessen the vast expenditure and taxation of the country. There might come a time when we might not have two or three good successive harvests, two or three good cotton crops, and seasons of abundance and prosperity. There might be a time of cloud and storm, when these matters might be called in question in a spirit they would all be loth to see. Those who were sitting in that House were the guardians of the public purse of this country, and ought to warn their countrymen against the pernicious folly that had distinguished the public, the Parliament, and the Cabinets of this country for years past. It was their duty to warn them that if they did not change their policy it would lead to disaster and confusion if not to utter ruin.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that as far as he could understand the objections which had been made to the Motion under discussion, the only grave argument brought against the appointment of a Committee was that it would break in upon the responsibility of the Executive. In his opinion, however, it would have no such effect. It would leave the responsibility of the Executive just where it was, with this difference, that officials would know they were acting under the vigilant supervision of Parliament. He could not conceive a more effectual mode of doing what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said was so desirable—influencing public opinion out of the House, than by the appointment of an annual Committee of their own body to examine the expenditure of the preceding year, and bring its salient features under the notice of the House and of the country. It was perfectly clear that as business was at present done the Estimates were mere matter of form. It was not enough for the House merely to pass the Votes—it was their duty to see, further, how the money had been spent. The inquiry now proposed might appear alarmingly comprehensive, but it would rest with the Committee to determine how many points they ought to deal with in the expenditure of any given period. Since the disjunction of the Board of Works and the Woods and Forests Departments the latter had been unrepresented in the House; and, in a constitutional point of view, there did not appear to be any more entirely irresponsible officials than the two gentlemen who acted as Commissioners of Woods and Forests. The expenditure of that department was some £90,000 a year, but all the account of it set before the House was two totals of £47,000 and £48,000 put down as "money spent." Surely, some more detailed and explicit statement was required; and that it would be the business of the Committee, if agreed to, to recommend. If it was true, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer appeared to admit, that the money for educational purposes was spent, and might be spent, to any extent, without his authority, it was clearly high time that some system of inquiry such as was now proposed should be adopted without delay. If the House chose to spend £2,000,000 in education, let them do it, but let it also be accounted for. Believing that the Motion was of a practical character, and was calculated to effect one of the most important objects which the House, as regarded the public purse, could accomplish, he should support it.

INCOME TAX.

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he rose to move for a

"Select Committee to inquire whether it be possible to adopt some mode of assessing the Income Tax, whereby the injustices and vexations now generally complained of may be wholly or partially obviated."

He hoped the House would give him their attention for a short time while he adverted to the course which had been taken with regard to this tax. They would find that it had always been looked upon as a war tax, or one that ought to be imposed only with the view of meeting some temporary emergency. In 1798 it had first been proposed by Mr. Pitt as a war tax. In 1842 the original Income Tax Act was passed by the late Sir Robert Peel, and in 1845 it was again carried through Parliament by that right hon. Gentleman. In 1848 the tax was renewed by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for India (Sir C. Wood), in order to make up a deficiency in the revenue. In 1851 it was again renewed by the same right hon. Gentleman, with a view to enable the Government to remove some anomalies in the taxation of the country. In the year 1851 and in the following year a Committee was, on the Motion of the late Mr. Hume, granted, for the same purpose as those which he now wished to inquire into, but its labours were brought to an abrupt termination by the dissolution. In 1853 the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer obtained a renewal of the tax, and he then referred to a period to which they were now advancing, when the income tax was to expire altogether. This, therefore, was the time when they ought to review this tax, and see whether anything could be done to put it upon a footing of equality as regarded all classes of the community, for he firmly believed that with the present increased taxes to abolish it altogether would be a great financial error, especially if the House wished to see the policy of the late Sir Robert Peel fully carried out. The President of the Board of Trade had on a former occasion spoken in favour of this view, and he would not deny that now was the time to review the operations of the tax, and to see whether they could not get rid of its glaring inequalities. It might be the possible intention of the Government to ask the House to reimpose this tax for a limited period; but, if that were so, nothing, in his opinion, could be worse than thus tampering with the feelings of the people. The Government imposed the tax for a limited period of time, thus giving hopes that it would be allowed to lapse at the end of the time stated, but when that time expired it was again imposed. He would also remind the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that in his memorable speech in 1853 he had described this tax as one with respect to which it behoved them to adopt a bold, decisive, and unfaltering policy, and he would urge the right hon. Gentleman and the Government to pursue that policy now. He would also recall to the recollection of the House a declaration of opinion, the insertion of which the right hon. Gentleman the member for South Wiltshire (Mr. S. Estcourt) moved in the report of the Committee of 1852, to the effect that it was repugnant to reason and feeling to impose the same sort of tax upon incomes derived from real property and incomes resulting from trades and professions, which were essentially unstable. Mr. Pitt, in his day, held the same view, and he (Mr. Urquhart) contended that whatever the opinions of mathematicians and statesmen might be on the subject, it was purely a matter of feeling to the country at large that permanent and fluctuating incomes were assessed on the same principle. Almost all professional men, if they were at all prudent, could not regard their whole earnings as income, being obliged to make provision for their families and often to replace trust funds or other capital advanced to them in order to make a start in life. Whatever Reform Bill might be proposed by the Government, and whatever its fate, the time was not far distant when the great bulk of the population would enjoy far more control over public affairs than they did now, and they would be more inclined to exercise their new power with moderation towards the higher classes if they found that those classes had done their best to avoid any appearance even of selfishness. They would soon be called to give an account of their stewardship, and the best thing they could do was to put their books in order. He believed that nothing would tend more to strengthen the hands of those who desired Conservative Reform than looking this question steadily in the face. He, therefore, trusted that those who were anxious to retain a territorial aristocracy, those who desired a Reform which should not set class against class, and those who wished to see the financial and commercial policy, commenced in 1842, still further developed to support the motion which he had now the honour to submit. The hon. Member concluded by moving for a Select Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Gentleman had mixed with the discussion of this question considerations which were essentially distinct. The hon. Gentleman had very frankly and ingenuously avowed an opinion that the income-tax ought to become a portion of the permanent finances of the country, and that, as it ought to become a portion of the permanent finances of the country, it was desirable that an inquiry should be instituted to see whether it could be so constructed as to avoid the injustice and vexation of which general complaint was made. The hon. Member could hardly fail to see that, under those circumstances, he proposed that the House should intimate an opinion to-night on one of the most important questions which they had to consider next week as part of the finances of the year. The income-tax, as it now stood, expired on the 31st of March, or rather the time in respect of which it was leviable expired on that day. The hon. Gentleman would certainly appear, by the Motion which he made, to prejudge altogether a question which the House ought to approach in a state of perfect liberty, namely, whether the income-tax should be continued, and likewise whether it should be continued as a permanent or temporary measure. He thought it was an inconvenient moment to come to a vote which would carry with it an indication of opinion on a subject of vast importance, associated also with other questions of equal moment. It appeared to him that if the income-tax was to be renewed—he did not say as a permanent tax, but if the income-tax was to be renewed—and there was a general feeling that it would be continued for a considerable time, and if, under those circumstances, there was likewise a general feeling in favour of an inquiry such as that proposed, Her Majesty's Government would have no difficulty in deferring to that general wish. He thought the hon. Gentleman would agree that it could not be ascertained to-night, and in a thin House. [Mr. URQUHART: Hear!] If he was to understand that the hon. Member assented to what he had stated, he would not further trouble the House. But he was bound to say, that he was not sanguine of the results of any such inquiry. The hon. Gentleman had very fairly admitted that a Committee had sat for two Sessions upon the subject, and they had never been able to mould any practicable measure. At the same time, as he had said, he thought it was a question which ought to be decided by the general feeling of the House, when the proper time came, if that time should arrive. He hoped that, under these circumstances, the hon. Gentleman would be satisfied to reserve his own perfect liberty of raising the question on a future occasion, and not press his Motion at present.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

BEVERLEY ELECTION.

PROSECUTION MOVED.

MR. COBBETT said, that in rising to move that the Attorney General be directed to prosecute Daniel Boyes and Robert

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Taylor for bribery committed at the election for Beverley in April last, he did so as Chairman of the Beverley Election Committee, and it was with the concurrence of all the members that he now submitted this Motion. Their Report was presented at so late a period of the last Session that it was impossible then to move that the recommendation be carried into effect; in fact, the Report was presented on the 11th of August, and there was no time for printing and circulating the minutes of evidence before the prorogation. He would state, without any exaggeration, the grounds upon which the Committee came to the resolution to recommend this prosecution. These persons were proved to have committed bribery in nine several cases, which the Committee reported with all particulars to the House. They would find, if they looked through the minutes of evidence, that Mr. Daniel Boyes was a person of some note in Beverley, that at the last election, which took place on the 28th of April, Mr. Boyes was very active; that an empty house was hired; that in that house Mr. Boyes sat during the day previous to, and the day of the polling; that a gatekeeper kept the outer door; that voters were ushered in to Mr. Boyes one by one, who questioned them as to their wants and their votes; that in a few words a sort of bargain was made that the voter should have one sovereign for a single vote, or two for a plumper; that when it was settled Mr. Boyes said "Go on," and called out "one," or "two," as the case might be; that in a dark passage a hand was extended, and one or two sovereigns put into the hand of the voter; that the man whose hand paid the money was Robert Taylor; that Taylor said, "Pass on;" that the voter then went down another flight of stairs into the street; and that he was then walked, or put into a carriage and driven to the poll. Those were the plain facts of the case, and he did not think he need add to them. The Committee took evidence as to nine distinct cases of bribery, but as one case would illustrate the whole he would only read an extract from the evidence of one witness, James Stokell:—

"That is two sovereigns?—Yes.

"Upon that did you go to the room in the Toll Gavel?—Yes.

"Did you see Daniel Boyes there?—Yes, I did.

"Did you see Wilberfoss Herdsman at the door?—No, I cannot say that I did.

"Was there anybody at the door before you went into the room?—I should not like to say whether there was or not. I went into the room.

"You saw Boyes?—Yes.

"What time of the day did you go there?—Something like, may be, dinner time.

"One or two?—I cannot say; about twelve o'clock; eleven or twelve.

"On the polling day?—Yes, on the polling-day morning.

"Did you get anything in that house?—Yes.

"Who gave it to you?—Robert Taylor.

"What did he give you?—Four half-sovereigns.

"Did they make up two quid?—Yes.

"Before you went in to Robert Taylor had you seen Daniel Boyes?—Yes.

"Did he say anything to you?—I went into the room with the understanding as to those two quid, and I said, 'I have come to see you, meister;' and I said, 'What do you please to want with me?' He says, 'Who is thou going to vote for?' I said, 'I expect you want me to vote for Mr. Walters and Mr. Glover.' I said that to Boyes, and he said to me, 'Oh, be damned to Glover; we have nought at all to do with him.' Then I said to him, 'Then I shall vote for Major Edwards and Mr. Walters.' He said then I should get a sovereign, and I called my words back again, and I said, 'Sovereign; that is like nought; I must have two, and then I will go the whole hog.' He looked at the book; I expected it was a poll-book that he had, and he said, 'It's all right; give him two. He is a good fellow; he is all right.' I went through another door through there, and Bob Taylor gave me four half-sovereigns, and then they had finished with me; then there was the cab concern next."

"Did you go the entire hog, and vote for Mr. Walters?—I went from there to the King's Head.

"Did you vote for Mr. Walters?—Yes, after a bit.

"For whom?—I voted for Major Edwards for principle, and for Mr. Walters for two sovereigns, and I told them so when I voted.

"Who did you say that to?—To the man that took the vote.

"Did you say it at the polling-booth?—Yes, and I showed them the money.

"Had you the two sovereigns in your hand at the time?—Yes, I had the four half-sovereigns.

"Was Mr. Walters there when you said that?—I do not know him; I never saw him in my life. I do not know him.

"You showed the money in the booth?—In the Corn Exchange.

"Had Mr. Walters asked you for your vote before?—No; I never saw the gentleman."

That was the kind of evidence which the Committee received, and in each of the nine cases it was proved that the voter had gone up to the room occupied by Boyes, and that in a dark passage leading therefrom he received from a hand, subsequently proved to be that of Taylor, the one or two sovereigns, as the case might be. Nothing could be more clear than the proof of bribery in all those cases, and even the learned counsel who appeared for the sitting Member did not dispute it, but argued that there was no connection between Boyes and the sitting Member. When, however, the Committee found that bribery had been carried on so systematically, and by a man who was a leading character in Beverley, it felt that it would be wanting in its duty if it did not suggest to the House the expediency of ordering a prosecution against him and the person who had been his accomplice in the transactions. It appeared that Mr. Boyes was not only a leading character in the political circles of Beverley, but also filled the office of town councillor, and therefore ought to have been one of the last men to seek to corrupt his fellow-townsmen. Having thus explained the circumstances, he (Mr. Cobbett) had only now to conclude with the Motion of which he had given notice.

"That, in pursuance of the Recommendation of the Select Committee appointed to try the several Petitions against the Return for the Borough of Beverley, Her Majesty's Attorney General be directed to prosecute Daniel Boyes and Robert Taylor for Bribery committed by them at the last Election for the said Borough, in April 1859.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR said, he had a strong opinion that the House of Commons would neither consult its own dignity nor general utility by resolving on this prosecution. He did not appear as the advocate or apologist of these men; but he contended that they ought not to stand in the pillory alone, and further, he believed that if the prosecution were determined on they would be acquitted. From criminals they would become heroes. He spoke with all respect to the recommendation of the Committee which was presided over by the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Cobbett), but would observe that it comprised no lawyer acquainted with the practice in criminal courts. It was true that one Member of the Committee was a distinguished equity lawyer, but the fact of his being an equity lawyer proved that he could not be very well versed in criminal proceedings. Supposing that the House should order the prosecution of those two persons, he was certain no jury would convict on the evidence brought before them. Matters had been so managed in these cases that each person went in alone; so that the only evidence which could be adduced was that of the party who had received a bribe. But if he were put into the witness-box to prove it he would, with a look of impudent deference towards the Judge, demand, and would of course obtain, the protection of the Court. The rest would, of course, follow his example. Or even if they did answer, the Judge would tell the jury that, as when a receiver gave evidence against a thief it was the course of justice to require that evidence to be confirmed in some material portions, so in the case before them there ought to be some untainted witnesses to establish the guilt of the accused. It must be recollected that each of the nine cases was separate and distinct, and the evidence in one could not be called in aid of another. He had looked through the evidence in the blue-book, and he asserted that there was not a tittle of independent credible testimony to support the statement of the parties who admitted they had been bribed. Besides, who were these men whom the Committee had recommended to be prosecuted? They were not of high social rank. Boyes was a man who kept a public-house in a back street, in the borough of Beverley, but who had at last worked himself into a place in the town council. Taylor was an ex-grocer, who having spent one-half of his life in adulterating the food of the electors, now devoted the other to the adulteration of their principles. Having commenced by dealing in West India sugar, he had now transferred his commerce to a more lucrative article, locally known as "Beverley sugar." But let the House look at the way in which the Committee had dealt with this whole matter. These men, who were Radicals in opinion, were singled out by the Committee for prosecution, but were they the only persons who were guilty? He found in the Report of the Committee that bribery had been carried on by men named David Ritchie, Jacob Wilkins, and James Baker, who had given or offered bribes, all of them men of greater social position than the two persons brought before the House, but they were on the Conservative side of politics, and the Committee did not recommend them to be prosecuted. The fact that the recommendations for prosecution should be confined to persons belonging to the party opposed to the majority of the Committee certainly required some explanation. He did not doubt that an explanation could be given, but without it conclusions might be drawn adverse to the impartiality of the Committee. But even this was not all he found in the Report of the Committee—two of the most glaring cases he had ever met with in his life—one a case of gross intimidation, the other of unblushing treating—were recorded there, yet a prosecution to punish the guilty parties was not recommended. Then the agent of the Conservative party had employed a whole force of three score runners at the rate of 22s. 6d., but the Committee contented themselves with finding that the practice was "objectionable." The House had had already some experience in prosecutions with regard to Beverley, and the result ought to be a caution. Not very long ago Mr. Glover was prosecuted for an offence which had not been uncommon before his time, though the offenders might not have been prosecuted. He was sentenced to four months' imprisonment, but the effect was to raise up a false but still extensive sympathy for him, and when he went down to Yorkshire at the expiration of his imprisonment he was received with a popular ovation such as a conqueror might have been proud of. The Old Bailey criminal drove into Beverley in a carriage and four, accompanied by one of the jury who convicted him, and surrounded by an applauding concourse of the people! He was, in fact, regarded as a victim to his own imprudence, and a martyr in a struggle against the unjust partiality of Parliament. The same reaction in public feeling might take place in this case if the House were not cautious how it proceeded. And let the House observe what was done at other places. The Election Committee at Hull reported that 487 persons were employed by Mr. Hoare's committee as runners, and 493 by Messrs. Clay and Lewis; that of those employed by Mr. Hoare 300 were voters, and that they were paid in all sums varying from 2s. 6d. to £3 5s., while the greater number of them were pursuing their ordinary avocations. Yet there was no recommendation to prosecute in that case nor in the case of Norwich, where the Committee reported that the high bailiff of the County Court of Norfolk was mixed up with corrupt practices. Now he did not see how they could undertake to prosecute a miserable hawker at Beverley whilst they could let men like the high bailiff of Norwich, pass unscathed. Then, take the case of Wakefield; it was clearly shown that Mr. Wainwright, the solicitor and agent of Mr. Leatham, offered a person £15 to induce him to procure the vote of another person for Mr. Leatham, while the honourable candidate was waiting in the adjoining room, and his carriage standing at the door! And there the money expended amounted to thousands of pounds, while at Beverley it was only showed that the amount expended in bribery amounted to £22, and £5 of that was given to one voter who came from Carlisle, and whose expenses were £3 15s. Then there was the Gloucester case, where the bribery was most unblushing, and the Committee in their Report stated that Alderman Withom was one of the persons by whom the bribery was effected. The Commissioners in their Report, speaking of the election of 1857, said they did not find that Sir R. W. Carden or Mr. Price were privy to the bribery that was practised; but in reference to the election of 1859, they found that Mr. Price and Mr. Monk were not privy to the corrupt practices that prevailed at that election, but they observed an ominous silence as to the privity of Sir R. W. Carden. If the House wished to produce a salutary effect upon the community let them fly at higher game, and attack baronets, aldermen, magistrates, and lawyers who had been guilty of bribery. The entire sum proved to have been spent by Boyes and Taylor at the Beverley election amounted to only £22; and if they only should be prosecuted, he believed that the House, instead of punishing miscreants would be proclaiming martyrs. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving an Amendment,

"That, without at all impugning the judgment of the Beverley Election Committee, this House is of opinion that the inquiries before Committees of this House, and under the recent Commissions which have sat in various places, having clearly demonstrated that many persons of higher social rank have been involved in graver criminality, it would not be expedient to limit the direction to Her Majesty's Attorney General to the prosecution of Daniel Boyes and Robert Taylor for bribery committed by them at the last Beverley Election."

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "without at all impugning, &c.," instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. SELWYN said, that he had intended to have simply seconded the Motion made by the Chairman of the Beverley Committee, because, although he was a younger Member than the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. W. D. Seymour), he had already seen the inexpediency of inflicting upon the House long and unnecessary speeches. After the direct attack, however, which had just been made upon him and the rest of his colleagues on that Committee, he could not be altogether silent. He did not wish the House to attach undue weight to the recommendations of an Election Committee; and when the proper time came for discussing the constitution of these tribunals, he should be prepared to contend that there could hardly be a more uncertain, unsatisfactory, and expensive mode of deciding the validity of an election. Meanwhile, however, he thought the House would attach some weight to the recommendations of such a Committee, especially when they were made unanimously, as in the present instance. Though the hon. and learned Member had read the Report of the Committee, he appeared to have entirely misconceived its spirit and object. The Beverley Committee did not think themselves warranted in inquiring into the social rank of the persons mentioned in their Report; but they did ascertain the position which Boyes held in the borough. He was a town councillor; at a meeting of the party to which he belonged he was elected chairman; and he was one of a deputation of two who were sent up to London to find candidates. A man who took this prominent part in local politics, and who on the eve of a general election came up to London professing to have two seats at his disposal, would probably have been found at that time to be much higher in social rank than his antecedents might have led one to expect. But the Committee did not inquire into what saloons he was admitted, nor from whose receptions he was excluded; they found that, in reference to this particular election, he was the man of most note in the borough. It was he who was the first to receive the candidate on his arrival, and to introduce him to the electors; he surrounded him with crowds of his partisans in the Market-place, and afterwards made addresses to them from the lodgings of the future representative. Yet it was sought to represent him as a man of no consequence—as a mere publican in a back street. The duty of the Committee, he believed, was to detect whatever persons had been guilty of direct, systematic, and unblushing bribery; they found that the payment of money in the place with which Boyes was associated was open and notorious in Beverley; and they unanimously arrived at the conclusions which were embodied in that Report. If the House were really desirous of putting an end to the practice of bribery, what better opportunity could they hope for than the establishment against a man possessing such political influence of the fact that he had been the real briber? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Southampton said that the amount alleged to have been spent in bribery in that case was small, and that no court of law would convict parties upon the evidence which had been brought before the Committee. But the truth was that the existence of the bribery had been so open and so notorious, that it had not been found necessary to enter into any detailed evidence in support of the case of the petitioners as far as regarded that fact. The Committee might, as was alleged, be destitute of experience on criminal points, but they had common sense to guide them in the inquiries which they had pursued; their investigations had not been made with any design of obtaining materials for a conviction against Daniel Boyes, for after the admission by counsel for the sitting Member that bribery at the election had been undoubted, open, and general, the only question remaining to be decided was, whether such practices had taken place with the privity of the sitting Member, or of any agent of his. All that the Committee recommended was, that Boyes should be put upon his trial; that all the evidence which could be obtained should be adduced against him, and that he should have the fullest opportunity of clearing himself if it were in his power to do so. The hon. and learned Gentleman also said that other persons had been guilty of bribery, and that no Motion had been brought before the House for putting them upon their trial. But the Committee had nothing to do with those other cases; their only duty was to consider what course the House ought to take upon the evidence which had been adduced in the course of their own inquiries. He might add, however, that if guilt had in their opinion been satisfactorily established against any other persons, they would have made a similar recommendation with regard to them. The hon. and learned Member had further indulged in a variety of insinuations against the Committee, and among other things he had suggested that they were influenced by party motives in the Report which they had made. He had had no opportunity of consulting the other Gentlemen who had acted on that Committee, but he believed he might say in their names, as well as in his own, that he would not condescend to allude further to such an insinuation. The hon. and learned Member had referred to the proceedings of other Committees, with which the Committee on the Beverley Election had nothing whatever to do, for it was one of the imperfections of the present system that particular cases were tried without the slightest opportunity of knowing what was going on in the adjoining Committee-room,

Mr. Selwyn

In conclusion, he might mention—though he felt almost ashamed of the necessity for doing so—that the Committee by whom the Report had been made in the Beverley case consisted of three Gentlemen from the Liberal, and only two from the Conservative side of the House.

MR. COLLIER said, it was his intention to support the original Motion for the prosecution of Boyes and Taylor as he conceived it to be no valid reason for postponing or abandoning the trial of those who had been shown to be offenders that a greater number had not been discovered. So far from joining with his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. D. Seymour) in the fear that the prosecution would not be successful, and that delinquents of a higher grade in society would thus be screened, he believed that the effect of the trial would be to render the case even more powerful against those whom the hon. Member was so anxious to bring to the bar of criminal justice. But if the prosecution were deferred till some comprehensive measure had been passed rendering everybody amenable who had been guilty of corrupt offences, the probable result would be that these men would escape and all the others with them. The fact that Taylor and Boyes were Liberals only made him the more anxious that they should be prosecuted. It had been suggested on their behalf that bribery could not be proved unless the money were given in the presence of half-a-dozen witnesses; but if no prosecution were to take place for bribery till cases occurred where bribes were thus publicly given, he was afraid that his hon. and learned Friend would have to wait a long time. However, in Boyes' case no less than eight witnesses were forthcoming to give direct or corroborative evidence of the acts of bribery in which he had been concerned. He wished to know, if the House declined to interfere in a case like the present, where the bribery had been extensive, systematic and notorious—where a Committee had reported the fact to the House, and had recommended that the two principals in that bribery should be prosecuted, and where, lastly, the Chairman of that Committee had moved that the recommendation contained in their Report should be acted on, under what possible combination of circumstances could the House ever again direct a prosecution? The practical effect of such a course would be, not as the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Digby Seymour) supposed, that criminals would be changed into martyrs, but the country would be led, and with some show of reason, to believe that the House was not in earnest in its professions of a desire to put down these offences; and Committees would for the future abandon the thankless task of making the reports to the House. If the existing constitutional checks were not applied when a flagrant case of bribery was exposed, it would be as well to put a stop to legislation on the subject altogether, to remove the existing barriers, and to trust for repression to what some hon. Gentlemen considered an infallible remedy — the Ballot. He believed that the Ballot would tend to restrain bribery, though it might not afford a panacea for all the evils which were complained of at elections. Whatever measure might be adopted with a view to future advantage, it was manifest that beneficial results must follow from the vigilant administration of the law in the present instance.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it was a well-established principle of Parliamentary tactics, when a remedy which was clear, definite, and simple in its nature, was proposed for a recognized grievance, for some hon. Member to come forward and impeach the remedy upon the ground of its limited nature, and to recommend to the House some wide and comprehensive measure which was not likely to be immediately adopted, which would probably be postponed until the Greek Kalends, and which, by being impracticable, and substituted for that which was practicable, might defeat the measure which was proposed to the House. He did not accuse the hon. and learned Member for Southampton of resorting to any mala fide proposal for the purpose of defeating this measure. He had no doubt that the hon. and learned Member really felt fired with the indignation he had so eloquently expressed, and thought that it was incumbent upon the House immediately to take measures for the wholesale proscription and prosecution of persons charged with bribery. He had no doubt that the hon. and learned Member was perfectly sincere; but he must permit him (Sir George Lewis) to differ from him as to the propriety as well as the policy of the course he had recommended. It appeared to him that the duty of the House was alike plain and simple. The Committee appointed to inquire into the Beverley election found that two persons had been guilty of very flagrant and manifest bribery, and recommended that a prosecution should be instituted. The hon. and learned Member objected to the recommendation, partly on the ground that those persons were not of sufficient social eminence, and partly because the prosecution, if instituted, would fail. The latter objection seemed to rest on very uncertain conjecture. The object of the Committee who inquired into the case was not to get up evidence for the purpose of founding a prosecution thereon; they merely collected evidence to support the recommendation which they might make to the House, and there was no sufficient reason for doubting that if this case were put into the hands of the Solicitor to the Treasury, aided by the professional skill of the Attorney General, he would be able to obtain evidence upon which a prosecution might be founded with reasonable hope of success. The Motion proposed to order the Attorney General to institute a prosecution, and that was the received form in which this House usually instructed the Attorney General. But if the Attorney General on examination should come to the opinion that the evidence would not support a prosecution, and if he expressed that opinion to the House, he (Sir George Lewis) would venture to predict with some confidence that the House would not be so unreasonable as to insist upon the execution of its order. At all events, without pretending to anticipate that decision, he felt sure that it would give a patient hearing to any information which the Attorney General might think it would be his duty to give. That, he thought, was a sufficient answer to the doubts which had been thrown out with regard to the probable success of this prosecution. The remarks made with regard to social eminence and the amount of bribery had received a sufficient answer from the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Selwyn), but it seemed to him that if that House were in earnest with respect to the prosecution of cases of bribery, where the offence appeared manifest, it must begin by taking some few cases pointed out in the Reports of Election Committees. It was a strange argument to contend that, because one man was prosecuted, impunity was given to others, and as well might it be said in respect to the ordinary execution of the criminal law that because one man was indicted for petty larceny another could not be prosecuted for burglary. As far as the present case went, it was quite clear that it would be a precedent for the prosecution of others guilty of greater amount of bribery. If it were right that persons reported against by other

Election Committees, or by the recent Commissions issued in respect of Wakefield and Gloucester, should be prosecuted, he was sure that the House, if those persons had not received certificates from the Commissioners, and if there appeared a prospect of success in the prosecutions, would listen to any hon. Member who should feel disposed to bring the subject under consideration. It was, therefore, a reason in favour of the present Motion that it established a principle applicable to all cases.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH wished to a correct misapprehension into which the hon. and learned Member for Southampton (Mr. D. Seymour) had fallen. He had represented Mr. Glover, the late Member for Beverley, as receiving a formal acquittal, and as having proceeded in a carriage and four through that town in a very triumphal manner. Now that was not a correct representation as far as regards the merits of the case. Mr. Glover received a mitigation of the sentence from the Home Office mainly on the ground that the law under which the offence was committed had been subsequently abolished. Indeed, so soon as it appeared to be the intention of the House to abrogate the law requiring a qualification for Members of Parliament, it was felt desirable that no person should remain in prison expiating a penalty for the disregard of an obligation, which the law had ceased any longer to impose.

Ordered,

"That in pursuance of the Recommendation of the Select Committee appointed to try the several Petitions against the Return for the Borough of Beverley, Her Majesty's Attorney General be directed to prosecute Daniel Boyes and Robert Taylor for Bribery committed by them at the Election for the said Borough in April, 1859."

CHURCH RATES LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. HUBBARD, in asking for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the law of church rates, said he trusted he should need no other justification for bringing before the House the question of the law of church rates than the importance of the subject itself, the wide difference of opinion which prevailed respecting it, and the general desire that was felt to come to some settlement. The Bill he had prepared proposed to take a middle course between the extreme views which were entertained on either side. But it was not in the nature of a compromise. True, it occupied a middle ground which might fairly be the meeting place of those who held the most contrary opinions; but he repeated that it was not a compromise so far as he was concerned, for in the Bill which he begged to move nothing was conceded which he did not believe to be required by justice, and nothing was retained that could be lawfully conceded. The measure had been framed with a sincere desire to meet and to satisfy every complaint which could be fairly urged by those who were dissatisfied, and who were not members of the Church of England. But, on the other hand, it abstained from needlessly injuring the interests of religion by interfering with those settled means which Churchmen possessed for raising amongst themselves the funds which were requisite for the sustentation of their religious edifices, and for the maintenance of the services within them. The House would permit him briefly to explain the nature of the few clauses of which the Bill was composed. In the first place, it contemplated that those who did not conform to the services of the Church of England might, upon due notice given of an intention to make a rate, state that they did not conform to her services, and were desirous of not contributing to the rate. These two positions were not always concurrent, but if any persons should be at once dissidents from the communion of the church and unwilling to pay the rate, they should then be relieved from any liability to contribute thereto. These hostile elements being thus eliminated from the vestry, that body would then consist of a church vestry so called, and in that vestry, as a matter of course, no nonconformist would find his place, for he could not very well be excused from contributing to a rate for a special purpose, and yet claim a right either to take part in raising that rate, or in disbursing the funds so raised; and in the church vestry thus constituted no other question would be raised than that which related to the raising and the application of such rates. It had long been the complaint that in various parts of the country, and particularly in towns, many churches and district chapels were forced to contribute to rates which were levied and disbursed by the mother church, whilst they themselves had in addition the onus imposed upon them of providing for their own expenditure. One of the clauses of his Bill would remedy that inequality in the existing practice—it would constitute every such district church or chapel an ecclesiastical district, and recognize in it a power of raising a rate for its own purposes; and upon the raising of such rate every such church or chapel would be exonerated from contributing to any other church whatever. The only other clause which he need mention was one that would assimilate both the assessment and mode of collecting church rates to that which prevailed with regard to poor rates, and would withdraw the cognizance of such cases entirely from the ecclesiastical courts. He would say no more descriptive of the contents of the measure. He was anxious that the House should permit the Bill to be printed and laid before it, and he would only say in conclusion that it had been prepared with an earnest desire to contribute towards the settlement of this long-litigated question, and individually he might add that in the part he had taken in the matter he was influenced by two feelings that were perfectly compatible—one, an entire and frank admission of the principle of civil and religious liberty; the other, a dutiful allegiance and loyalty to the Church of England.

Leave given.

Bill to amend the Law of Church Rates ordered to be brought in by Mr. HUBBARD and Lord ROBERT CRICK.

Bill presented, and read 1^o.

SELECT COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, that it was in the knowledge of all who had considered the subject of which he had given notice, that imperfection in the cables and anchors which were manufactured for the mercantile service annually led to a very great loss of life and property. He begged the House, therefore, to bear with him for a few minutes whilst he laid before them a statement which he thought would warrant them in granting him a Committee to inquire into a matter of even so unusual a nature as that of an article of manufacture. It was about forty years since chain cables were first introduced for the use of shipping, and in 1832 a test was instituted by the Government for trying the strength of cables used in Her Majesty's service. In 1840 a disaster occurred at Liverpool in a tempest—the floating lights of that harbour were blown adrift. This led to an investigation by the corporation, and the substitution of chain instead of ordinary cables in light vessels. The corporation, on that occasion, tendered for the maximum strength of the chain cables, and so successful were they that no accident had since occurred to the light vessels in that port from weakness of the cables. Previous to this a testing machine was erected by an eminent merchant there, which was subsequently made over to the corporation, and is now carried on under their control. A testing-house had been since established at Sunderland. The House would be surprised to hear that no less than 82½ per cent of chain cables sent to the former testing-house broke, and no doubt many of the losses which had been sustained, both of life and property, were attributable to the weakness of the cables used. In 1859, Mr. Blake was deputed, by the operative chainmakers, to address the directors of the Merchant Shipping Association and others on the subject. He stated, on behalf of the chainmakers, that the inferiority of untested chains was very great, and caused an enormous annual loss of life. They therefore prayed that some remedy might be adopted, which should prevent the use of inferior chains. In 1857, Mr. M'Donald, the superintendent of the chain cable testing machinery at Liverpool, reported to the corporation that a great many of the chains made and tested upon the hydraulic principle were defective, that innumerable cracks were discovered after the manufacturer's test, and that from the great strictness with which the duty of examining chains was performed, the manufacturers were somewhat opposed to the trial, while the testing establishment was, in his opinion, in a high degree entitled to the public confidence. Mr. M'Donald had, moreover, on the 13th of January, in the present year, made mention of the case of the Royal Charter as affording evidence of the necessity which existed for insisting upon an efficient public test of cables. He added that from 1855 to 1859 it was found at the testing-house that 82½ per cent of chain cables sent to be tested inferior, and 58½ per cent of close chain for topsail sheets; and on the 20th of the same month he stated, in a report, that he had the history of every chain sent in to be tested—the number of fathoms which had failed, and the cause of the defects. With regard to the expense of the machine, it might be stated that the machine at Liverpool was self-supporting, consequently that objection could not be urged as a grievance. It was lamentable to see the ignorance of shipowners and surveyors in this respect, and it was very culpable on the part of Lloyd's to insure vessels which went to sea with untested cables. He would give the House instances of three vessels which had been wrecked in consequence of the weakness of chain cables. It would be recollected that the Tayleur sailed from Liverpool, and in passing down the Irish Channel she could not be brought about. She dropped three anchors in succession, but in each instance the chain broke, and every soul on board was lost. The loss of the Prince at Balacava had been attributed to the fouling of her screw, which prevented her from using her steam-power, while the loss of the Royal Charter was attributed to the surging of her cables consequent on the use of her steam; all the men-of-war rode out the Balacava gale, and the probability is that the Prince would have done so too if her ground-tackle had been as good as theirs. It was, however, a moot point whether it was desirable to work a vessel under such circumstance up to her anchor. The Royal Charter had two chains, and the weather was moderating when her cable parted. It was known that 13s. 6d. a cwt. was paid for her cables, and it was said that sum was below the price that ought to have been given for good iron. Further, it was the belief of all competent judges that it was entirely owing to the superiority of her chain cables and anchors that enabled the Great Eastern to ride out the fearful gale which wrecked so many vessels while she was at Holyhead. With respect to anchors, he would not go into that question, because the same reasoning applied to it as to cables; but he would merely observe, that when the question of anchors was first considered by the Great Eastern Company, it was found that if an ordinary description of anchor were used, it would require one thirteen tons in weight, and grave doubts were entertained whether it would be possible to handle such anchors in rough weather. The company, however, had adopted Trotman's anchors, which gave the greatest strength in proportion to their size, and subsequently it was found their adoption had been attended with success. The improvement in the manufacture of iron within the last few years was so great by means of the cold-blast system, that cables could now be made of a strength which was unheard of twenty or thirty years ago. In a ninety-gun ship in the navy, the cable was $2\frac{1}{4}$ inches. The extreme strain such a cable was calculated to bear was 120 tons, and the proof two-thirds of that, or 82

tons. But in the Great Eastern the cable being $2\frac{1}{2}$, or only three-eighths more than the other, the maximum strain was 240, and the proof 170 tons. If these results can be relied upon it is possible, at a small additional expense, to furnish ships with cables which will hold them in any weather; and, on these grounds, he asked the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Board of Trade to consent to the appointment of a Committee on a subject so deeply affecting the lives and property of Her Majesty's subjects. If it were appointed, he could bring evidence quite sufficient to prove that it would be beneficial for the shipowners to adopt cables such as would hold ships in any gale. In every respect the question was so important, that although his Motion was of a somewhat unusual character, he thought there could be no objection to the granting of the Committee.

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR seconded the Motion.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that although it was true the Motion was not very usual, yet, inasmuch as he thought it quite possible the investigation would bring out some interesting information, and be generally useful, the Government would not oppose the appointment of the Committee. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) had already obtained a return with respect to anchors, which might be useful to the Committee. At the same time he must say, that the Government had no intention of appointing a department for the purpose of seeing that merchant vessels carried proper chain cables and anchors, for shipowners already considered that the Government interfered too much with them, by surveying their vessels, and taking care of the public interest. He thought it would be a very easy thing for shipowners to make it incumbent upon the manufacturers of chain cables and anchors to have them tested; but if they chose such articles rather from their cheapness than strength, he did not see how anything could be done, nor did he see how they could be assisted by the establishment of a Government test. At the present moment very valuable Admiralty charts were published at a cheap rate, but merchant shipowners seemed very little obliged to them for the boon, and he believed that many ships went to sea without them, their owners preferring, for the sake of economy, to buy charts of an inferior character. The Great Britain herself, he was informed, went ashore in Dundrum Bay mainly from the circumstance that she had not the Admiralty chart on board. There would be no objection on his part to the appointment of the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the manufacture of Anchors and Chain Cables for the Merchant Service."

House adjourned at Ten o'clock.

SECOND READING PUT OFF.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he was anxious to make a request of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cranworth) with regard to a Bill which he had introduced, and which stood for second reading on Tuesday next. He alluded to the Bill for amending the law relating to Endowed Schools. In order to make his question intelligible, however, it was necessary that he should trouble their Lordships by briefly recapitulating the proceedings which had taken place in the other House upon the subject. It would be remembered that a measure was introduced into the House of Commons last year by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn). That measure was one with which he (Lord Carnarvon) could not agree, nor was it received with any great favour by the House of Commons. It provided that, where a will or deed endowing a school did not expressly state that the trustees should be persons belonging to a particular Church, persons of any religious denomination might be eligible for the office. Now, that measure was generally regarded in the light of a blow aimed at the Church of England; and if passed into a law, its effect would have amounted to a practical confiscation of Church property. But the Bill was not received with any very great favour by the other House. It was referred to a Select Committee, and that Committee, after carefully considering the question, prepared a second Bill in lieu of the first by way of compromise. The first was therefore thus superseded, and during the remainder of the Parliamentary Session no further steps were taken with the second. This year his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cranworth) had introduced a Bill into their Lordships' House, which seemed at the first blush to be nothing but a counterpart of the second Bill of last year. It was of just the same length, was printed in the same shape, and contained the same number of clauses. In fact, it was not until the seventh clause that any material difference was to be detected. That clause provided that, unless otherwise expressed in the will or deed of endowment, no person should be deemed ineligible, whatever his religious faith might be, to become a trustee of any charity or endowment for educational purposes; whereas, by the Bill of compromise which was drawn by the Committee of the House of Commons, it was provided that, unless it were otherwise expressed in the will or deed of endowment, and in those cases where it should appear that for twenty-five years immediately preceding persons of various denominations had been appointed as trustees, such person should be eligible for the trusteeship. The difference, therefore, consisted in this,—that his noble and learned Friend's Bill altogether ignored this important principle of usage or prescription, which lay at the very root of the matter.

EARL GRANVILLE rose to order. He thought the noble Earl wished to put a question to his noble and learned Friend; but instead of that he was entering into a discussion of a Bill which was not formally under the consideration of the House.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he would merely observe further, that, as there was the very decided and material difference to which he had drawn attention between the Bill of his noble and learned Friend and that of the Committee of the House of Commons, he hoped his noble and learned Friend would not insist upon pressing his Bill to a second reading on Tuesday.

LORD CRANWORTH said, he did not think that he could be charged with proceeding with the Bill with any undue haste in appointing Tuesday for moving the second reading. He introduced it on the second day of the Session. It was immediately printed, and placed in the hands of their Lordships. If the House were of opinion that the seventh clause ought not to stand in its present form, it was of course competent for them to strike it out; but after the lapse of ten days since the first reading, he really did not see why he should not now proceed with the measure. He could not consent, therefore, to the discharge of the order for Tuesday.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he hoped his noble and learned Friend would not proceed with or at least press on his Bill. His noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) had not given a complete account of all that had taken place in the other House of Parliament with regard to this question, and of the nature of the proceedings which had induced him to consider that it was not desirable to press the Bill upon their Lordships' attention now. The Bill, which was introduced by Mr. Dillwyn was dealt with in a rather extraordinary manner by the Select Committee to whom it was referred. They altered every clause of it, and then, of course, the preamble not fitting the amended clauses, they were obliged to make a fresh one. Thus the Bill ceased to be any longer that of its honourable proposer, who thereupon declined to proceed with it. But in the present Session the same hon. Gentleman had introduced a Bill similar to that which he had originally presented to the House, and he understood from his hon. and learned Friend, Sir Hugh Cairns, who was a Member of the Select Committee, that it was his intention also to introduce a Bill founded entirely upon the Report of that Committee. Under these circumstances he put it to his noble and learned Friend whether it would not be desirable to allow the House of Commons, which had already considered the question, to have the two Bills before it, and determine for itself which of them it would prefer. That ground had not been stated by his noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon); but it was one upon which it appeared to him (Lord Chelmsford) that he might reasonably ask his noble and learned Friend not to persist with his Bill. But if his noble and learned Friend thought that it was desirable to ask their Lordships to give his Bill a second reading, then he would put it to him whether he might not afford a little more time in order to enable the House to be prepared for the discussion when it came on. It was true his noble and learned Friend had introduced his Bill at the earliest possible period; but he did so without accompanying it with any statement of its provisions; the result was that it had not attracted the attention which its importance entitled it to receive. The subject was one of great interest. It was deserving of serious consideration; and it would very probably excite much discussion. He hoped, therefore, his noble and learned Friend would feel, if he would determine to press the measure, that it was only fair to give a little further time for its consideration.

EARL GRANVILLE said, there could be no objection to proceeding with the Bill, seeing that there was not at present any great pressure of other business. It was rather a strange cause of complaint that the Bill had been introduced early in the Session, when the usual objection was that all the business was delayed until nearly the close of the Session.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, he was anxious that sufficient time should be given by the noble and learned Lord for the consideration of the Bill, and for ascertaining what was the sentiment generally entertained out of doors upon the subject. In his own immediate neighbourhood, in the diocese of Salisbury, numerous meetings were being held this week for the express purpose of considering the Endowed Schools Bill; and he really thought the noble and learned Lord ought to give time for the full consideration of the question how far a compromise was capable of being effected, with the view of doing justice to the Dissenters, at the same time that no hardship or injury was inflicted upon the Church.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR presumed that his noble and learned Friend would, as a matter of courtesy, have no objection to the postponement of the Bill for a day or two, say to Thursday next. The measure was one that affected the rights of a large portion of Her Majesty's subjects, and was one fully deserving discussion in their Lordships' House. There was no reason why it should originate with the House of Commons more than with this House.

LORD CRANWORTH said, it was true that Mr. Dillwyn had again introduced a Bill into the House of Commons which was the same, or nearly the same, as that of last year; but so far from thinking that to be a reason why he (Lord Cranworth) should not proceed with this Bill, it appeared to him that if he had not already introduced it, that was precisely the reason why this House should originate a measure which was more likely to meet the approbation of Parliament. True, the Bill in one important clause did differ in principle from the Bill which had received the sanction of the Select Committee of the House of Commons last year; but when it came under discussion he should be prepared to state his reasons for thinking that it was better as he had altered it than as it was approved by that House. It would be for their Lordships to say whether they concurred with him or not. If they did, the Bill would then go down to the House of Commons in its present shape. If they did not, then of course he had only to bow to the decision of the House. He would not object to take the second reading on Thursday instead of Tuesday, and was quite willing to defer the Committee for ten days from that date.

LAW OF SETTLEMENT AND REMOVAL. QUESTION.

MR. KEKEWICH said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether it is his intention to move for the reappointment of the Select Committee on the Irremovable Poor, with the view of proposing an alteration in the laws of settlement and removal during the present Session?

MR. VILLIERS said, that in consequence of the abrupt manner in which the proceedings of the Committee had terminated, and the incomplete state of the inquiry, he intended to propose the reappointment of the Committee with a view of coming to a conclusion on the subject, and ascertaining what further legislation was necessary.

EDUCATION (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he would beg to inquire, Whether it is the intention of Government to introduce any measure respecting intermediate education in Ireland; and when such measure, if any, will be introduced?

MR. CARDWELL: It is my intention to bring in a Bill on the subject of Endowed Schools in Ireland, but I am not at present prepared to say at what time.

"LA NAZIONE ARMATA" IN SARDINIA. QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is, in his opinion, expedient that a diplomatic representative of England should interfere so far in the internal concerns of the country to which he is accredited as to prevent the appointment of a president or commander to a patriotic armed association for the defence of the country, such as the intended Nazione Armata in Sardinia, resembling in principle our own Rifle Volunteers, without the knowledge or authority of his own Government, or without having, as far as it appears, made it distinctly intelligible that such proceeding was entirely his own, and not that of his Government.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I can only answer the question of the hon. Gentleman by saying that I think that the conduct of Sir James Hudson was perfectly right, and very becoming on his part. He has long resided in Sardinia, and he is a person who does not conceal his opinions. He was of opinion that the setting up of an armed force independent of the Government was very dangerous to the continuance of constitutional government in that country, and he made known his opinion to the King and the Government. I think he did what was quite right.

NATIONAL DEFENCES COMMISSION. QUESTION.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he wished on the part of his hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) to inquire, Whether the Commission appointed last Session to inquire into the state of the national defences has yet reported, and how soon the Report was likely to be presented to Parliament?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: In reply to my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to say that the Report is not yet in a state to be laid before Parliament. Whenever it is in a sufficiently advanced state to be laid before Parliament, I have no doubt that my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War will lay the Report before the House.

LODGING-HOUSE ACTS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he rose to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the late decision in the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, to the effect that the Common Lodging-house Acts do not extend to that country; and what course he intends to pursue in consequence of such decision?

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that the attention of the Irish law officers had been drawn to the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, the effect of that decision being that the code of law relative to common lodging houses which was applicable to England did not extend to Ireland. The Irish law officers did not concur in that judgment, but as no appeal could be made against the decision of the Court, he should ask leave next week to introduce a measure extending the Common Lodging-house Acts to Ireland.

REFORM BILL (SCOTLAND).

QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER said, he had to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Government intended to explain the provisions of the Reform Bill for Scotland, and to lay it on the table at the same time with the Bill for England and Wales?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Without giving a precise answer to the question, I may state that it is the intention of the Government that the Lord Advocate shall explain the Reform Bill for Scotland on the same day that the Reform Bill for England is brought in.

INDIAN MEDALS AND PRIZE-MONEY.

QUESTION.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR: I wish to ask the Secretary of State for India when the Indian medals are to be issued? and whether, as information has been received of the amount of Lucknow prize-money, he will state what that amount is? and also whether any steps have been taken for the payment of the batta or prize-money to the troops and seamen engaged in the battles of Bushire and Kooshab, in Persia?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the distribution of Indian medals had already begun. Each man's name had to be engraved on his medal, and considerable delay had taken place from waiting for the nominal roll from India. A delay had also taken place in consequence of the necessity for considering whether different clasps should be issued for different services. The question as regarded the relief and capture of Lucknow had only recently been decided in the affirmative, and the distribution was now going on. With regard to the Lucknow prize-money, the whole amount was £143,000; and, having received it, measures are now in progress for obtaining Her Majesty's declaration of prize, which is a necessary preliminary to any steps being taken to distribute it in proper proportions to those who were entitled to receive it. With respect to the last question, the Government received about a month ago a recommendation from the Governor-General of India that batta should be given to the forces employed in the Persian expedition. According to the arrangement made at the time with regard to this expedition, half of the cost was payable from Indian revenue and half by this country. On receiving that recommendation from the Governor-General the necessary application had been made to the Treasury to pay their half of the amount. To that application no answer has yet been received.

INDIAN MUTINY.—COMPENSATION FOR LOSSES.—QUESTION.

MR. VANSITTART said, he would beg leave to ask the right hon. Baronet when the compensation for losses sustained during the late mutiny would be given?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that it had been notified in The Calcutta Gazette of the 29th of October that a Commission had been appointed to conduct the inquiry, and register the claims of those who demanded compensation. Their decision would be final, and they were bound to conclude their inquiry within four months from a given date in November. Upon their award a date would be fixed for payment. The probability was that compensation would be made about the month of May next.

THE MILITIA.—QUESTION.

MR. FALK said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War if it is the intention of the Government to disembody any of the militia regiments now doing permanent duty? and whether he will state the gross sum that has been expended up to the present time in the purchase of land at Aldershot, the expense of erecting barracks and bringing water to them?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, it was the intention of the Government to disembody more regiments of the militia, and when he had an opportunity of moving the Army Estimates he would explain to the House the principles on which that disembodiment would take place. As to the other part of the question, there was no objection to give the information, and perhaps the hon. Gentleman would move for a Return.

On Motion that The House at its rising do adjourn to Monday,

OBSERVATION.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the case of certain officers of the army who, after having volunteered into the Land Transport Corps, did not receive the promotion that was granted to others who were similarly engaged in the same service, on the ground of their names having appeared in general orders as appointed until further orders. He wished to say a few words to show the injustice with which some of these men had been treated. It would be remembered that the corps was formed at the end of the year 1855, when Lord Panmure wrote to Sir William Codrington, who was then in command of our army in the Crimea, to organize it. The corps was organized accordingly, and General Wetherall, who made out the commissions for the officers, happened to make them out in different forms. But they all volunteered to serve about the same time, so that there could be no claims from priority, and they all undertook the same duties. Furthermore, he held in his hand letters from General Wetherall, who signed the commissions, stating that the difference in the form was accidental, and that he did not intend to make any distinction between one officer and another. Sir William Codrington had also expressed himself to the same effect. When the war was over, the case of the officers of this corps was brought before the House, and in consequence all of them received promotion, with the exception of those who were named in general orders to serve till further orders. He thought the men who served under this verbal distinction through no fault of their own had good cause to complain, and that their cause was one of extreme hardship, and as such he brought it before the House.

THE SHRUBS IN HYDE PARK.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he rose to direct the attention of the Government to the state of Hyde Park, and to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what plan the Government proposed for the ornamental cultivation of the space now vacant by the removal of shrubs and growing trees. This was a matter which concerned not merely residents in the neighbourhood, but the inhabitants of the metropolis at large, the parks having been ceded by the Crown for the pleasure and recreation of the public. In 1856, when Lord Llanover was the First Commissioner of Woods and Forests, great complaints were raised about the state of Hyde Park between the Marble Arch and Kensington Gardens, and in consequence a portion of it was planted with flowers and shrubs, very much to the satisfaction of the public. That the House of Commons also approved the arrangement was apparent from the fact that in 1857 £350 was voted for the planting of the parks, and a further sum of £1,000 to be spent on Hyde Park. The shrubs which were planted having thriven very well, and a very agreeable walk having been formed, the same course was adopted with regard to the ground between the Marble Arch and Stanhope Street Gate. Lord John Manners, upon his accession to the office of First Commissioner, continued the arrangement, and even improved upon it in some respects. Last year the Government entrusted the care of the parks with the rest of the public works to a gentleman whose name would be never mentioned in this House without the deepest feeling of regret, the late Mr. FitzRoy, who long attended to the private business of the House, and afterwards presided over their deliberations in Committee, displaying all the attributes of a thorough man of business, the strict impartiality of a judge, and the high-bred manly courtesy of an English gentleman. Mr. FitzRoy succeeded to the office in June, but was taken ill in September last, and was not cognizant, he believed, of the steps which had been taken to turn

Hyde Park into the absolute waste and place of desolation which it now appeared. One foggy evening in November a large body of navvies were sent into the park, and before morning effected the utter annihilation of the whole of the shrubs, and transformed the well-planted ground between the Marble Arch and Kensington Gardens into a dreary desert. By whom the order for that operation was given the public were not aware, but, in reply to a deputation who had waited on the First Lord of the Treasury, the noble Viscount stated that he had received an intimation from the Woods and Forests of the most extraordinary kind, and that it was the intention of the authorities of that department to transform that portion of Hyde Park which had been referred to into a nursery. He thought that anything more desolate and cheerless than a nursery in the winter time could scarcely be imagined, and he was sure that the residents of Chelsea and Brompton, where nurseries abounded, would concur in that opinion. The noble Lord further denied the statement that the place had been disturbed to meet the wishes of some influential individuals who lived in the neighbourhood, and he could pledge his credit that his right hon. Friend (Mr. FitzRoy,) from his manly tone of feeling, was the last person who would allow the public interest to be made subservient to private influence, come from what quarter it might. He was told that alterations in the park never took place without intimation to Her Majesty or to his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, the Ranger, and it was said no such intimation in this instance had been made. That, as far as he was aware, was the history of the transaction. He did not wish to attack any one, but he trusted whoever succeeded the late Commissioner of Works would direct his efforts to repair the scene of desolation which had been caused.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I am very glad that my hon. and learned Friend has brought this matter under the attention of the House, because I think it is very useful to dispel a misapprehension which appears to have been very generally entertained upon the subject to which the question relates. I must, in the first place, state how very much gratified I am—I am sure every hon. Member of this House must have been—by the testimony which my hon. and learned Friend bore to the memory of our lamented Friend Mr. FitzRoy—a

Gentleman who possessed the goodwill and respect of both sides of this House perhaps in a greater degree than has fallen to the lot of most persons who have filled public situations. For myself, I will only say that I have lost a very sincere and valued friend. But great injustice has been done to Mr. FitzRoy by the reports which have been circulated upon this subject. I have made it my business to inform myself upon that which has passed, and I must, in the first place, beg to correct a misapprehension which seems to have been communicated to my hon. and learned Friend as to the answer which I gave to the deputation which I had the honour of receiving. My hon. and learned Friend has been informed that I stated that this strip of ground was to be converted into a nursery. Well, in one sense of the word it was intended to be a nursery, inasmuch as that is a nursery which is filled with children. These walks, as we all know, are thronged with children, deriving health and amusement from the opportunities of exercise and air there afforded to them. But the simple fact is this: The arrangement made by Lord Llanover was one which greatly contributed to the beauty of the place, and to the recreation and health of the persons who frequented the park. It gave an agreeable promenade with flowers and shrubs to look at, and gravel paths well adapted to the purpose for which they were intended. It never entered into the contemplation of Mr. FitzRoy to alter that arrangement. It was, however, found that the ground, not having been prepared in the same elaborate manner in which the ground between Stanhope Gate and Hyde Park Corner had been prepared, the shrubs that had been put there had not thrived. It was the intention of Mr. FitzRoy to remove those shrubs and to replace them by others; and instead of the flowers that had been put there and had not succeeded, arrangements had been made to provide an ample supply of flowers to be planted there as soon as the season should be fit for such an operation. I am not surprised that those who walked there and saw what looked like a fallow field, not having been informed otherwise, should have become apprehensive that such was intended to be the permanent condition of the ground. But it was no more intended to be the permanent condition of the ground than a fallow field is intended to be the permanent condition in which a farm is to be maintained by the holder. It was thought that the ground having been cleared in that way during the winter would be better adapted to receive those beneficial influences which the atmosphere communicates to an exposed soil, and in the meantime preparations were made for improving the soil by manure, and by the addition of better mould ; and as soon as the season shall arrive when operations can be advantageously performed there will be put into it, according to a plan which I have seen, and which was prepared under the direction of Mr. FitzRoy, rows of shrubs, some evergreen and some flowering, and rows of flowers between them, with walks on each side ; and I venture to say that when this arrangement shall be completed the public will not only be satisfied with it as gratifying and agreeable to the eye, but will think that it is an improvement on that state of the ground which it is to replace.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that the statement of the noble Lord had given him very much pleasure. He thought, however, that in regard to the defence put forth by one of the officers of the Board of Works, that the plants did not thrive as well as was expected, some blame attached to the superintendents of the Parks. All transplanted trees required a great deal of watering, and not one of these received any attention whatever, yet owing to the ground being so carefully prepared they thrived wonderfully, and if let alone would have established themselves satisfactorily. But there was another point on which he wished to make an observation. In planting and transplanting the greatest care should be taken not to break the roots, but he thought it would be impossible to replace those shrubs again in the ground, for in taking them up, he observed they were torn up without any attempt being made to preserve their roots. Now, these plants had been brought from Kensington Gardens at an expense of £350 ; the plants were worth some two or three guineas a-piece, and he should like to know what had been done with them ? What was done could not be undone ; but it would be a great satisfaction to the public to hear of the change that had been made, and he hoped it would be persevered in.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.—QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he rose to call the attention of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to certain statements in The Times newspaper of Jan. 24, in the letters

of its "Special Correspondent," from the seat of war on the coast of Morocco, as to alleged or reported misconduct on the part of Mr. Drummond Hay, her Majesty's Consul at Tangier. He should have been quite content to ask the Question of which he had given notice in the ordinary way, but it was absolutely necessary that it should be rendered clear and intelligible, not only in justice to the gentleman whose name was principally involved, but to satisfy those who wished to maintain friendly relations between this country and Spain. Certain papers had been laid upon the table, and by them it would be found that Her Majesty's Government had watched with the greatest jealousy—almost apprehension—the conduct pursued by Spain towards Morocco, and that the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office had particularly instructed our Minister at Madrid, Mr. Buchanan, to demand explanations, on the part of our Government, of the Government of Spain upon two material points, the one was as to the time during which the Spanish Government would occupy Tangier in case their troops should obtain possession of that town, and the other was whether Spain would endeavour to make and retain any new acquisitions of territory on the shores of Morocco. He thought the noble Lord had properly discharged his duty in making those inquiries, and demanding those assurances. He would only trouble the House with two short extracts, which would satisfy them—and he was sure that the noble Lord was already satisfied—that the conduct of Spain towards this country was characterized by a spirit of loyalty and conciliation. Writing to Mr. Buchanan on the 15th of October the Foreign Secretary said :—

"Senor Collantes, in his reply of the 6th of October states that when once the treaty of peace which should put an end to the hostilities between Spain and Morocco should be ratified, the questions now existing being settled favourably, and therefore definitely, the Spanish Government, in fulfilment of their intentions, would not continue in the occupation of that fortress [Tangier], in the supposition that they should have found themselves obliged to establish themselves there in order to secure the favourable issue of their operations. You will state to M. Collantes that Her Majesty's Government accept with pleasure this assurance, as conveying the declaration which, by my despatch of the 22nd of September, you were instructed to ask for.

"The Government of the Queen my Sovereign, who have given so many and such marked proofs of their conciliatory and upright spirit in the different incidents which have sprung from the question with Morocco, will not vary the intention, which they had formed from the beginning of that question, not to occupy any point on the Straits whose position could afford to Spain a superiority dangerous to the navigation. In this matter their ideas have been always so disinterested and loyal that they cannot believe that any doubt can have been conceived with regard to them."

No answer to this despatch appeared in the papers; but its language was so fair and so loyal that the noble Lord, if he did send any answer, could not but have given it in the same terms as before, and expressed his entire satisfaction. Seeing, therefore, that Spain had done all in her power to disarm the suspicious and satisfy the apprehensions of our Government, it would be conceded that the least to be expected from our Government was that it should avoid even the semblance of hostility or unfairness towards Spain, either in its diplomatic language or in the acts of its agents in Morocco; and if any belief existed in the minds of the Spaniards that they or their agents had not acted with perfect fairness and impartiality the British Government ought to be very glad of an opportunity of removing it. Such an opportunity he would now give to the noble Lord by reading an extract from a letter of the Special Correspondent of The Times at the seat of War in Morocco, published in that paper on the 24th of January. This was the extract:—

"The Spaniards persist in complaining bitterly of Mr. Drummond Hay, to whom they impute divers practices unfavourable to their cause. He is accused of supplying the Moors with ammunition, of assisting them with his counsels, of superintending (himself in a Moorish costume) certain of their preparations. It is further stated that he has had to do with the engagement of two English engineers, who construct military works. The vessels which convey cattle from Tangier to Gibraltar return thence with powder and other warlike stores. It was by his direction that the Moorish batteries at San Martin aimed the other day at the screws of the Spanish steamers employed in bombarding them. If they did not succeed in hitting them it was their fault, not that of the British Consul at Tangier. Mr. Hay also draws up the Emperor's diplomatic documents addressed to foreign Powers. Of the truth or falsehood of the above charges, of all or any of them, I know nothing whatever. . . . But it is well to let you know of the accusations in question, because they are not mere matters of gossip and camp talk, but are seriously brought forward and maintained by persons in responsible and important positions here, who declare that they know them to be true, and give it to be understood that they are derived from trustworthy agents of the Spanish Government; also, because I am not without reasons to believe that the information in question, whether true or false, obtains credit from the Government. The exasperation felt against Mr. Hay is great, and if the Spaniards get to Tangier I would advise him on their approach to leave that place. It has been insinuated in some quarters that in acting as he is said to have done, and to be doing, he is only obeying the orders of his superiors; but a more general belief, or at least the one I most frequently hear expressed here, is that he is merely pursuing the bent of his inclinations, and that his Government either does not know of or does not heed his conduct."

Mr. Maguire

Of the truth or falsehood of these charges he had no means of judging; but it appeared that these rumours had obtained credit with the Spanish Government, and that there was a strong feeling of exasperation against England in high quarters in that country. That the charges were grave enough to demand a prompt explanation from the British Government, he ventured to think the House would admit. If they were unfounded Mr. Hay ought to feel indebted to the Special Correspondent of The Times for giving him an opportunity of denying the charge; but if any of them were true the Government had no other course to pursue but to express at once in the strongest terms their indignation at and repudiation of such conduct, and at once to dismiss from their service an individual who had so unworthily betrayed the trust confided to him. Before sitting down he could not refrain from expressing his warm sympathy with that gallant nation which had once been the strongest bulwark of Christendom against the Mahomedan, and he rejoiced to see that in this contest with the Moors—whatever might have been the origin of it—she was displaying her old historic valour and the lofty and enthusiastic spirit which had formerly distinguished her as a nation in bygone times. He wished therefore, to ask, whether any facts had come to the knowledge of the Government which would justify the belief that the British consul had in any way violated that strict neutrality which should be maintained by the official representative of this country in relation to both of the belligerent powers, Spain and Morocco.

MR. LIDDELL said, that as he was in possession of certain information derived from very good authority, which he should be happy to show any Gentleman who desired to see it, he hoped the House would allow him to interfere for a few moments between them and the answer to the Question of the hon. Member for the purpose of stating one or two facts which would place

Mr. Hay's conduct in a different light from that in which it was represented by the extract just read by the hon. Gentleman. With regard to Mr. Hay's partiality, that gentleman had strongly urged upon the Moorish Government the necessity, not to say the propriety, of sparing the Spanish prisoners, and through his interference the Moorish authorities had offered a price of £3 for each living Spaniard brought in, whereas the price formerly given was £1 for each head. Through his exertions the lives of a number of Spanish prisoners had been spared. It was through his intervention that the families of Jews and Spaniards had been permitted to depart unmolested from Morocco with their property; and in consequence of his having remained on the spot, with the sanction of the British and Spanish Governments, the houses of the persons who had so left were protected and the Roman Catholic chapel was secured from outrage. As illustration of the good effects which had resulted from the presence of Mr. Hay, he might mention that a Moor had been flogged round the town for attempting to enter a house forcibly, and that in December last, when a French vessel was wrecked some distance down the coast, that gentleman most promptly sent the authorities to the spot, had the mariners rescued from the violence of the natives, and sent them to the French Admiral and Consul at Gibraltar. These were facts which he believed to be authentic, and he had felt it his duty not to withhold them from the House when the character of an absent official appeared to be impugned—at least, when it had been made the object outside that House of malignant aspersions.

FRENCH ARMAMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. A. W. KINGLAKE: Sir, I have studied how to frame the Question which I am about to put in a way which shall not be considered as expressing a querulous distrust, but rather, so far as is capable of being accomplished in a matter of this kind, something like confidence in the present Administration, and at the same time to indicate an opinion that we ought not to enter upon the discussion of the budget in the absence of that knowledge which, more than any other, is important to enable us to come to a right decision. On Monday next the House of Commons is to be called upon to give its sanction to a Treaty which is to bring us into more intimate relations with the Empire of France, and we are to be asked at the same time to consider those arrangements which the Chancellor of the Exchequer will produce to us with a view of meeting the vast expenses which we have been obliged to incur in consequence of the present state of Europe. The cause which makes it necessary to incur this outlay is no secret to any man; everybody is aware that it has arisen from the fact that in the present phase of the French Revolution, a vast concentration of power has taken place, and that the Emperor of the French wields the whole resources of France, not through Statesmen or Ministers, but in a way which makes it impossible to know what his intentions are, except in so far as one is able to divine them from the probable use of the great armaments which he is preparing. I sincerely believe that almost the entire of Europe, including the great country of France, fervently desires the continuance of peace; but I cannot forget that last year Europe, including then as well as now the great country of France, desired the continuance of peace with an intensity equal to that by which it is at present animated. That wish was frustrated by circumstances which are so recent that it is needless further to allude to them; but what occurred may be stated in one short sentence—Austria madly and foolishly began the war, but it was the Emperor of the French who began the quarrel. It is not for me to say whether Europe has been taught or misled by the experience of last year, but to every hon. Gentleman holding correspondence with the Continent it must be known that a general idea is prevalent that the peace of Europe is again about to be disturbed, and that schemes are on foot for altering territorial arrangements, independent of those modifications which may have to be carried out in Italy. Although there may be other grounds for these apprehensions, the anxiety that is felt is mainly due to the armaments existing throughout Europe, and it may be readily believed that the uneasiness which prevails on the Continent speedily makes itself felt in this country. It is, of course, to be observed that there may have been exaggeration as to many points which we have heard; for those who busy themselves in communicating intelligence to England are, for the most part, unfriendly to the present Government of France, and to view all the actions of the Emperor with a jaundiced eye. But it does appear to me that it must rest in the power of Her Majesty's Foreign Office to dispel this anxiety in a great measure, or, if not to dispel it, at all events to convert what is now a vague sentiment of fear into a rational, wise, and persistent vigilance. My observation of the military preparations of France enables me to make one remark, which may exercise, in one respect, a reassuring tendency. Many persons entertain the opinion that wild incursions, descents, and small expeditions of a marauding character may be attempted on our coast, and that in this manner, without any serious consequences to either country, great mischief might be effected. Now, Sir, to do justice to the present ruler of France, I do not believe that it is consistent with his policy to do anything in a small way; and, therefore, if I could be convinced that no large armaments were in preparation, I should rest assured that the peace of Europe was not about to be disturbed. Great preparations cannot be made in an hour, and cannot go on in corners, so that if I should succeed in obtaining from the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) anything like an assurance that no vast preparations are at present going on in France, it follows that we have established a great ground of security. Unfortunately, the information which reaches me as a private individual is not of such a reassuring kind as I should hope to receive from the noble Lord. It is the practice of the French Government to make known their intention to raise new levies some time beforehand to the prefects of the departments; and I am informed that they have received notice that a levy of 140,000 men is to take place for the purpose of what is called remplacement. I am also told that the Emperor of the French has for the present refused to give the congé to some 40,000 men who, under ordinary circumstances, would have been sent to their homes some weeks since. The consequence is that by this new levy and by the retention of this large body of trained soldiers, the military forces of France will be next spring on a most formidable footing. I am assured—though this in like manner is, perhaps, an exaggeration—that the Emperor of the French will then be prepared to take the field with a force of no less than 600,000 men. In addition, I have been informed that great preparations are being urged forward for the supply of horse transports on the north coast of France. Then, if I turn from the military to the naval armaments, I find that this unfortunate battle of the dock-

yards, if I may so call it, is being carried on with unceasing pertinacity: and that at the very moment when the hon. Member for Rochdale, (Mr. Cobden) was carrying on what he supposed to be a very friendly intercourse with the Emperor of the French, His Majesty was devoting his mind, with great earnestness, to a pursuit which would indicate that he was preparing for some species of conflict which would have to be decided by iron vessels. When such are the reports which reach the ears of private individuals, I think I am not doing wrong in giving the noble Lord an opportunity of correcting what I hope may turn out to be very false and exaggerated statements, thereby enabling us to enter upon the discussion on Monday with that knowledge which it is most important for us to possess of the preparations which the Emperor of the French is really making. I do not make anything like a complaint against the Emperor of the French; I merely desire the information as a dry piece of statistics, which will enable me to arrive at the conclusion that I shall next week be called upon to form more satisfactorily than any other information could possibly do; and it will be to my mind more cogent than any speech with which the matchless eloquence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer may lead him to favour us. I shall therefore conclude by asking the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it will be consistent with the interests of the public service to communicate to the House any of the information which has reached the Foreign Office in respect to the military and naval preparations of the Emperor of the French; and if so, whether such information can be communicated before the financial statement which it is proposed to deliver on Monday?

COLONEL KNOX said, he wished, before the noble Lord answered the question, to ask him whether the Treaty of Commerce had been ratified—as he supposed it had been—and whether that Treaty had been signed, as was reported, by an hon. Member of that House, who was, however, not responsible for the transaction, as not being at all connected with the Ministry. He wished also to know whether the Treaty would be laid on the table between this and Monday.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, With respect to the first question put by the hon. Member for Dungarvon (Mr. Maguire), I can have no hesitation in stating that Mr. Drummond Hay is a gentleman of the highest honour and character. He, with other members of his family, have been long in the service of the Crown. He has, therefore, had much experience of public life, and knows too well his duty to the Crown to take any course inconsistent with the general and avowed policy of Her Majesty's Government. From his long residence in Morocco—indeed, I believe he was born there—and his kindness to all who hold any intercourse with him, he has gained to a great degree the respect of the people of that country, not only of the Foreign Minister of the Emperor of Morocco, who was formerly a merchant, but of the wild tribes of natives who so frequently made incursions into the Spanish settlements. Having this influence, I believe that he, according to instructions from Her Majesty's Government, endeavoured to prevent the breaking out of war between Spain and Morocco. He endeavoured to prevent this war by advising every concession he thought possible, till he was told by the Moorish Minister that, whatever advice might be given, Morocco could not, consistently with the honour of the Sultan, make any further concessions. Mr. Drummond Hay did exert himself to the utmost, and used the influence he had so justly acquired to prevent the outbreak of hostilities. Since that time, it being the policy of Her Majesty's Government to be neutral in the war, his conduct has been in strict conformity with his instructions, as the representative of a neutral Power. The hon. Member has read a report from the correspondent of The Times newspaper, a very respectable gentleman, I believe; but he is in the Spanish camp, and can hear nothing but what he is told by Spaniards. They have stated various matters, which the correspondent repeats, but he says that he knows nothing of them, and admits that he has no proof of them whatever. I have not heard from Mr. Drummond Hay since he had an opportunity of seeing these statements in the newspaper, but I have not a doubt they are one and all entirely false. I do not believe that Mr. Drummond Hay has violated his duty or taken any part in the war. The Spanish Minister did on one occasion state to Mr. Buchanan that complaints had been made of the partiality of Mr. Drummond Hay; but he gave no instance of such partiality, nor any proof of it whatever. We are aware that the Spanish Government in this war has obtained the aid of British merchants, and that the Spanish army has been supplied with British stores and provisions. Any complaints, therefore, of a violation of neutrality might more justly be made by the Government of Morocco than by the Government of Spain. I believe that the conduct of Mr. Drummond Hay has been entirely free from blame. I do not wish to say which party in this war is right; but I cannot sympathize with the enthusiasm of the hon. Gentleman in regard to it. I do not think, because one party is Christian and the other Mahomedan, we ought to give the former all our sympathy, without reference to the causes or merits of the quarrel. I will now refer to the questions of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Kinglake). He has stated much with regard to the late war in Italy, and the present state of Europe, which this is not the proper occasion to discuss, but which may hereafter come under consideration. All I can say with regard to the other part of the subject is, that we have in Paris a very able Ambassador, and a military attaché to the embassy, possessing great knowledge and experience of the French army. From neither one nor the other has Her Majesty's Government received any account of any extraordinary military preparations in France. As for the statement of 600,000 men to be in readiness for the field by the spring, there is nothing at all to corroborate it. A great number of men may be called on to serve in the French army by conscription, but it must be remembered that a general conscription takes place in the course of every year. The hon. and learned Gentleman must recollect that the peace of Zurich has not long been signed, and the Congress that was summoned for the purpose of rendering the pacification of Italy solid and durable, has not been held. It is therefore desirable, while peace is so recent and the affairs of Italy have not yet settled down, to use every means to prevent a renewal of the war, or any collision in Italy that might excite it. Her Majesty's Government has recently been engaged in efforts to secure the permanence of that peace; and I can state that everything that has been done has proved most satisfactory. We have represented to the Government of Sardinia the danger of any collision with Austria on the territory of Venetia or elsewhere; and I have to-day received an assurance from the Sardinian Government that it will do nothing tending to provoke a renewal of hostilities. On the one hand, there is reason to believe that France is far from desirous that there should be any renewal of the war; and the Government of the Emperor is exerting itself earnestly and unremittingly to secure the solidity and permanence of the peace. On the other hand Austria, though unwilling, as might be supposed, to acquiesce in the present state of Italy, is by no means disposed to renew the war by making any attack on the Powers in possession of the country. Without venturing to predict what will be the course of events in the next year, I may say that the present aspect of affairs is favourable; nor is there any reason to suppose that France is making the enormous military preparations my hon. Friend has referred to. With regard to the naval armaments of France and the great activity described as prevailing in them, we all know that a great change has taken place in the character of naval warfare. It is made a matter of speculation in books and pamphlets what the character of the next naval war will be, and every one seems convinced that it will not resemble the nature of those that are past. The Government of the late King of the French, Louis Philippe, drew up a plan for increasing the strength of the French navy; every ruler of France, for nearly the last 100 years, has endeavoured to increase and strengthen its marine. They have all considered, naturally enough, that France ought to be a great maritime Power. There is great activity also in our own docks and armaments. Both England and France are endeavouring to be strong at sea, not with a view to any rivalry, but from a belief that each nation ought to maintain its ancient character. I cannot say, therefore, that the naval preparations of France ought to be a matter of jealousy to us. If the two nations agreed that there should be no such preparations and no strong navy, we might expect France to follow our course in that respect; but, while France determines to make herself strong at sea, and we like to have a strong navy also, I do not think it is a reason why the two nations should have any dispute with each other. In reply to the question of the hon. and gallant Member for Duncannon (Colonel Knox), I have to state that the ratifications of the treaty which he mentions will take place to-morrow (Saturday), and that a copy will be laid on the table of the House on Monday next. I may add that the persons who were employed, and who received full powers to negotiate that treaty, were Lord Cowley and Mr. Cobden.

DISEMBODIMENT OF THE MILITIA.

OBSERVATIONS.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he rose pursuant to notice to call the attention of the Secretary of State for War to the hardships entailed on the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men, of the embodied militia regiments by their sudden disembodiment. He could not but regret that regiments which it had taken such time, trouble, and expense to bring to their present state of discipline should be wantonly disembodied. A sufficient reason for such a step was, he might be told, to be found in the fact that a certain number of regiments of the line were about to return from India; but it should be borne in mind that those regiments were but mere skeletons, and would, as a consequence, by no means supply the deficiency which the proposed disembodiment of militia would create. Perhaps he might be told that economy must be considered, and that, to use a familiar phrase, they must "cut their coat according to the cloth;" but he could not admit the force of that argument, especially when he saw the expenses that were incurred in other departments of the State. He could not understand how, under any circumstances, economy could justify injustice. It was a great hardship that the senior officers, who had in many instances sacrificed their domestic comfort,—that the junior officers, many of whom had frequently spent three or four years in learning the duties of their position,—and that the sergeants and men, who had nobly come forward at the call of their country, but whose training had unfitted them for the discharge of those duties which they had previously performed, should receive so sudden an intimation that their military services were so soon to be dispensed with. Perhaps they would be told that this was a time of peace; but after the statement just made by the noble Lord, he thought it was too soon to disband this portion of so newly-raised a force at present. He would give all credit to the Emperor of the French as a loyal ally, and as the last man to attempt the invasion of this country; but, great man as he was, he was still the creature of circumstances. France had entirely delivered herself up to the will of one man, and a country in such a case could not be implicitly trusted on every oo-

casion. He (Colonel Dickson) did not, of course, mean to contend that the militia should be made a permanent institution of the country, but he was at the same time prepared to maintain that the various regiments of which it was composed ought not to be disbanded without sufficient notice. The subject was therefore one which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would take into his consideration and place the militia on such a footing that they might know what duties it was intended that they should perform.

JERSEY COMMISSION.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HADFIELD said, he rose to call attention to the Commission for inquiry concerning the laws of Jersey, and to inquire of the Secretary of State for the Home Department why the Commissioners had not pursued their inquiries in Jersey since August last? why had they not already investigated the law affecting land tenure, and concerning bankruptcy and insolvency in the island? also, Whether the Commissioners were continuing their labours, and when their Report would be made? A Commission, embracing these topics, had been appointed by the late Government, and the announcement was received with great joy by the inhabitants of the island. Ever since August last, however, they had ceased to pursue the investigation, and great inconvenience had in consequence been occasioned. He might add, that when they adjourned they had arrived at a point of the inquiry which was of great interest to the inhabitants of Jersey—the law connected with the tenure of land—and that he could discover no good reason why they should have allowed a period of more than five months to elapse without resuming the duties which they had been appointed to discharge. It was of great importance to the district that this Commission should be speedily executed, and two Royal Commissions, involving much more labour than this, had, since it was issued, completed their inquiries and made their Reports. The adjournment had been made to January, but January had passed and nothing further had been heard on the subject. In these circumstances he had felt it his duty, at the request of the inhabitants of Jersey, to call the attention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the delay which had taken place.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, a Commission, consisting of three persons, at the head of which was Sir John Awdry, a retired Indian Judge, had been appointed to inquire into the laws of the island of Jersey. The Commissioners visited the island in the course of the summer and autumn, and at the end of August they left the island. Having brought their inquiries to a conclusion they had since been employed in the preparation of their Report, and he had been assured by the Secretary of the Commission that it was in a state of forwardness, and that it would be presented at no distant period. With regard to the questions of land tenure, and of bankruptcy and insolvency, the Commissioners had made inquiry on those subjects, and were in possession of documentary evidence on those matters. The hon. Gentleman was doubtless aware, that though he had a strong opinion as to the policy of assimilating the law of Jersey to that of England, the people of Jersey had a strong attachment to the old laws and traditions of their country. When this Commission was appointed he believed it was understood that it should not sit longer than a year. He was not, however, at that moment able to specify the particular time when the Report would be ready.

NAVIGATION OF THE GODAVERY.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. J. B. SMITH* rose to call the attention of the House to the importance to the commerce and manufactures of this country of opening up the navigation of the river Godavery, and to ask the Secretary of State for India what were the intentions of the Government in respect thereof. The hon. Member said the Godavery valley is one of the richest portions of Central India, and has an area about four times that of Ireland. It abounds in iron and timber. It produces corn, rice, oil seeds, and sugar; but what he particularly wished to call attention to was, that it also produced flax, hemp, and cotton. The manufactures of this country were increasing so rapidly that the consumption of raw materials was overtaking their production. It was, therefore, natural that our manufacturers should look to those places which could supply them with the raw materials, especially if they happened to be, as in this case, under the dominion of the British Crown. Hon. Gentlemen connected with the linen trade of Ireland and Scotland would inform the House that the progress of that important manufacture was absolutely stopped for want of an adequate supply of flax and hemp, and as regarded cotton, who could look with unconcern at what was now passing in the Southern States of America, especially when he reflected that eight-tenths of the cotton consumed by our manufacturers last year came from those States? Some Gentlemen perhaps might say, that this was a Manchester question, and no doubt it was. But he asked the House whether a manufacture, which amounted to upwards of £60,000,000 per annum in value, was not also a question of great national interest and importance; and was it not the duty of Parliament to secure, as far as possible, this vast manufacture from accidents in the supply of the raw material? There was abundant evidence that India could furnish all the cotton we require. Dr. Forbes Watson, the botanist of the India Department, estimates that India already grows nearly double the quantity of cotton grown in America. India, however, had to clothe 200,000,000 of her own population, and she had only a small quantity left for exportation. The principal discouragement to growing cotton for exportation was the enormous expense of conveying it to market; to obviate this, good roads and cheap water-carriage were wanted. As an illustration of the state of the roads he would read a short extract from a letter from Line and Co., of Madras, dated in October last. They said:—

“If Government will only give us roads in the Tinnivelly district, our exports would increase rapidly. It is a melancholy sight to see heavy cartloads of cotton dragged across country; the produce is so bulky that in swaying from side to side it strains carts to pieces, and the bullocks drag it over mounds of earth, and through ditches and ruts, in a way which is painful to witness. All this loss of carts and cattle, and the delays of such a mode of carriage, must of course be borne by the cotton. It is difficult to estimate the annual loss both to the district and the trade.”

The roads all over India were in a similar condition, and we were entirely shut out from the finest cotton district of India by the bad state of the roads and the cost of carriage. The American planters had great advantages in this respect over those in India. Cotton was brought 1,000 miles down the Mississippi to a port of shipment for one-eighth of a penny per pound, or about 5 per cent on its value. From Berar the carriage by bad roads costs 100 per cent. on its value. The river Godavery leads to Berar, where the largest quantity and the finest quality of cotton is grown.

Mr. J. B. Smith

Captain Haigh, a gentleman of great ability, who was examined before the India Colonization Committee, and who had surveyed the Godavery, stated it could be made navigable for a distance of 500 miles for about £300,000, and that cotton could then be brought from Berar to a port of shipment for one-eighth of a penny per pound, thus placing the American and Indian planter on the same footing in respect of the carriage of cotton. Since Captain Haigh had given his evidence he had visited the navigable rivers of Europe, having previously visited all the river and water communications of America, and he returned with the conviction that there were fewer obstacles to be overcome in the Godavery than had been overcome in European rivers, and before his return to India he felt it his duty to address a letter to the Secretary of State for India, to endeavour to impress upon him the importance of opening up the Godavery to the commerce of this country. In this letter he pointed out, in addition to the commercial, the advantages of this great work in a military point of view. Besides the saving in time in the conveyance of troops and stores by the river, the saving in expense would pay the interest on the outlay of making it navigable. He further stated that the Government would be large gainers by the increased sale of salt. Salt was a Government monopoly in India. It was to be regretted that the necessities of the Government had compelled them to place an additional tax upon this indispensable of life; but the greatest tax which the people of India had to pay on salt was the cost of conveyance. Captain Haigh stated that salt sold at Nangpore at 90 rupees per ton, and sometimes as high as 160 rupees in that district. The Government price for salt was 25 rupees, and if the Godavery were navigable it could be carried at 5 rupees a ton. The opening up of this river, therefore, would enable the people to pay the increased tax on salt, and still to obtain it at less than half the price they paid for it at present. The increase in the consumption would be enormous, and of course the gain of the Government would be in proportion. The increase in the revenue on salt is estimated at £64,000 a year, an amount that would pay the interest on the outlay on the river more than three times over. He (Mr. Smith) ought to state that there had been much controversy on the part of the civilians in India as to the practicability of opening up the Godavery, and as to the profits on the works of irrigation. His hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) late chairman of the East India Company, was of opinion that it was impracticable to make the Godavery navigable. The hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Smollet) says "that such projects as the opening up the navigation of the river Godavery in order to reach the cotton fields of Berar seems to be an undertaking of the most impolitic character, inexpedient in the present financial condition of India, and of very doubtful utility when completed." But Sir Charles Trevelyan, the Governor of Madras, in order to test these various opinions had visited these districts, taking with him engineers and scientific men, and on his return he stated in a minute that he considered the works of such great public importance that he should feel it his duty to visit them every year whilst he remained Governor of the Province. He said the Godavery ran through the most fertile region of Central India. That the opening of this river would be equivalent to the opening of a new trade to the extension of which no limits could be assigned. He (Mr. Smith) thought he had proved the practicability and importance of opening up the Godavery. This great work would enable us to obtain ample supplies of cotton conveyed at a cheap rate from the finest district in India, and would do much to preserve us from those accidents which may arise to the supply of this important raw material. For these reasons he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India what were the intentions of the Government in this matter, and if he answered that it was their intention to open the navigation of the Godavery, he would further ask when? It was necessary to make this inquiry as to the time when the work was to be commenced, because Sir Charles Trevelyan, while he strongly recommended it, added that he hoped the state of the revenue would soon enable the Government to proceed with the work. Now, were they to wait until there was a surplus revenue for the commencement of this work? It had been the policy of the East India Company to make their public works out of the revenue, but he (Mr. J. B. Smith) hoped that would not be the policy of the Queen's Government in India. He could give many instances of the injurious effects of this policy, but he would only mention one as a sample of scores of a similar kind. Tankaria Bunder, in Western India, was a place where there were considerable shipments of cotton. For twenty years there had been complaints, that for want of a wharf there, cotton had to be rolled through the mud to the boats, the consequence was, that the cotton was more or less damaged by the wet. It was estimated that the loss sustained in this way amounted in twenty years to £10,000. Now, the cost of making a wharf was only £2,000, and the Government had at length consented to execute this small work, but if they had to wait until there was a surplus revenue, they might continue to roll cotton in the mud at Tankaria for twenty years longer. It was a false policy to make reproductive public works out of revenue, since it was always impossible to calculate when a work was commenced how long it would be before it was finished. It was notorious that public works in India cost in many cases double the amount they would have cost if the means of completing them had been uninterruptedly provided. The only legitimate fund for reproductive public works was loans, and he had no hope of seeing any great improvement in India, until that course was adopted. The finances of India were at present in a very embarrassed condition, but he (Mr. J. B. Smith) was not one of those who had any fears that India was unable to discharge all her obligations great as they were. When he saw the vast undeveloped resources of India, and the poverty of the people, it appeared to him that the only way to extricate the country from its difficulties was to increase the tax-paying power of the people by means of increased and cheap facilities of conveyance, and by great public works, which could not be executed except by public loans for the special purpose.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he was anxious to say a few words in reply to the Questions which had been put to him in the course of that discussion. With regard to the disembodiment of the militia regiment, which the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Dickson) so worthily and successfully commanded, he could only say it was always very painful for the Government to come to a decision that would be distasteful or operate to the prejudice of individuals; but the interests of the public service necessarily overrode all considerations of that kind, and he had taken the earliest opportunity of communicating to the gallant Officer the conclusion at which they had arrived. He had stated last year, in moving the Army Estimates, that in his opinion a large and continuous embodiment of the militia, in time of peace, was radically wrong in principle. It was unwise to anticipate the resources which ought to be kept in reserve for periods of emergency, and the militia was a force only required when the regular army was abroad. Holding that opinion, he followed the course that he had announced—namely, that of gradually disembodying the militia regiments in proportion as the regular troops were available for taking their place. This operation was necessarily very uncertain, and was retarded in the present instance by the requirements of India, and to the demand upon our regular force caused by the recent unfortunate calamity in China. With regard to the claims of officers of the Land Transport Corps, a Committee of that House had sat, before which was brought the case of certain officers who had entered that corps under very peculiar circumstances, and who at the conclusion of the Crimean War were dismissed from that service. The Committee went carefully through the matter, and divided the cases into certain classes, making recommendations as to the manner in which those different classes should be treated by the Government. The War Office, then presided over by his predecessor, applied to the Treasury for the funds requisite for carrying out those recommendations; and after a good deal of correspondence all the claims were satisfied which were recommended by that Committee. That corps was raised on the distinct understanding that it was only to be continued during the Russian War, and engagements for two years, with very high pay, were given in certain instances. On the return of peace it became necessary to dissolve the corps; but the case of those officers to whom a Committee of that House recommended that compensation should be paid differed from that of those officers of whom the Committee took no notice, and with respect to whom it made no recommendation. Among others there was the case of men who had given up situations in the Civil Service which carried the right to a pension, and who, when they lost their position in the Land Transport Corps, were left without the expectation either of the pension which their civil situation would have given them, or of the half-pay which military employment conferred. There were other cases to which he need not particularly refer, but the position of those gentlemen was this, that they were merely

appointed "until further orders." The hon. Member had quoted a letter from Colonel Wetherall to show that these gentlemen were to be treated in the same manner as the others. But in this impression Colonel Wetherall was entirely wrong, for the arrangement was only a provisional one, and the gallant Officer could have no means of knowing what course the Government intended ultimately to take. To illustrate how little claim existed on the part of the officers in whose favour the Committee did not report, he would mention a single instance. Lieutenant Delamere, a very respectable person, was an ensign in the 21st Regiment of Foot, when he joined the Land Transport Corps, of which he was made a captain till further orders. He, however, still remained on the strength of his regiment, so much so that he actually received promotion in it during the time he was acting as captain in the Land Transport Corps. He became a lieutenant, and was sent back to his regiment. He stands in no worse position than anybody else; he gained his promotion. But to make him a captain over the heads of all the other officers, who were constantly under fire and in the trenches, while he was not, would surely be very unjust. The House of Commons, therefore, having given this subject its best consideration, and the recommendations of the Select Committee having been adopted—in carrying out which, indeed, the Government had gone even further than its own sense of justice might, perhaps, have induced it to go—he thought they could not now reopen the question of the claims of these officers.

COLONEL SYKES observed that after what had fallen from the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith), he wished to say that his hon. Friend had evidently mistaken his opinions as he was a strenuous advocate for the opening of all communication in India, by land or by water, though he thought that ought to be done with the means of the country. His opinion had always been that the opening out of the Godavery was quite practicable, because nothing was impracticable to engineering science, but that the cost of its execution would exceed reasonable bounds. But recurring to the questions he had to put; the recent mutiny had deranged Indian finance. The interest on the Government loans was in 1856 and 1857, 4 per cent, but the Government had immediately to open a 5 per cent loan. Finding that even that increase would not take, they were obliged to offer $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., with an undertaking not to pay off for 26 years. They consented also to accept the new loan half in paper and half in money, thereby raising the previous loans to $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Still, these terms were found insufficient, and the Government in India were obliged to write to the home authorities for assistance. Very luckily, there was a better appreciation of the real capabilities of India in the money-market of this country than in that of Calcutta; and the result was that the $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. loan while at a discount of 4 per cent in India, was a few days ago at a premium of $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in England. The finances of India were now paying $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for a loan that could be obtained here at 4 per cent. The five per cent loan open in Calcutta now stood at 103. All contributions to it were to the damage of the finances of India, and he therefore desired to know whether it was the intention of the Secretary of State to direct that it should be immediately closed. He also wished to be informed by the right hon. Gentleman whether the unanimous recommendation of the Governor-General and his Council that batta should be granted to the troops of the Persian expedition, as had been done in the case of the first Burmah expedition, of the China expedition, and of the capture of Delhi and Lucknow, would receive his sanction; and whether the three officers of the 3rd Bombay Native Light Cavalry, who so greatly distinguished themselves in the charge upon a regiment of Persian Infantry formed in square at the battle of Kooshab, near Bushire, would receive the Victoria Cross?

MEDICAL RELIEF EXPENDITURE IN IRELAND.—OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. DAWSON said, he was anxious to call the attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the House to the concluding paragraph of the Report of the Select Committee of 1858 on county rates in Ireland, containing the recommendation that the Government should take into consideration the propriety of sanctioning half the medical relief expenditure of the Irish Poor Law Unions to be charged on the Consolidated Fund, in a manner similar to that practised in England and Scotland, instead of throwing the entire burden of the outlay upon the rate-payers. That Committee was composed of

thirteen Members, six of whom were English and Scotch, and it was presided over by the hon. Baronet the Member for East Somersetshire (Sir W. Miles). The Report of that Committee completely justified the view of the case taken by the late hon. Member for Antrim, a gentleman always remarkable for his assiduity in protecting Irish interests, who moved for that inquiry in June, 1858. He was happy to say that during the last year the State made itself responsible for the expense of certain criminal prosecutions and the maintenance of misdemeanants, as also the costs of prosecutions, and the expenses of witnesses at assizes and sessions, a burden which had been previously thrown upon the local rate-payers. He did not think it necessary to refer to that part of the Report relating to schoolmasters, in respect of whom a certain modified assistance had been given by the National Board of Education in Ireland, when the schools of the Union were placed under their inspection. He would confine himself to the case of the half medical relief in respect to which the Report stated that that Committee were of opinion that though no promise had been held out by the late Sir Robert Peel that the half medical relief in the Irish poor-law unions should be secured under the same law as that relating to England and Scotland, nevertheless, inasmuch as the system in regard to Ireland was altered in the month of January, 1852, so as to assimilate the law of Ireland to that of England and Scotland, the Committee recommended the House to take into consideration the case of the half-cost of the medical men in those unions, with the view of throwing the payment upon the Consolidated Fund. Now, it never was alleged that any such distinct promise had been made by the late Sir Robert Peel, but it was considered but justice that this expense should be defrayed in the same manner as that of Scotland and England. The number of dispensary districts was 716, at an average cost of £45 each, being the half salary of the medical officers which varies generally from £80 to £90 per annum. The whole sum amounted to about £32,000 a year. That sum was not large, but it was still important as regarding equal justice to all parts of the United Kingdom, and the payment of which by the Consolidated Fund would give a practical relief to the poorer rate-payers. Since 1846, Ireland, until last year, received no credit for the remission of those local charges which were recommended by the late Sir Robert Peel, in his statement on the subject of the corn laws. He was, however, unwilling to blame the successive Governments for this omission. He thought the blame more properly rested upon the Irish grand juries, who neglected making the demand for such relief. He therefore appealed to the right hon. Gentleman for his assistance in effecting a remedy for those complaints, and for his support with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, himself a member of that Select Committee, to obtain, under the prospective financial arrangements of the nation, a parity of exemptions in the local burdens of the two countries.

MR. CARDWELL said, in the course of the year just expired the Treasury had given full effect to the recommendations of the Committee referred to by the hon. Gentleman, upon which they had been unanimous. With regard to the concluding paragraph of the Report to which the hon. Gentleman called his attention, he would remind him that the recommendation contained therein was only carried in the Committee by a majority of four to three, the chairman, upon whose report it was an amendment, having been precluded from voting, so that it might be said that the Committee were tolerably equally divided upon the point. The Committee, were, however, unanimous in that part of their Report regarding the financial arrangements of 1846 as to certain remissions of taxation of local rates. As regarded the expense of certain prosecutions and the maintenance of prisoners, the Government had already acted upon the recommendations. Sir Robert Peel had promised two allowances out of the Consolidated Fund to Great Britain, namely, one-half, the charge of the medical officers, and one-half the charge of schoolmasters in unions. His hon. Friend (Mr. Dawson) asked for a sum of £32,000 to put Ireland in a particular respect on an equality with England; but Ireland was allowed the moiety formerly paid by the ratepayers of that country towards the maintenance of the constabulary. Pursuant to Sir Robert Peel's promise, the entire expense of the constabulary in Ireland, amounting to an annual sum of £350,000 per annum, was now paid out of the Consolidated Fund. England received no corresponding sum to that; a circumstance which he hoped his hon. Friend would consider when asking for a sum of not one-tenth that amount, on the ground that Ireland ought to receive equally with England the advantage of a particular payment out of the Consolidated Fund. On the whole, he thought Ireland had no reason to complain.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL OF INDIA.

QUESTION.

MR. W. EWART said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether Her Majesty's Government had given their consideration to the importance of introducing into the Legislative Council of India representatives of the Commercial Class and the class of British settlers, as well as of the Natives of India? also to the importance of an annual statement being made by the executive Government in India of the financial state of the Government, and of the publication of the same for the information of the public in India?

THE FRENCH EMIGRATION SCHEME.

QUESTION.

MR. CAVE said, he wished to ask the Minister for India a Question relative to a projected treaty with France, enabling that country to draw a supply of labour for her colonies from our Indian territories. Knowing that Sir Frederick Rogers was in Paris last year for the purpose of arranging the terms of the treaty in question, and that he returned to England without having succeeded in the object of his mission, he had hoped and imagined that the design had been entirely abandoned. But certain remarks by a noble Lord in "another place" on Friday evening last had shown him that the scheme was still under consideration. He would briefly state what the project was. Shortly after the emancipation of slaves in the French colonies, consequent upon the revolution of 1848, similar results took place to those which were experienced in our own plantations. The emancipated negroes showed a natural repugnance to that agricultural labour which was their lot during slavery, and retired in large numbers from the estates. It was also well known that the remedies so confidently suggested in our own case of high wages on the one side, or Government interference on the other, proved unavailing to induce them to return. Accordingly, the French planters were obliged to follow the example of our own, and to look elsewhere for a supply of labour. The French Government thought these colonies of sufficient importance to make their restoration a public measure, and a more extensive system of immigration from the coast of Africa was established. How that scheme was conducted the blue-book published last Session abundantly testified. We found complaints from the west coast of Africa of so-called "free emigrants" brought down in chains, of the territory of Liberia violated, and the civilization of various African communities checked, and not only the flag, but even the uniform of France degraded by a revival of the slave trade. Similar transactions on the east coast soon led to the unfortunate collision with Portugal, which was fresh in the memory of the House. The fact was, indeed, that in the present condition of Africa a free emigration from that quarter was impossible. With the exception of some few places, where the population was scanty, and not fit for agricultural labour, an emigration from Africa necessarily implied a renewal of the internal slave trade. The conduct of France in this affair was most embarrassing to England, and the Earl of Clarendon, and after him the Earl of Malmesbury had addressed strong remonstrances to the Emperor on the subject of the emigration scheme. They saw, no doubt, that the perseverance of France must necessarily lead us to the alternative of a rupture with our powerful neighbour, or of acknowledging that we had been forced to abandon our traditional policy, because it would have been impossible to continue repressive measures on the coast of Africa if one Power were allowed openly to defy them. Though he could quite well imagine that Her Majesty's Ministers were glad of any opportunity of escaping from this dilemma, he must protest against the plan they adopted of furnishing the French colonists with labourers from our Indian possessions, as a sort of bribe for giving up the African emigration. The House knew how strict and jealous were the regulations with which our emigration of coolies from British India to the West India Islands was rightly surrounded. Unlike emigrants from our own shores who were considered able to protect themselves, these people were watched and guarded like children. From the moment of agreeing to indenture themselves to British colonists to that of setting foot again in their native India, officers of emigration at every port, stipendiary magistrates in every district, made them the object of their vigilance and solicitude. So stringent was the practice, that the noble Lord the Member for

Kings Lynn, when in office, thought it his duty to disallow a Jamaica immigration ordinance, which deviated, though slightly, from the prescribed model. In common justice to our own colonists and to the Indians themselves, we should be as strict and uncompromising in regard to France. But could the Government say this was possible? He might be told that the French would give up their own Passenger Act and adopt ours, and that our consuls might act as emigration officers in the ports of the French colonies. But was it probable that so jealous and sensitive a nation would allow the interference of foreign officials to be more than nominal? Again, he might be told that the authorities would guarantee their proper treatment, but who was to watch the authorities in a case in which the interest of the whole community would be on one side? He did not say that the emigrants would be ill-treated, yet it was but the other day that the Governor of St. Louis was surprised by the appearance of a French war steamer in hot pursuit of free immigrants escaped from Guadaloupe, and with an account of others having been drowned in the attempt. And for how long were these poor people to be indentured? It could not be for less than five years—a long time in the history of slavery; and were we prepared, in the event of any of the emigrants being ill-treated, or their liberty improperly curtailed, to insist upon their restoration? The example of Spain showed we were not. We knew from the report of our own Consul that slaves, at the rate of 40,000 a year, were introduced into Cuba, contrary to express treaty with Spain, for which we paid her, and yet we did not demand that they should be restored to liberty. Upon these grounds he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India whether Her Majesty's Government still contemplate legalizing the exportation of natives of British India as indentured labourers to French colonies?

SCOTCH EDUCATION.

QUESTION.

MR. BLACK asked the Vice-President of the Committee of the Privy Council for Education if, in preparing the Estimates for public education, there will be any objection to state separately the grants proposed for schools in Scotland, distinguishing the amounts proposed for schools connected with the Established Church,* the Free Church, the Episcopal Church, the Roman Catholic Church, and the Ragged or Industrial Schools, instead of including them in one gross sum for public education in Great Britain.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the question to which the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith) had called their attention was of great importance to the commerce and manufactures, as the opening up of the navigation of the river Godavery would be of great benefit in developing the resources of the country for a distance of 500 miles. The question, had not escaped the attention of the Government, for the letter of Captain Haig which had been referred to was a report which he (Sir Charles Wood) desired that officer, a gentleman of very great intelligence and well acquainted with the subject, to make, being anxious to see in a condensed shape the result of all the information obtained as to the practicability of opening out the river, great portion of which Captain Haig had himself surveyed. Since that Report had been made Captain Haig had been authorized to commence the works for the removal of the first barrier, provided an objection of a serious nature could be got over. The barrier first to be removed was in the Nizam's territory, who was to a certain extent an independent Prince, and it would be absurd to commence works in a territory not belonging to the Indian Government, and where that Government could not protect the persons employed. It was, therefore, necessary that measures should be first taken to remove the obstacles to the work arising from that circumstance. Directions had been given to the Indian Government to enter into communications with the Nizam for the purpose of obtaining the requisite command of the territory, and when that was accomplished measures would be taken for the removal of the first barrier, which would open the navigation for 250 miles. With respect to the question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Sykes) concerning the closing of the 5½ per cent loan, he had to say that, immediately after he became Secretary for India, he directed that no measures should be taken to raise any further loan there without the consent of the Home Government. However, having regard to the nature of the loan, the Government, on considering the question, doubted whether it would be consistent with good faith to close the 5½ per cent loan before the end of the Indian financial year, and, therefore, no directions had been issued to close it earlier than that period, unless the entire sum raised should have been paid before that time. Seeing that not quite £2,000,000 had been raised up to the present time, he did not think there was much chance of the entire sum of £5,000,000 being taken before the end of April, at which time the loan would cease. As to the piers on the west coast of India, for the embarkation of cotton, three would be constructed in the course of the ensuing year. To the other question of the hon. Gentleman he had already given an answer. He had stated that the arrangement as to the grant of batta to the troops of the Persian expedition was, that one-half of the charge was to be borne by India, and the other half by this country. He had, in consequence of the recommendation of the Governor General, applied to the Treasury on the subject, but had not yet received an answer. The subject involved in the first question of the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. W. Ewart)—the constitution of the Legislative Council—was, no doubt, a matter of considerable importance; it had engaged, and it would continue to engage the attention of the Home Government, but it was involved in considerable difficulty. Representatives of Calcutta, settlers and Native Bengal merchants, might be introduced into the Legislative Council, but the important class of landowners far up the country would not really be represented by the Native merchants. As far as that class was concerned, the Indian official servants constituted a far better representation. He had no objection to a financial statement or approved estimates being published in India; and this was done the other day, the Indian Government having published the estimates for the ensuing year; but he had objected to the publication of the estimate actually given, as from not having been corrected here, it gave an inaccurate view of their financial state. With respect to the question of the hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Cave) respecting the exportation of natives of India to French colonies, he might state that when he came to the India Office he found that a treaty was being negotiated with the French for the purpose of allowing the exportation of coolie labourers to those colonies in the same manner as the exportation had been legalized in regard to the British colonies, it being hoped that by that means an end might be put to the system of slave trade—

for it amounted to that—which had been carried on upon the eastern coast of Africa to the French colonies. The question was not concluded, but he could assure the hon. Gentleman on the part of the Government that in any arrangements that might be made, every care would be taken to promote the comfort and health of the coolies.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury when “Models of gasholders measuring a cubic foot, and such multiples and decimal parts of the said cubic foot,” “with proper balances, indices, and apparatus for testing the measurement and registration of meters,” would be deposited at the office of the Controller General of the Exchequer, in pursuance of the terms of the third section of the Act 22 & 23 Vict. c. 66, commonly known as the Act for Regulating Measures used in Sales of Gas?

MR. LOWE said, that in answer to the question put by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Black), he should be very happy if it were in his power to adopt the mode of making out the Education Estimates suggested by him, but he hoped to be able to show him that it was impossible to do so. The hon. Gentleman was aware that the Estimates for Education differed in some respects from other departments. The Government was in this condition, that they offered grants to various bodies on certain conditions, and it was in the power of the latter to accept whatever they pleased. The Estimates, therefore, had to be founded on the best conjecture that could be formed of the amount of money that would be accepted by the public. The accounts were at the same time exceedingly complicated, and it would be very difficult to frame them in the way specified by the hon. Gentleman. The Estimates were under eleven heads—such as for buildings, books, pupil teachers, schoolmasters, and the like, and putting the sums for each of these heads together they endeavoured to arrive at as correct an estimate as possible of what was likely to be required for the year. If the proposition of the hon. Gentleman were adopted, however, they would have to multiply these eleven heads by five, making in all fifty-five heads under the five distinct bodies among whom the grants were divided. That would not only make the matter more complicated, but it would expose the Estimate to a much greater risk than at present of being fallacious, because, when they estimated on a large scale, they were more likely to be accurate than when they made up a great number of small details. There was another reason against the proposition of the hon. Gentleman. The principle of the present system was, that each denomination, in receiving the public money for its own educational purposes, was content to waive its objections to all other denominations which it believed to be in error, receiving it too. It was a sort of truce, by which every particular denomination waived all objections to others getting the public money on consideration of receiving it for themselves. Now, if the proposition of the hon. Gentleman were adopted, it would be found that debates would take place on all the grants. It would be impossible to keep peace among the different bodies. They would have a regular hunt, each denomination turning out to hunt down the others. That would not be a desirable state of things. The hon. Member had asked for an account of the expenditure; but he would find that this was usually given in the tables annexed to the Estimates. He wished the hon. Member would distinguish between estimates and accounts. An account in the fullest detail would be willingly given, but he (Mr. Lowe) greatly objected to breaking up the Estimates into a number of small portions, merely for the purpose of giving an opportunity for a great number of debates on merely denominational questions. For these reasons he could not comply with the request of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. LAING observed, in reply to the question of the hon. Member for Dudley (Mr. Sheridan), the Act of Parliament to which he had referred imposed upon the Treasury duties which that department was unfitted to discharge. The object of the Act was to supply the public with a standard measure of the foot of gas, and the Treasury had called the Astronomer Royal to their assistance, and with that assistance a model gas-holder had been prepared as prescribed by the Act of Parliament, and it had been deposited in the office of the Exchequer. The Act further required that copies of the model should be sent to the Lord Mayors of London and Dublin and the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, and those copies had been sent. The whole duties thrown upon the Government had, therefore, been duly performed. He believed the Astronomer Royal was the only person who really understood the Act of Parliament, and he stated that it was very defective, and he doubted whether it would be of practical utility without further legislation. At present the Government had no power to compel private companies to avail themselves of the models provided, and therefore it would remain a good deal with the local authorities of the different towns as to how they would apply the measure and prevent fraud. The Astronomer Royal was devoting his attention to the subject, and he would shortly make a report to the House, and then it would be seen whether further legislation would be necessary.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he did not wish to add another to the twenty speeches they had heard, but could not help calling attention to the example they had had of the moderation of hon. Members in making use of the privilege they had of putting questions and making speeches on the Motion for adjournment till Monday. They had been taken over the whole of the world, and had heard discussions on almost every conceivable subject. They began with an airing in the parks, and then took a sail down the river Godavery; from thence a journey to Morocco was deemed advisable, and then a trip to Jersey. Then, after travelling over a great part of the world, they amused themselves with discussing such matters as education estimates, exportation of coolies, and some thirteen or fourteen subjects of similar interest. He could not think this was a course of procedure calculated to add lustre or dignity to their proceedings. Friday was fixed for Orders of the Day; but these had been neglected in order that hon. Members might have an opportunity of bringing forward questions on which they happened to take an interest. Such a course of proceeding must be thought by any stranger who happened to be present unworthy of the first assembly in the world.

MR. WILLIAMS said, if the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman had been carried, it would have been of the utmost possible convenience to the House in passing the Estimates. It had been rejected, but he would call upon the Government to go on with the Estimates on Mondays, and to give up their precedence on Fridays.

PROBATE AND ADMINISTRATION (INDIA) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Motion made and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read a Second Time.

MR. CRAWFORD said, the object of the Bill was to give persons holding certain Indian securities in this country the power of taking out letters of administration, but he thought the Government had lost sight of the fact that there were notes issued in India upon which interest was received in this country, and it would be a great convenience to the holders of those securities if the same privilege were extended to them.

COLONEL SYKES said, that if a person lent money at Bombay or Madras, and died possessed of property at Calcutta, administration granted at one place was of no effect in the other. Power ought to be granted by this Bill so that one administration should suffice, whether the property was in India or in England.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the questions of details raised by the hon. Members could best be discussed in Committee on the Bill. In reply to the question relative to the loan, by the Act of 1858 a loan of £8,000,000 was authorized to be raised on debentures. By the Bill of last year power was given to raise £7,000,000 by way of debenture, of which £5,000,000 had been raised when he came into office. After he had assumed office, he proposed to raise £5,000,000 more by debenture or stock, and at the time he obtained that power he stated, that there was an unexercised power of raising £2,000,000 as well as the £5,000,000 he proposed to raise. Instead of raising the latter amount by debentures, he raised it by stock. That operation had succeeded better than anybody had expected. He postponed taking any steps with regard to the debentures until after that period. His object was to add to the stock and not to the debentures to the extent of the other sum of £2,000,000; it being acknowledged that the larger amount of stock the better, and his desire being not to add to the debenture debt. He had therefore issued debentures for £1,000,000 for a limited time, meaning to convert them into stock (which would be saleable as it was wanted) after the period of the debentures becoming payable. A second issue of debentures had taken place, which were not yet payable; but it would be satisfactory to the country now that the western portion of the Empire was about to make a considerable investment in the stock of the eastern portion of Her Majesty's dominions. He was happy to state that the Governor General of Canada had applied to him for upwards of £1,000,000 Indian stock, to be appropriated for that colony. Independently of ordinary considerations, it was a satisfactory thing that one portion of our colonial Empire was prepared to take the surplus stock of the other. He had therefore willingly acceded to the request, and Canada had taken the whole of the first £1,000,000 issued on debentures, and a considerable amount of the second £1,000,000 of debentures, which would become payable in April. It was a gratifying circumstance that £1,300,000 of the second £2,000,000 of the Indian loan should be taken by the Canadian Government. The remainder would be available whenever it might be thought desirable that it should be taken by the public, for which there was no hurry. He was happy to say that the greater portion of Indian stock which had been created was taken, not by the great capitalists, but by persons of moderate means, and it had now passed into the category of permanent investments. That was the most satisfactory way in which the stock could be held, and it showed the confidence which was felt in the future of our Indian Empire.

PETITIONS OF RIGHT BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BOVILL moved that the Petitions of Right Bill be now read a Second Time.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he regarded the measure, on the whole, as a very valuable one, and thought the hon. and learned Member deserved the thanks of the House for the care and attention he had bestowed on a subject of considerable obscurity, which did not lie within the usual reading of even an accomplished practitioner at the bar. There was, however, one point in the Bill he wished to bring under the notice of the House. Although the monarchy of Great Britain was a constitutional and limited one, still the law assumed that the Crown was actually sovereign and supreme, and that no subject could sue the Crown. That, however, was merely a technical view of the matter, and, practically, the Crown submitted to be sued, but not in the ordinary way. The subject must approach the Crown by the presentation of a Petition to the Home Office, which was referred to the Attorney General, who, if he approved it, wrote on it "Let right be done." Having received his sanction, the action, could be proceeded with in the ordinary way. In the measure before the House it was proposed that the reference in the first instance should be made, not to the Attorney General, but to the Lord Chancellor, for the purpose, he presumed, of having the permission given by a judicial officer. Now, there was no reason whatever why the application should be made to the chief of any court of law, and if the Lord Chancellor were fixed upon as referee this inconvenience would arise, that he might be called upon to hear as an appeal a suit which he sanctioned in the first instance. It appeared to him that the application had better be made, as at present, to the Home Secretary, and through him to the Attorney General, and he hoped, therefore, the hon. and learned Member would consent to modify his Bill with that view in Committee.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he could not but admit that the proceeding by Petition of Right was somewhat cumbersome, but he doubted whether, as had been stated, it amounted to a denial of justice. He was willing, however, to give his approval to the general principle of the Bill, although he concurred with the right hon. Baronet (Sir G. Lewis) in the belief that the petition should be referred, as at present, to the Attorney General, and not to the Lord Chancellor. The privileges which the Crown possessed, such as choosing the venue in any suit with a subject, fixing the time for the trial to take place, and so on, he thought ought to be retained. At least, that was a question which would require careful consideration in Committee.

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH remarked, that he saw no reason why an individual in a suit between himself and the Crown should not have the same right to obtain justice as in a suit with another subject, and therefore cordially supported the valuable measure of his hon. and learned Friend.

MR. BOVILL said, that there were not wanting precedents for proceeding directly against the Crown. In matters connected with India a subject could bring an action against the Government as represented by the Secretary of State for India, and in the same way a suit could be instituted in Scotland against the Crown in the person of Parliament, and he stated that it was very defective, and he doubted whether it would be of practical utility without further legislation. At present the Government had no power to compel private companies to avail themselves of the models provided, and therefore it would remain a good deal with the local authorities of the different towns as to how they would apply the measure and prevent fraud. In matters connected with India a subject could bring an action against the Government as represented by the Secretary of State for India, and in the same way a suit could be instituted in Scotland against the Crown in the person manufacture was absolutely stopped for want of an adequate supply of flax and hemp, and as regarded cotton, who could look with unconcern at what was now passing in the Southern States of America, especially when he reflected that eight-tenths of the cotton consumed by our manufacturers last year came from those States? Some Gentlemen perhaps might say, that this was a Manchester question, and no doubt it was. But he asked the House whether a manufacture, which amounted to upwards of £60,000,000 per annum in value, was not also a question of great national interest and importance; and was it not the duty of Parliament to secure, as far as possible, this vast manufacture from accidents in the supply of the raw material? There was abundant evidence that India could furnish all the cotton we require. Dr. Forbes Watson, the botanist of the India Department, estimates that India already grows nearly double the quantity of cotton grown in America. India, however, had to clothe 200,000,000 of her own population, and she had only a small quantity left for exportation. The principal discouragement to growing cotton for exportation was the enormous expense of conveying it to market; to obviate this, good roads and cheap water-carriage were wanted. As an illustration of the state of the roads he would read a short extract from a letter from Line and Co., of Madras, dated in October last. They said:—

“If Government will only give us roads in the Tinnivelly district, our exports would increase rapidly. It is a melancholy sight to see heavy cartloads of cotton dragged across country; the produce is so bulky that in swaying from side to side it strains carts to pieces, and the bullocks drag it over mounds of earth, and through ditches and ruts, in a way which is painful to witness. All this loss of carts and cattle, and the delays of such a mode of carriage, must of course be borne by the cotton. It is difficult to estimate the annual loss both to the district and the trade.”

The roads all over India were in a similar condition, and we were entirely shut out from the finest cotton district of India by the bad state of the roads and the cost of carriage. The American planters had great advantages in this respect over those in India. Cotton was brought 1,000 miles down the Mississippi to a port of shipment for one-eighth of a penny per pound, or about 5 per cent on its value. From Berar the carriage by bad roads costs 100 per cent. on its value. The river Godavery leads to Berar, where the largest quantity and the finest quality of cotton is grown.

Mr. J. B. Smith

Captain Haigh, a gentleman of great ability, who was examined before the India Colonization Committee, and who had surveyed the Godavery, stated it could be made navigable for a distance of 500 miles for about £300,000, and that cotton could then be brought from Berar to a port of shipment for one-eighth of a penny per pound, thus placing the American and Indian planter on the same footing in respect of the carriage of cotton. Since Captain Haigh had given his evidence he had visited the navigable rivers of Europe, having previously visited all the river and water communications of America, and he returned with the conviction that there were fewer obstacles to be overcome in the Godavery than had been overcome in European rivers, and before his return to India he felt it his duty to address a letter to the Secretary of State for India, to endeavour to impress upon him the importance of opening up the Godavery to the commerce of this country. In this letter he pointed out, in addition to the commercial, the advantages of this great work in a military point of view. Besides the saving in time in the conveyance of troops and stores by the river, the saving in expense would pay the interest on the outlay of making it navigable. He further stated that the Government would be large gainers by the increased sale of salt. Salt was a Government monopoly in India. It was to be regretted that the necessities of the Government had compelled them to place an additional tax upon this indispensable of life; but the greatest tax which the people of India had to pay on salt was the cost of conveyance. Captain Haigh stated that salt sold at Nangpore at 90 rupees per ton, and sometimes as high as 160 rupees in that district. The Government price for salt was 25 rupees, and if the Godavery were navigable it could be carried at 5 rupees a ton. The opening up of this river, therefore, would enable the people to pay the increased tax on salt, and still to obtain it at less than half the price they paid for it at present. The increase in the consumption would be enormous, and of course the gain of the Government would be in proportion. The increase in the revenue on salt is estimated at £64,000 a year, an amount that would pay the interest on the outlay on the river more than three times over. He (Mr. Smith) ought to state that there had been much controversy on the part of the civilians in India as to the practicability of opening up the Godavery, and as to the profits on the works of irrigation. His hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) late chairman of the East India Company, was of opinion that it was impracticable to make the Godavery navigable. The hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Smollet) says "that such projects as the opening up the navigation of the river Godavery in order to reach the cotton fields of Berar seems to be an undertaking of the most impolitic character, inexpedient in the present financial condition of India, and of very doubtful utility when completed." But Sir Charles Trevelyan, the Governor of Madras, in order to test these various opinions had visited these districts, taking with him engineers and scientific men, and on his return he stated in a minute that he considered the works of such great public importance that he should feel it his duty to visit them every year whilst he remained Governor of the Province. He said the Godavery ran through the most fertile region of Central India. That the opening of this river would be equivalent to the opening of a new trade to the extension of which no limits could be assigned. He (Mr. Smith) thought he had proved the practicability and importance of opening up the Godavery. This great work would enable us to obtain ample supplies of cotton conveyed at a cheap rate from the finest district in India, and would do much to preserve us from those accidents which may arise to the supply of this important raw material. For these reasons he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India what were the intentions of the Government in this matter, and if he answered that it was their intention to open the navigation of the Godavery, he would further ask when? It was necessary to make this inquiry as to the time when the work was to be commenced, because Sir Charles Trevelyan, while he strongly recommended it, added that he hoped the state of the revenue would soon enable the Government to proceed with the work. Now, were they to wait until there was a surplus revenue for the commencement of this work? It had been the policy of the East India Company to make their public works out of the revenue, but he (Mr. J. B. Smith) hoped that would not be the policy of the Queen's Government in India. He could give many instances of the injurious effects of this policy, but he would only mention one as a sample of scores of a similar kind. Tankaria Bunder, in Western India, was a place where there were considerable shipments of cotton. For twenty years there had been complaints, that for want of a wharf there, cotton had to be rolled through the mud to the boats, the consequence was, that the cotton was more or less damaged by the wet. It was estimated that the loss sustained in this way amounted in twenty years to £10,000. Now, the cost of making a wharf was only £2,000, and the Government had at length consented to execute this small work, but if they had to wait until there was a surplus revenue, they might continue to roll cotton in the mud at Tankaria for twenty years longer. It was a false policy to make reproductive public works out of revenue, since it was always impossible to calculate when a work was commenced how long it would be before it was finished. It was notorious that public works in India cost in many cases double the amount they would have cost if the means of completing them had been uninterruptedly provided. The only legitimate fund for reproductive public works was loans, and he had no hope of seeing any great improvement in India, until that course was adopted. The finances of India were at present in a very embarrassed condition, but he (Mr. J. B. Smith) was not one of those who had any fears that India was unable to discharge all her obligations great as they were. When he saw the vast undeveloped resources of India, and the poverty of the people, it appeared to him that the only way to extricate the country from its difficulties was to increase the tax-paying power of the people by means of increased and cheap facilities of conveyance, and by great public works, which could not be executed except by public loans for the special purpose.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he was anxious to say a few words in reply to the Questions which had been put to him in the course of that discussion. With regard to the disembodiment of the militia regiment, which the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Dickson) so worthily and successfully commanded, he could only say it was always very painful for the Government to come to a decision that would be distasteful or operate to the prejudice of individuals; but the interests of the public service necessarily overrode all considerations of that kind, and he had taken the earliest opportunity of communicating to the gallant Officer the conclusion at which they had arrived. He had stated last year, in moving the Army Estimates, that in his

the measure. He could not consent, therefore, to the discharge of the order for Tuesday.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he hoped his noble and learned Friend would not proceed with or at least press on his Bill. His noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) had not given a complete account of all that had taken place in the other House of Parliament with regard to this question, and of the nature of the proceedings which had induced him to consider that it was not desirable to press the Bill upon their Lordships' attention now. The Bill, which was introduced by Mr. Dillwyn was dealt with in a rather extraordinary manner by the Select Committee to whom it was referred. They altered every clause of it, and then, of course, the preamble not fitting the amended clauses, they were obliged to make a fresh one. Thus the Bill ceased to be any longer that of its honourable proposer, who thereupon declined to proceed with it. But in the present Session the same hon. Gentleman had introduced a Bill similar to that which he had originally presented to the House, and he understood from his hon. and learned Friend, Sir Hugh Cairns, who was a Member of the Select Committee, that it was his intention also to introduce a Bill founded entirely upon the Report of that Committee. Under these circumstances he put it to his noble and learned Friend whether it would not be desirable to allow the House of Commons, which had already considered the question, to have the two Bills before it, and determine for itself which of them it would prefer. That ground had not been stated by his noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon); but it was one upon which it appeared to him (Lord Chelmsford) that he might reasonably ask his noble and learned Friend not to persist with his Bill. But if his noble and learned Friend thought that it was desirable to ask their Lordships to give his Bill a second reading, then he would put it to him whether he might not afford a little more time in order to enable the House to be prepared for the discussion when it came on. It was true his noble and learned Friend had introduced his Bill at the earliest possible period; but he did so without accompanying it with any statement of its provisions; the result was that it had not attracted the attention which its importance entitled it to receive. The subject was one of great interest. It was deserving of serious consideration; and it would very probably excite much discussion. He hoped, therefore, his noble and learned Friend would feel, if he would determine to press the measure, that it was only fair to give a little further time for its consideration.

EARL GRANVILLE said, there could be no objection to proceeding with the Bill, seeing that there was not at present any great pressure of other business. It was rather a strange cause of complaint that the Bill had been introduced early in the Session, when the usual objection was that all the business was delayed until nearly the close of the Session.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, he was anxious that sufficient time should be given by the noble and learned Lord for the consideration of the Bill, and for ascertaining what was the sentiment generally entertained out of doors upon the subject. In his own immediate neighbourhood, in the diocese of Salisbury, numerous meetings were being held this week for the express purpose of considering the Endowed Schools Bill; and he really thought the noble and learned Lord ought to give time for the full consideration of the question how far a compromise was capable of being effected, with the view of doing justice to the Dissenters, at the same time that no hardship or injury was inflicted upon the Church.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR presumed that his noble and learned Friend would, as a matter of courtesy, have no objection to the postponement of the Bill for a day or two, say to Thursday next. The measure was one that affected the rights of a large portion of Her Majesty's subjects, and was one fully deserving discussion in their Lordships' House. There was no reason why it should originate with the House of Commons more than with this House.

LORD CRANWORTH said, it was true that Mr. Dillwyn had again introduced a Bill into the House of Commons which was the same, or nearly the same, as that of last year; but so far from thinking that to be a reason why he (Lord Cranworth) should not proceed with this Bill, it appeared to him that if he had not already introduced it, that was precisely the reason why this House should originate a measure which was more likely to meet the approbation of Parliament. True, the Bill in one important clause did differ in principle from the Bill which had received the sanction of the Select Committee of the House of Commons last year; but when it came under discussion he should be prepared to state his reasons for thinking that it was better as he had altered it than as it was approved by that House. It would be for their Lordships to say whether they concurred with him or not. If they did, the Bill would then go down to the House of Commons in its present shape. If they did not, then of course he had only to bow to the decision of the House. He would not object to take the second reading on Thursday instead of Tuesday, and was quite willing to defer the Committee for ten days from that date.

Second Reading (which stands appointed for Tuesday next) put off to Thursday next.

LAW OF SETTLEMENT AND REMOVAL. QUESTION.

MR. KEKEWICH said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether it is his intention to move for the reappointment of the Select Committee on the Irremovable Poor, with the view of proposing an alteration in the laws of settlement and removal during the present Session?

MR. VILLIERS said, that in consequence of the abrupt manner in which the proceedings of the Committee had terminated, and the incomplete state of the inquiry, he intended to propose the reappointment of the Committee with a view of coming to a conclusion on the subject, and ascertaining what further legislation was necessary.

EDUCATION (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he would beg to inquire, Whether it is the intention of Government to introduce any measure respecting intermediate education in Ireland; and when such measure, if any, will be introduced?

MR. CARDWELL: It is my intention to bring in a Bill on the subject of Endowed Schools in Ireland, but I am not at present prepared to say at what time.

"LA NAZIONE ARMATA" IN SARDINIA. QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is, in his opinion, expedient that a diplomatic representative of England should interfere so far in the internal concerns of the country to which he is accredited as to prevent the appointment of a president or commander to a patriotic armed association for the defence of the country, such as the intended Nazione Armata in Sardinia, resembling in principle our own Rifle Volunteers, without the knowledge or authority of his own Government, or without having, as far as it appears, made it distinctly intelligible that such proceeding was entirely his own, and not that of his Government.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I can only answer the question of the hon. Gentleman by saying that I think that the conduct of Sir James Hudson was perfectly right, and very becoming on his part. He has long resided in Sardinia, and he is a person who does not conceal his opinions. He was of opinion that the setting up of an armed force independent of the Government was very dangerous to the continuance of constitutional government in that country, and he made known his opinion to the King and the Government. I think he did what was quite right.

NATIONAL DEFENCES COMMISSION. QUESTION.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he wished on the part of his hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) to inquire, Whether the Commission appointed last Session to inquire into the state of the national defences has yet reported, and how soon the Report was likely to be presented to Parliament?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: In reply to my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to say that the Report is not yet in a state to be laid before Parliament. Whenever it is in a sufficiently advanced state to be laid before Parliament, I have no doubt that

sion of those local charges which were recommended by the late Sir Robert Peel, in his statement on the subject of the corn laws. He was, however, unwilling to blame the successive Governments for this omission. He thought the blame more properly rested upon the Irish grand juries, who neglected making the demand for such relief. He therefore appealed to the right hon. Gentleman for his assistance in effecting a remedy for those complaints, and for his support with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, himself a member of that Select Committee, to obtain, under the prospective financial arrangements of the nation, a parity of exemptions in the local burdens of the two countries.

MR. CARDWELL said, in the course of the year just expired the Treasury had given full effect to the recommendations of the Committee referred to by the hon. Gentleman, upon which they had been unanimous. With regard to the concluding paragraph of the Report to which the hon. Gentleman called his attention, he would remind him that the recommendation contained therein was only carried in the Committee by a majority of four to three, the chairman, upon whose report it was an amendment, having been precluded from voting, so that it might be said that the Committee were tolerably equally divided upon the point. The Committee, were, however, unanimous in that part of their Report regarding the financial arrangements of 1846 as to certain remissions of taxation of local rates. As regarded the expense of certain prosecutions and the maintenance of prisoners, the Government had already acted upon the recommendations. Sir Robert Peel had promised two allowances out of the Consolidated Fund to Great Britain, namely, one-half, the charge of the medical officers, and one-half the charge of schoolmasters in unions. His hon. Friend (Mr. Dawson) asked for a sum of £32,000 to put Ireland in a particular respect on an equality with England; but Ireland was allowed the moiety formerly paid by the ratepayers of that country towards the maintenance of the constabulary. Pursuant to Sir Robert Peel's promise, the entire expense of the constabulary in Ireland, amounting to an annual sum of £350,000 per annum, was now paid out of the Consolidated Fund. England received no corresponding sum to that; a circumstance which he hoped his hon. Friend would consider when asking for a sum of not one-tenth that amount, on the ground that Ireland ought to receive equally with England the advantage of a particular payment out of the Consolidated Fund. On the whole, he thought Ireland had no reason to complain.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL OF INDIA.

QUESTION.

MR. W. EWART said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether Her Majesty's Government had given their consideration to the importance of introducing into the Legislative Council of India representatives of the Commercial Class and the class of British settlers, as well as of the Natives of India? also to the importance of an annual statement being made by the executive Government in India of the financial state of the Government, and of the publication of the same for the information of the public in India?

THE FRENCH EMIGRATION SCHEME.

QUESTION.

MR. CAVE said, he wished to ask the Minister for India a Question relative to a projected treaty with France, enabling that country to draw a supply of labour for her colonies from our Indian territories. Knowing that Sir Frederick Rogers was in Paris last year for the purpose of arranging the terms of the treaty in question, and that he returned to England without having succeeded in the object of his mission, he had hoped and imagined that the design had been entirely abandoned. But certain remarks by a noble Lord in "another place" on Friday evening last had shown him that the scheme was still under consideration. He would briefly state what the project was. Shortly after the emancipation of slaves in the French colonies, consequent upon the revolution of 1848, similar results took place to those which were experienced in our own plantations. The emancipated negroes showed a natural repugnance to that agricultural labour which was their lot during slavery, and retired in large numbers from the estates. It was also well known that the remedies so confidently suggested in our own case of high wages on the one side, or Government interference on the other, proved unavailing to induce them to return. Accordingly, the French planters were obliged to follow the example of our own, and to look elsewhere for a supply of labour. The French Government thought these colonies of suffi-

manent duty? and whether he will state the gross sum that has been expended up to the present time in the purchase of land at Aldershot, the expense of erecting barracks and bringing water to them?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, it was the intention of the Government to disembody more regiments of the militia, and when he had an opportunity of moving the Army Estimates he would explain to the House the principles on which that disembodiment would take place. As to the other part of the question, there was no objection to give the information, and perhaps the hon. Gentleman would move for a Return.

On Motion that The House at its rising do adjourn to Monday,

OBSERVATION.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the case of certain officers of the army who, after having volunteered into the Land Transport Corps, did not receive the promotion that was granted to others who were similarly engaged in the same service, on the ground of their names having appeared in general orders as appointed until further orders. He wished to say a few words to show the injustice with which some of these men had been treated. It would be remembered that the corps was formed at the end of the year 1855, when Lord Panmure wrote to Sir William Codrington, who was then in command of our army in the Crimea, to organize it. The corps was organized accordingly, and General Wetherall, who made out the commissions for the officers, happened to make them out in different forms. But they all volunteered to serve about the same time, so that there could be no claims from priority, and they all undertook the same duties. Furthermore, he held in his hand letters from General Wetherall, who signed the commissions, stating that the difference in the form was accidental, and that he did not intend to make any distinction between one officer and another. Sir William Codrington had also expressed himself to the same effect. When the war was over, the case of the officers of this corps was brought before the House, and in consequence all of them received promotion, with the exception of those who were named in general orders to serve till further orders. He thought the men who served under this verbal distinction through no fault of their own had good cause to complain, and that their cause was one of extreme hardship, and as such he brought it before the House.

THE SHRUBS IN HYDE PARK.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he rose to direct the attention of the Government to the state of Hyde Park, and to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what plan the Government proposed for the ornamental cultivation of the space now vacant by the removal of shrubs and growing trees. This was a matter which concerned not merely residents in the neighbourhood, but the inhabitants of the metropolis at large, the parks having been ceded by the Crown for the pleasure and recreation of the public. In 1856, when Lord Llanover was the First Commissioner of Woods and Forests, great complaints were raised about the state of Hyde Park between the Marble Arch and Kensington Gardens, and in consequence a portion of it was planted with flowers and shrubs, very much to the satisfaction of the public. That the House of Commons also approved the arrangement was apparent from the fact that in 1857 £350 was voted for the planting of the parks, and a further sum of £1,000 to be spent on Hyde Park. The shrubs which were planted having thriven very well, and a very agreeable walk having been formed, the same course was adopted with regard to the ground between the Marble Arch and Stanhope Street Gate. Lord John Manners, upon his accession to the office of First Commissioner, continued the arrangement, and even improved upon it in some respects. Last year the Government entrusted the care of the parks with the rest of the public works to a gentleman whose name would be never mentioned in this House without the deepest feeling of regret, the late Mr. FitzRoy, who long attended to the private business of the House, and afterwards presided over their deliberations in Committee, displaying all the attributes of a thorough man of business, the strict impartiality of a judge, and the high-bred manly courtesy of an English gentleman. Mr. FitzRoy succeeded to the office in June, but was taken ill in September last, and was not cognizant, he believed, of the steps which had been taken to turn the Free Church, the Episcopal Church, the Roman Catholic Church, and the Ragged or Industrial Schools, instead of including them in one gross sum for public education in Great Britain.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the question to which the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith) had called their attention was of great importance to the commerce and manufactures, as the opening up of the navigation of the river Godavery would be of great benefit in developing the resources of the country for a distance of 500 miles. The question, had not escaped the attention of the Government, for the letter of Captain Haig which had been referred to was a report which he (Sir Charles Wood) desired that officer, a gentleman of very great intelligence and well acquainted with the subject, to make, being anxious to see in a condensed shape the result of all the information obtained as to the practicability of opening out the river, great portion of which Captain Haig had himself surveyed. Since that Report had been made Captain Haig had been authorized to commence the works for the removal of the first barrier, provided an objection of a serious nature could be got over. The barrier first to be removed was in the Nizam's territory, who was to a certain extent an independent Prince, and it would be absurd to commence works in a territory not belonging to the Indian Government, and where that Government could not protect the persons employed. It was, therefore, necessary that measures should be first taken to remove the obstacles to the work arising from that circumstance. Directions had been given to the Indian Government to enter into communications with the Nizam for the purpose of obtaining the requisite command of the territory, and when that was accomplished measures would be taken for the removal of the first barrier, which would open the navigation for 250 miles. With respect to the question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Sykes) concerning the closing of the 5½ per cent loan, he had to say that, immediately after he became Secretary for India, he directed that no measures should be taken to raise any further loan there without the consent of the Home Government. However, having regard to the nature of the loan, the Government, on considering the question, doubted whether it would be consistent with good faith to close the 5½ per cent loan before the end of the Indian financial year, and, therefore, no directions had been issued to close it earlier than that period, unless the entire sum raised should have been paid before that time. Seeing that not quite £2,000,000 had been raised up to the present time, he did not think there was much chance of the entire sum of £5,000,000 being taken before the end of April, at which time the loan would cease. As to the piers on the west coast of India, for the embarkation of cotton, three would be constructed in the course of the ensuing year. To the other question of the hon. Gentleman he had already given an answer. He had stated that the arrangement as to the grant of batta to the troops of the Persian expedition was, that one-half of the charge was to be borne by India, and the other half by this country. He had, in consequence of the recommendation of the Governor General, applied to the Treasury on the subject, but had not yet received an answer. The subject involved in the first question of the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. W. Ewart)—the constitution of the Legislative Council—was, no doubt, a matter of considerable importance; it had engaged, and it would continue to engage the attention of the Home Government, but it was involved in considerable difficulty. Representatives of Calcutta, settlers and Native Bengal merchants, might be introduced into the Legislative Council, but the important class of landowners far up the country would not really be represented by the Native merchants. As far as that class was concerned, the Indian official servants constituted a far better representation. He had no objection to a financial statement or approved estimates being published in India; and this was done the other day, the Indian Government having published the estimates for the ensuing year; but he had objected to the publication of the estimate actually given, as from not having been corrected here, it gave an inaccurate view of their financial state. With respect to the question of the hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Cave) respecting the exportation of natives of India to French colonies, he might state that when he came to the India Office he found that a treaty was being negotiated with the French for the purpose of allowing the exportation of coolie labourers to those colonies in the same manner as the exportation had been legalized in regard to the British colonies, it being hoped that by that means an end might be put to the system of slave trade—

cleared in that way during the winter would be better adapted to receive those beneficial influences which the atmosphere communicates to an exposed soil, and in the meantime preparations were made for improving the soil by manure, and by the addition of better mould; and as soon as the season shall arrive when operations can be advantageously performed there will be put into it, according to a plan which I have seen, and which was prepared under the direction of Mr. FitzRoy, rows of shrubs, some evergreen and some flowering, and rows of flowers between them, with walks on each side; and I venture to say that when this arrangement shall be completed the public will not only be satisfied with it as gratifying and agreeable to the eye, but will think that it is an improvement on that state of the ground which it is to replace.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that the statement of the noble Lord had given him very much pleasure. He thought, however, that in regard to the defence put forth by one of the officers of the Board of Works, that the plants did not thrive as well as was expected, some blame attached to the superintendents of the Parks. All transplanted trees required a great deal of watering, and not one of these received any attention whatever, yet owing to the ground being so carefully prepared they thrived wonderfully, and if let alone would have established themselves satisfactorily. But there was another point on which he wished to make an observation. In planting and transplanting the greatest care should be taken not to break the roots, but he thought it would be impossible to replace those shrubs again in the ground, for in taking them up, he observed they were torn up without any attempt being made to preserve their roots. Now, these plants had been brought from Kensington Gardens at an expense of £350; the plants were worth some two or three guineas a-piece, and he should like to know what had been done with them? What was done could not be undone; but it would be a great satisfaction to the public to hear of the change that had been made, and he hoped it would be persevered in.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.—QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he rose to call the attention of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to certain statements in The Times newspaper of Jan. 24, in the letters

of its "Special Correspondent," from the seat of war on the coast of Morocco, as to alleged or reported misconduct on the part of Mr. Drummond Hay, her Majesty's Consul at Tangier. He should have been quite content to ask the Question of which he had given notice in the ordinary way, but it was absolutely necessary that it should be rendered clear and intelligible, not only in justice to the gentleman whose name was principally involved, but to satisfy those who wished to maintain friendly relations between this country and Spain. Certain papers had been laid upon the table, and by them it would be found that Her Majesty's Government had watched with the greatest jealousy—almost apprehension—the conduct pursued by Spain towards Morocco, and that the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office had particularly instructed our Minister at Madrid, Mr. Buchanan, to demand explanations, on the part of our Government, of the Government of Spain upon two material points, the one was as to the time during which the Spanish Government would occupy Tangier in case their troops should obtain possession of that town, and the other was whether Spain would endeavour to make and retain any new acquisitions of territory on the shores of Morocco. He thought the noble Lord had properly discharged his duty in making those inquiries, and demanding those assurances. He would only trouble the House with two short extracts, which would satisfy them—and he was sure that the noble Lord was already satisfied—that the conduct of Spain towards this country was characterized by a spirit of loyalty and conciliation. Writing to Mr. Buchanan on the 15th of October the Foreign Secretary said:—

"Senor Collantes, in his reply of the 6th of October states that when once the treaty of peace which should put an end to the hostilities between Spain and Morocco should be ratified, the questions now existing being settled favourably, and therefore definitely, the Spanish Government, in fulfilment of their intentions, would not continue in the occupation of that fortress [Tangier], in the supposition that they should have found themselves obliged to establish themselves there in order to secure the favourable issue of their operations. You will state to M. Collantes that Her Majesty's Government accept with pleasure this assurance, as conveying the declaration which, by my despatch of the 22nd of September, you were instructed to ask for.

of Parliament, and he stated that it was very defective, and he doubted whether it would be of practical utility without further legislation. At present the Government had no power to compel private companies to avail themselves of the models provided, and therefore it would remain a good deal with the local authorities of the different towns as to how they would apply the measure and prevent fraud. The Astronomer Royal was devoting his attention to the subject, and he would shortly make a report to the House, and then it would be seen whether further legislation would be necessary.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he did not wish to add another to the twenty speeches they had heard, but could not help calling attention to the example they had had of the moderation of hon. Members in making use of the privilege they had of putting questions and making speeches on the Motion for adjournment till Monday. They had been taken over the whole of the world, and had heard discussions on almost every conceivable subject. They began with an airing in the parks, and then took a sail down the river Godavery; from thence a journey to Morocco was deemed advisable, and then a trip to Jersey. Then, after travelling over a great part of the world, they amused themselves with discussing such matters as education estimates, exportation of coolies, and some thirteen or fourteen subjects of similar interest. He could not think this was a course of procedure calculated to add lustre or dignity to their proceedings. Friday was fixed for Orders of the Day; but these had been neglected in order that hon. Members might have an opportunity of bringing forward questions on which they happened to take an interest. Such a course of proceeding must be thought by any stranger who happened to be present unworthy of the first assembly in the world.

MR. WILLIAMS said, if the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman had been carried, it would have been of the utmost possible convenience to the House in passing the Estimates. It had been rejected, but he would call upon the Government to go on with the Estimates on Mondays, and to give up their precedence on Fridays.

Motion agreed to.

House at its rising to adjourn till Monday next.

Mr. Laing

SECOND READING.

Motion made and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read a Second Time.

MR. CRAWFORD said, the object of the Bill was to give persons holding certain Indian securities in this country the power of taking out letters of administration, but he thought the Government had lost sight of the fact that there were notes issued in India upon which interest was received in this country, and it would be a great convenience to the holders of those securities if the same privilege were extended to them.

COLONEL SYKES said, that if a person lent money at Bombay or Madras, and died possessed of property at Calcutta, administration granted at one place was of no effect in the other. Power ought to be granted by this Bill so that one administration should suffice, whether the property was in India or in England.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the questions of details raised by the hon. Members could best be discussed in Committee on the Bill. In reply to the question relative to the loan, by the Act of 1858 a loan of £8,000,000 was authorized to be raised on debentures. By the Bill of last year power was given to raise £7,000,000 by way of debenture, of which £5,000,000 had been raised when he came into office. After he had assumed office, he proposed to raise £5,000,000 more by debenture or stock, and at the time he obtained that power he stated, that there was an unexercised power of raising £2,000,000 as well as the £5,000,000 he proposed to raise. Instead of raising the latter amount by debentures, he raised it by stock. That operation had succeeded better than anybody had expected. He postponed taking any steps with regard to the debentures until after that period. His object was to add to the stock and not to the debentures to the extent of the other sum of £2,000,000; it being acknowledged that the larger amount of stock the better, and his desire being not to add to the debenture debt. He had therefore issued debentures for £1,000,000 for a limited time, meaning to convert them into stock (which would be saleable as it was wanted) after the period of the debentures becoming payable. A second issue of debentures had taken place, which were not yet payable; but it would be satisfactory to the country

Mr. Hay's conduct in a different light from that in which it was represented by the extract just read by the hon. Gentleman. With regard to Mr. Hay's partiality, that gentleman had strongly urged upon the Moorish Government the necessity, not to say the propriety, of sparing the Spanish prisoners, and through his interference the Moorish authorities had offered a price of £3 for each living Spaniard brought in, whereas the price formerly given was £1 for each head. Through his exertions the lives of a number of Spanish prisoners had been spared. It was through his intervention that the families of Jews and Spaniards had been permitted to depart unmolested from Morocco with their property; and in consequence of his having remained on the spot, with the sanction of the British and Spanish Governments, the houses of the persons who had so left were protected and the Roman Catholic chapel was secured from outrage. As illustration of the good effects which had resulted from the presence of Mr. Hay, he might mention that a Moor had been flogged round the town for attempting to enter a house forcibly, and that in December last, when a French vessel was wrecked some distance down the coast, that gentleman most promptly sent the authorities to the spot, had the mariners rescued from the violence of the natives, and sent them to the French Admiral and Consul at Gibraltar. These were facts which he believed to be authentic, and he had felt it his duty not to withhold them from the House when the character of an absent official appeared to be impugned—at least, when it had been made the object outside that House of malignant aspersions.

FRENCH ARMAMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. A. W. KINGLAKE: Sir, I have studied how to frame the Question which I am about to put in a way which shall not be considered as expressing a querulous distrust, but rather, so far as is capable of being accomplished in a matter of this kind, something like confidence in the present Administration, and at the same time to indicate an opinion that we ought not to enter upon the discussion of the budget in the absence of that knowledge which, more than any other, is important to enable us to come to a right decision. On Monday next the House of Commons is to be called upon to give its sanction to a Treaty which is to bring us into more intimate relations with the Empire of France, and we are to be asked at the same time to consider those arrangements which the Chancellor of the Exchequer will produce to us with a view of meeting the vast expenses which we have been obliged to incur in consequence of the present state of Europe. The cause which makes it necessary to incur this outlay is no secret to any man; everybody is aware that it has arisen from the fact that in the present phase of the French Revolution, a vast concentration of power has taken place, and that the Emperor of the French wields the whole resources of France, not through Statesmen or Ministers, but in a way which makes it impossible to know what his intentions are, except in so far as one is able to divine them from the probable use of the great armaments which he is preparing. I sincerely believe that almost the entire of Europe, including the great country of France, fervently desires the continuance of peace; but I cannot forget that last year Europe, including then as well as now the great country of France, desired the continuance of peace with an intensity equal to that by which it is at present animated. That wish was frustrated by circumstances which are so recent that it is needless further to allude to them; but what occurred may be stated in one short sentence—Austria madly and foolishly began the war, but it was the Emperor of the French who began the quarrel. It is not for me to say whether Europe has been taught or misled by the experience of last year, but to every hon. Gentleman holding correspondence with the Continent it must be known that a general idea is prevalent that the peace of Europe is again about to be disturbed, and that schemes are on foot for altering territorial arrangements, independent of those modifications which may have to be carried out in Italy. Although there may be other grounds for these apprehensions, the anxiety that is felt is mainly due to the armaments existing throughout Europe, and it may be readily believed that the uneasiness which prevails on the Continent speedily makes itself felt in this country. It is, of course, to be observed that there may have been exaggeration as to many points which we have heard; for those who busy themselves in communicating intelligence to England are, for the most part, unfriendly to the present Government of France, and to view all the actions of the Emperor with a jaundiced eye. But it does appear to me that it must rest in the power of Her Ma-

of the Lord Advocate. Again, great inconvenience in cases where the Crown had to be sued in connection with matters relating to the Crimean war having arisen, the War Office, in the case of contractors, sanctioned actions against the Government in order to surmount the difficulty. He did not, however, propose to establish the power of bringing actions directly against the Crown. The form of a Petition of Right was an essential feature of the measure, and he had introduced provisions expressly to guard against frivolous and vexatious proceedings on the part of subjects. He had thought it much more desirable that the petition should be submitted to an independent judicial mind, than to a law officer of the Crown, who might afterwards be called on to take part in the trial. The Bill, as originally introduced, did not provide for a reference to the Lord Chancellor; but a clause was subsequently embodied in it making such a reference necessary in all cases—the object being that the Lord Chancellor, as the highest judicial officer of the Crown, should nominate the court in which petitions were to be tried, and exercise a control over the proceedings.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, in explanation, that his objection had not been answered by the hon. and learned Member. Under the present law there was no power of suing the Crown, except by a petition addressed to the Crown, and by previous consent given through the Attorney General to the institution of a civil suit against the Crown. The hon. and learned Member, by this Bill, said he maintained the Petition of Right; but he addressed the petition, not to the Crown, but to another quarter, and gave the Lord Chancellor, who was a judicial officer, the power of saying "Let right be done," instead of allowing that power to be exercised by the Attorney General. His (Sir G. Lewis's) objection to that was, that while retaining the form of the Petition of Right, the hon. and learned Member had substantially altered its character. He would suggest that when the Bill was in Committee it would be well to consider whether it would not be desirable to replace the name of the Attorney General for that of the Lord Chancellor.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^o.

COMMITTEE.

On Motion that the House go into Committee on this Bill,

Mr. Bovill

MR. SPOONER complained that the hon. Member who had charge of it (Mr. Ayrton) had never stated its objects, and he asked him to do so.

MR. AYRTON said, in the last Session he had fully explained the objects contemplated by it; that he felt it altogether superfluous to repeat what he had then said. After having been amply discussed and considered it was passed by the House, but time did not admit of its being carried in the Lords. The first object of the measure was to repeal a statute which was passed under the threat of an invasion by France during a time of great tumult. The House, he thought, could hardly desire to continue the stringent provisions of an Act which was intended to give the Executive Government of that day additional powers of maintaining the peace of the country. It was necessary at that time, when an invasion was threatened, to take stringent measures to prevent correspondence with the enemy. Some classes of people, who were supposed to be mischievous, were required to register themselves, and so be brought immediately under the cognizance of the Government. Everything printed was registered under the eye of the Government, in order that no treason or sedition might be hatched. He trusted that society in this country at the present day was not to be considered in such a lamentable state as to render the continuance of such restrictions necessary. The Bill also sought to repeal a statute which provided that persons publishing newspapers should enter into recognizance for their good behaviour, as it were, and which did that in a manner, as he submitted, at variance with one of the first principles of law. Was it not monstrous, he asked, that, because a man undertook a laudable occupation, he was, at the very outset of it, to be treated as if he had been convicted of a crime? The Bill repealed a third statute which rather aggravated the evil to which he had just alluded by increasing the amount of the recognizances. That was the whole scope of the measure. The subject had been investigated both by the present and the late Government, and after consulting with the law officers of the Crown they came to the conclusion that all these were gratuitous and unnecessary restrictions, and ought to be dispensed with.

House in Committee.

SIR G. LEWIS said, that understanding the Bill was exactly in the form in which

est honour and character. He, with other members of his family, have been long in the service of the Crown. He has, therefore, had much experience of public life, and knows too well his duty to the Crown to take any course inconsistent with the general and avowed policy of Her Majesty's Government. From his long residence in Morocco—indeed, I believe he was born there—and his kindness to all who hold any intercourse with him, he has gained to a great degree the respect of the people of that country, not only of the Foreign Minister of the Emperor of Morocco, who was formerly a merchant, but of the wild tribes of natives who so frequently made incursions into the Spanish settlements. Having this influence, I believe that he, according to instructions from Her Majesty's Government, endeavoured to prevent the breaking out of war between Spain and Morocco. He endeavoured to prevent this war by advising every concession he thought possible, till he was told by the Moorish Minister that, whatever advice might be given, Morocco could not, consistently with the honour of the Sultan, make any further concessions. Mr. Drummond Hay did exert himself to the utmost, and used the influence he had so justly acquired to prevent the outbreak of hostilities. Since that time, it being the policy of Her Majesty's Government to be neutral in the war, his conduct has been in strict conformity with his instructions, as the representative of a neutral Power. The hon. Member has read a report from the correspondent of The Times newspaper, a very respectable gentleman, I believe; but he is in the Spanish camp, and can hear nothing but what he is told by Spaniards. They have stated various matters, which the correspondent repeats, but he says that he knows nothing of them, and admits that he has no proof of them whatever. I have not heard from Mr. Drummond Hay since he had an opportunity of seeing these statements in the newspaper, but I have not a doubt they are one and all entirely false. I do not believe that Mr. Drummond Hay has violated his duty or taken any part in the war. The Spanish Minister did on one occasion state to Mr. Buchanan that complaints had been made of the partiality of Mr. Drummond Hay; but he gave no instance of such partiality, nor any proof of it whatever. We are aware that the Spanish Government in this war has obtained the aid of British merchants, and that the Spanish army has been supplied with British stores and provisions. Any complaints, therefore, of a violation of neutrality might more justly be made by the Government of Morocco than by the Government of Spain. I believe that the conduct of Mr. Drummond Hay has been entirely free from blame. I do not wish to say which party in this war is right; but I cannot sympathize with the enthusiasm of the hon. Gentleman in regard to it. I do not think, because one party is Christian and the other Mahomedan, we ought to give the former all our sympathy, without reference to the causes or merits of the quarrel. I will now refer to the questions of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Kinglake). He has stated much with regard to the late war in Italy, and the present state of Europe, which this is not the proper occasion to discuss, but which may hereafter come under consideration. All I can say with regard to the other part of the subject is, that we have in Paris a very able Ambassador, and a military attaché to the embassy, possessing great knowledge and experience of the French army. From neither one nor the other has Her Majesty's Government received any account of any extraordinary military preparations in France. As for the statement of 600,000 men to be in readiness for the field by the spring, there is nothing at all to corroborate it. A great number of men may be called on to serve in the French army by conscription, but it must be remembered that a general conscription takes place in the course of every year. The hon. and learned Gentleman must recollect that the peace of Zurich has not long been signed, and the Congress that was summoned for the purpose of rendering the pacification of Italy solid and durable, has not been held. It is therefore desirable, while peace is so recent and the affairs of Italy have not yet settled down, to use every means to prevent a renewal of the war, or any collision in Italy that might excite it. Her Majesty's Government has recently been engaged in efforts to secure the permanence of that peace; and I can state that everything that has been done has proved most satisfactory. We have represented to the Government of Sardinia the danger of any collision with Austria on the territory of Venetia or elsewhere; and I have to-day received an assurance from the Sardinian Government that it will do nothing tending to provoke a renewal of hostilities. On the one hand, there is rea-

manufacture was absolutely stopped for want of an adequate supply of flax and hemp, and as regarded cotton, who could look with unconcern at what was now passing in the Southern States of America, especially when he reflected that eight-tenths of the cotton consumed by our manufacturers last year came from those States? Some Gentlemen perhaps might say, that this was a Manchester question, and no doubt it was. But he asked the House whether a manufacture, which amounted to upwards of £60,000,000 per annum in value, was not also a question of great national interest and importance; and was it not the duty of Parliament to secure, as far as possible, this vast manufacture from accidents in the supply of the raw material? There was abundant evidence that India could furnish all the cotton we require. Dr. Forbes Watson, the botanist of the India Department, estimates that India already grows nearly double the quantity of cotton grown in America. India, however, had to clothe 200,000,000 of her own population, and she had only a small quantity left for exportation. The principal discouragement to growing cotton for exportation was the enormous expense of conveying it to market; to obviate this, good roads and cheap water-carriage were wanted. As an illustration of the state of the roads he would read a short extract from a letter from Line and Co., of Madras, dated in October last. They said:—

“If Government will only give us roads in the Tinnivelly district, our exports would increase rapidly. It is a melancholy sight to see heavy cartloads of cotton dragged across country; the produce is so bulky that in swaying from side to side it strains carts to pieces, and the bullocks drag it over mounds of earth, and through ditches and ruts, in a way which is painful to witness. All this loss of carts and cattle, and the delays of such a mode of carriage, must of course be borne by the cotton. It is difficult to estimate the annual loss both to the district and the trade.”

The roads all over India were in a similar condition, and we were entirely shut out from the finest cotton district of India by the bad state of the roads and the cost of carriage. The American planters had great advantages in this respect over those in India. Cotton was brought 1,000 miles down the Mississippi to a port of shipment for one-eighth of a penny per pound, or about 5 per cent on its value. From Berar the carriage by bad roads costs 100 per cent. on its value. The river Godavery leads to Berar, where the largest quantity and the finest quality of cotton is grown.

Mr. J. B. Smith

Captain Haigh, a gentleman of great ability, who was examined before the India Colonization Committee, and who had surveyed the Godavery, stated it could be made navigable for a distance of 500 miles for about £300,000, and that cotton could then be brought from Berar to a port of shipment for one-eighth of a penny per pound, thus placing the American and Indian planter on the same footing in respect of the carriage of cotton. Since Captain Haigh had given his evidence he had visited the navigable rivers of Europe, having previously visited all the river and water communications of America, and he returned with the conviction that there were fewer obstacles to be overcome in the Godavery than had been overcome in European rivers, and before his return to India he felt it his duty to address a letter to the Secretary of State for India, to endeavour to impress upon him the importance of opening up the Godavery to the commerce of this country. In this letter he pointed out, in addition to the commercial, the advantages of this great work in a military point of view. Besides the saving in time in the conveyance of troops and stores by the river, the saving in expense would pay the interest on the outlay of making it navigable. He further stated that the Government would be large gainers by the increased sale of salt. Salt was a Government monopoly in India. It was to be regretted that the necessities of the Government had compelled them to place an additional tax upon this indispensable of life; but the greatest tax which the people of India had to pay on salt was the cost of conveyance. Captain Haigh stated that salt sold at Nangpore at 90 rupees per ton, and sometimes as high as 160 rupees in that district. The Government price for salt was 25 rupees, and if the Godavery were navigable it could be carried at 5 rupees a ton. The opening up of this river, therefore, would enable the people to pay the increased tax on salt, and still to obtain it at less than half the price they paid for it at present. The increase in the consumption would be enormous, and of course the gain of the Government would be in proportion. The increase in the revenue on salt is estimated at £64,000 a year, an amount that would pay the interest on the outlay on the river more than three times over. He (Mr. Smith) ought to state that there had been much controversy on the part of the civilians in India as to the practicability of opening up the Godavery, casion. He (Colonel Dickson) did not, of course, mean to contend that the militia should be made a permanent institution of the country, but he was at the same time prepared to maintain that the various regiments of which it was composed ought not to be disbanded without sufficient notice. The subject was therefore one which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would take into his consideration and place the militia on such a footing that they might know what duties it was intended that they should perform.

JERSEY COMMISSION.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HADFIELD said, he rose to call attention to the Commission for inquiry concerning the laws of Jersey, and to inquire of the Secretary of State for the Home Department why the Commissioners had not pursued their inquiries in Jersey since August last? why had they not already investigated the law affecting land tenure, and concerning bankruptcy and insolvency in the island? also, Whether the Commissioners were continuing their labours, and when their Report would be made? A Commission, embracing these topics, had been appointed by the late Government, and the announcement was received with great joy by the inhabitants of the island. Ever since August last, however, they had ceased to pursue the investigation, and great inconvenience had in consequence been occasioned. He might add, that when they adjourned they had arrived at a point of the inquiry which was of great interest to the inhabitants of Jersey—the law connected with the tenure of land—and that he could discover no good reason why they should have allowed a period of more than five months to elapse without resuming the duties which they had been appointed to discharge. It was of great importance to the district that this Commission should be speedily executed, and two Royal Commissions, involving much more labour than this, had, since it was issued, completed their inquiries and made their Reports. The adjournment had been made to January, but January had passed and nothing further had been heard on the subject. In these circumstances he had felt it his duty, at the request of the inhabitants of Jersey, to call the attention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the delay which had taken place.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, a Commission, consisting of three persons, at the head of which was Sir John Awdry, a retired Indian Judge, had been appointed to inquire into the laws of the island of Jersey. The Commissioners visited the island in the course of the summer and autumn, and at the end of August they left the island. Having brought their inquiries to a conclusion they had since been employed in the preparation of their Report, and he had been assured by the Secretary of the Commission that it was in a state of forwardness, and that it would be presented at no distant period. With regard to the questions of land tenure, and of bankruptcy and insolvency, the Commissioners had made inquiry on those subjects, and were in possession of documentary evidence on those matters. The hon. Gentleman was doubtless aware, that though he had a strong opinion as to the policy of assimilating the law of Jersey to that of England, the people of Jersey had a strong attachment to the old laws and traditions of their country. When this Commission was appointed he believed it was understood that it should not sit longer than a year. He was not, however, at that moment able to specify the particular time when the Report would be ready.

NAVIGATION OF THE GODAVERY.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. J. B. SMITH* rose to call the attention of the House to the importance to the commerce and manufactures of this country of opening up the navigation of the river Godavery, and to ask the Secretary of State for India what were the intentions of the Government in respect thereof. The hon. Member said the Godavery valley is one of the richest portions of Central India, and has an area about four times that of Ireland. It abounds in iron and timber. It produces corn, rice, oil seeds, and sugar; but what he particularly wished to call attention to was, that it also produced flax, hemp, and cotton. The manufactures of this country were increasing so rapidly that the consumption of raw materials was overtaking their production. It was, therefore, natural that our manufacturers should look to those places which could supply them with the raw materials, especially if they happened to be, as in this case, under the dominion of the British Crown. Hon. Gentlemen connected with the linen trade of Ireland and Scotland would inform the House that the progress of that important manufacture was absolutely stopped for want of an adequate supply of flax and hemp, and as regarded cotton, who could look with unconcern at what was now passing in the Southern States of America, especially when he reflected that eight-tenths of the cotton consumed by our manufacturers last year came from those States? Some Gentlemen perhaps might say, that this was a Manchester question, and no doubt it was. But he asked the House whether a manufacture, which amounted to upwards of £60,000,000 per annum in value, was not also a question of great national interest and importance; and was it not the duty of Parliament to secure, as far as possible, this vast manufacture from accidents in the supply of the raw material? The increase in the revenue on salt is estimated at £64,000 a year, an amount that would pay the interest on the outlay on the river more than three times over. He (Mr. Smith) ought to state that there had been much controversy on the part of the civilians in India as to the practicability of opening up the Godavery, and as to the profits on the works of irrigation. His hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) late chairman of the East India Company, was of opinion that it was impracticable to make the Godavery navigable. The hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Smollet) says "that such projects as the opening up the navigation of the river Godavery in order to reach the cotton fields of Berar seems to be an undertaking of the most impolitic character, inexpedient in the present financial condition of India, and of very doubtful utility when completed." But Sir Charles Trevelyan, the Governor of Madras, in order to test these various opinions had visited these districts, taking with him engineers and scientific men, and on his return he stated in a minute that he considered the works of such great public importance that he should feel it his duty to visit them every year whilst he remained Governor of the Province. He said the Godavery ran through the most fertile region of Central India. That the opening of this river would be equivalent to the opening of a new trade to the extension of which no limits could be assigned. He (Mr. Smith) thought he had proved the practicability and importance of opening up the Godavery. This great work would enable us to obtain ample supplies of cotton conveyed at a cheap rate from the finest district in India, and would do much to preserve us from those accidents which may arise to the supply of this important raw material. For these reasons he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India what were the intentions of the Government in this matter, and if he answered that it was their intention to open the navigation of the Godavery, he would further ask when? It was necessary to make this inquiry as to the time when the work was to be commenced, because Sir Charles Trevelyan, while he strongly recommended it, added that he hoped the state of the revenue would soon enable the Government to proceed with the work. Now, were they to wait until there was a surplus revenue for the commencement of this work? It had been the policy of the East India Company to make their public works out of the revenue, but he (Mr. J. B. Smith) hoped that would not be the policy of the Queen's Government in India. He could give many instances of the injurious effects of this policy, but he would only mention one as a sample of scores of a similar kind. Tankaria Bunder, in Western India, was a place where there were considerable shipments of cotton. For twenty years there had been complaints, that for want of a wharf there, cotton had to be rolled through the mud to the boats, the consequence was, that the cotton was more or less damaged by the wet. It was estimated that the loss sustained in this way amounted in twenty years to £10,000. Now, the cost of making a wharf was only £2,000, and the Government had at length consented to execute this small work, but if they had to wait until there was a surplus revenue, they might continue to roll cotton in the mud at Tankaria for twenty years longer. It was a false policy to make reproductive public works out of revenue, since it was always impossible to calculate when a work was commenced how long it would be before it was finished. It was notorious that public works in India cost in many cases double the amount they would have cost if the means of completing them had been uninterruptedly provided. The only legitimate fund for reproductive public works was loans, and he had no hope of seeing any great improvement in India, until that course was adopted. The finances of India were at present in a very embarrassed condition, but he (Mr. J. B. Smith) was not one of those who had any fears that India was unable to discharge all her obligations great as they were. When he saw the vast undeveloped resources of India, and the poverty of the people, it appeared to him that the only way to extricate the country from its difficulties was to increase the tax-paying power of the people by means of increased and cheap facilities of conveyance, and by great public works, which could not be executed except by public loans for the special purpose.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he was anxious to say a few words in reply to the Questions which had been put to him in the course of that discussion. With regard to the disembodiment of the militia regiment, which the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Dickson) so worthily and successfully commanded, he could only say it was always very painful for the Government to come to a decision that would be distasteful or operate to the prejudice of individuals; but the interests of the public service necessarily overrode all considerations of that kind, and he had taken the earliest opportunity of communicating to the gallant Officer the conclusion at which they had arrived. He had stated last year, in moving the Army Estimates, that in his opinion a large and continuous embodiment of the militia, in time of peace, was radically wrong in principle. It was unwise to anticipate the resources which ought to be kept in reserve for periods of emergency, and the militia was a force only required when the regular army was abroad. Holding that opinion, he followed the course that he had announced—namely, that of gradually disembodying the militia regiments in proportion as the regular troops were available for taking their place. This operation was necessarily very uncertain, and was retarded in the present instance by the requirements of India, and to the demand upon our regular force caused by the recent unfortunate calamity in China. With regard to the claims of officers of the Land Transport Corps, a Committee of that House had sat, before which was brought the case of certain officers who had entered that corps under very peculiar circumstances, and who at the conclusion of the Crimean War were dismissed from that service. The Committee went carefully through the matter, and divided the cases into certain classes, making recommendations as to the manner in which those different classes should be treated by the Government. The War Office, then presided over by his predecessor, applied to the Treasury for the funds requisite for carrying out those recommendations; and after a good deal of correspondence all the claims were satisfied which were recommended by that Committee. That corps was raised on the distinct understanding that it was only to be continued during the Russian War, and engagements for two years, with very high pay, were given in certain instances. On the return of peace it became necessary to dissolve the corps; but the case of those officers to whom a Committee of that House recommended that compensation should be paid differed from that of those officers of whom the Committee took no notice, and with respect to whom it made no recommendation. Among others there was the case of men who had given up situations in the Civil Service which carried the right to a pension, and who, when they lost their position in the Land Transport Corps, were left without the expectation either of the pension which their civil situation would have given them, or of the half-pay which military employment conferred. There were other cases to which he need not particularly refer, but the position of those gentlemen was this, that they were merely

appointed "until further orders." The hon. Member had quoted a letter from Colonel Wetherall to show that these gentlemen were to be treated in the same manner as the others. But in this impression Colonel Wetherall was entirely wrong, for the arrangement was only a provisional one, and the gallant Officer could have no means of knowing what course the Government intended ultimately to take. To illustrate how little claim existed on the part of the officers in whose favour the Committee did not report, he would mention a single instance. Lieutenant Delanere, a very respectable person, was an ensign in the 21st Regiment of Foot, when he joined the Land Transport Corps, of which he was made a captain till further orders. He, however, still remained on the strength of his regiment, so much so that he actually received promotion in it during the time he was acting as captain in the Land Transport Corps. He became a lieutenant, and was sent back to his regiment. He stands in no worse position than anybody else; he gained his promotion. But to make him a captain over the heads of all the other officers, who were constantly under fire and in the trenches, while he was not, would surely be very unjust. The House of Commons, therefore, having given this subject its best consideration, and the recommendations of the Select Committee having been adopted—in carrying out which, indeed, the Government had gone even further than its own sense of justice might, perhaps, have induced it to go—he thought they could not now reopen the question of the claims of these officers.

COLONEL SYKES observed that after what had fallen from the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith), he wished to say that his hon. Friend had evidently mistaken his opinions as he was a strenuous advocate for the opening of all communication in India, by land or by water, though he thought that ought to be done with the means of the country. His opinion had always been that the opening out of the Godavery was quite practicable, because nothing was impracticable to engineering science, but that the cost of its execution would exceed reasonable bounds. But recurring to the questions he had to put; the recent mutiny had deranged Indian finance. The interest on the Government loans was in 1856 and 1857, 4 per cent, but the Government had immediately to open a 5 per cent loan. Finding that even that increase would not take, they were obliged to offer $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., with an undertaking not to pay off for 26 years. They consented also to accept the new loan half in paper and half in money, thereby raising the previous loans to $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Still, these terms were found insufficient, and the Government in India were obliged to write to the home authorities for assistance. Very luckily, there was a better appreciation of the real capabilities of India in the money-market of this country than in that of Calcutta; and the result was that the $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. loan while at a discount of 4 per cent in India, was a few days ago at a premium of $5\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. in England. The finances of India were now paying $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for a loan that could be obtained here at 4 per cent. The five per cent loan open in Calcutta now stood at 103. All contributions to it were to the damage of the finances of India, and he therefore desired to know whether it was the intention of the Secretary of State to direct that it should be immediately closed. He also wished to be informed by the right hon. Gentleman whether the unanimous recommendation of the Governor-General and his Council that batta should be granted to the troops of the Persian expedition, as had been done in the case of the first Burmah expedition, of the China expedition, and of the capture of Delhi and Lucknow, would receive his sanction; and whether the three officers of the 3rd Bombay Native Light Cavalry, who so greatly distinguished themselves in the charge upon a regiment of Persian Infantry formed in square at the battle of Kooshab, near Bushire, would receive the Victoria Cross?

MEDICAL RELIEF EXPENDITURE IN IRELAND.—OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. DAWSON said, he was anxious to call the attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the House to the concluding paragraph of the Report of the Select Committee of 1858 on county rates in Ireland, containing the recommendation that the Government should take into consideration the propriety of sanctioning half the medical relief expenditure of the Irish Poor Law Unions to be charged on the Consolidated Fund, in a manner similar to that practised in England and Scotland, instead of throwing the entire burden of the outlay upon the rate-payers. That Committee was composed of

thirteen Members, six of whom were English and Scotch, and it was presided over by the hon. Baronet the Member for East Somersetshire (Sir W. Miles). The Report of that Committee completely justified the view of the case taken by the late hon. Member for Antrim, a gentleman always remarkable for his assiduity in protecting Irish interests, who moved for that inquiry in June, 1858. He was happy to say that during the last year the State made itself responsible for the expense of certain criminal prosecutions and the maintenance of misdemeanants, as also the costs of prosecutions, and the expenses of witnesses at assizes and sessions, a burden which had been previously thrown upon the local rate-payers. He did not think it necessary to refer to that part of the Report relating to schoolmasters, in respect of whom a certain modified assistance had been given by the National Board of Education in Ireland, when the schools of the Union were placed under their inspection. He would confine himself to the case of the half medical relief in respect to which the Report stated that that Committee were of opinion that though no promise had been held out by the late Sir Robert Peel that the half medical relief in the Irish poor-law unions should be secured under the same law as that relating to England and Scotland, nevertheless, inasmuch as the system in regard to Ireland was altered in the month of January, 1852, so as to assimilate the law of Ireland to that of England and Scotland, the Committee recommended the House to take into consideration the case of the half-cost of the medical men in those unions, with the view of throwing the payment upon the Consolidated Fund. Now, it never was alleged that any such distinct promise had been made by the late Sir Robert Peel, but it was considered but justice that this expense should be defrayed in the same manner as that of Scotland and England. The number of dispensary districts was 716, at an average cost of £45 each, being the half salary of the medical officers which varies generally from £80 to £90 per annum. The whole sum amounted to about £32,000 a year. That sum was not large, but it was still important as regarding equal justice to all parts of the United Kingdom, and the payment of which by the Consolidated Fund would give a practical relief to the poorer rate-payers. Since 1846, Ireland, until last year, received no credit for the remission of those local charges which were recommended by the late Sir Robert Peel, in his statement on the subject of the corn laws. He was, however, unwilling to blame the successive Governments for this omission. He thought the blame more properly rested upon the Irish grand juries, who neglected making the demand for such relief. He therefore appealed to the right hon. Gentleman for his assistance in effecting a remedy for those complaints, and for his support with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, himself a member of that Select Committee, to obtain, under the prospective financial arrangements of the nation, a parity of exemptions in the local burdens of the two countries.

MR. CARDWELL said, in the course of the year just expired the Treasury had given full effect to the recommendations of the Committee referred to by the hon. Gentleman, upon which they had been unanimous. With regard to the concluding paragraph of the Report to which the hon. Gentleman called his attention, he would remind him that the recommendation contained therein was only carried in the Committee by a majority of four to three, the chairman, upon whose report it was an amendment, having been precluded from voting, so that it might be said that the Committee were tolerably equally divided upon the point. The Committee, were, however, unanimous in that part of their Report regarding the financial arrangements of 1846 as to certain remissions of taxation of local rates. As regarded the expense of certain prosecutions and the maintenance of prisoners, the Government had already acted upon the recommendations. Sir Robert Peel had promised two allowances out of the Consolidated Fund to Great Britain, namely, one-half, the charge of the medical officers, and one-half the charge of schoolmasters in unions. His hon. Friend (Mr. Dawson) asked for a sum of £32,000 to put Ireland in a particular respect on an equality with England; but Ireland was allowed the moiety formerly paid by the ratepayers of that country towards the maintenance of the constabulary. Pursuant to Sir Robert Peel's promise, the entire expense of the constabulary in Ireland, amounting to an annual sum of £350,000 per annum, was now paid out of the Consolidated Fund. England received no corresponding sum to that; a circumstance which he hoped his hon. Friend would consider when asking for a sum of not one-tenth that amount, on the ground that Ireland ought to receive equally with England the advantage of a particular payment out of the Consolidated Fund. On the whole, he thought Ireland had no reason to complain.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL OF INDIA.

QUESTION.

MR. W. EWART said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether Her Majesty's Government had given their consideration to the importance of introducing into the Legislative Council of India representatives of the Commercial Class and the class of British settlers, as well as of the Natives of India? also to the importance of an annual statement being made by the executive Government in India of the financial state of the Government, and of the publication of the same for the information of the public in India?

THE FRENCH EMIGRATION SCHEME.

QUESTION.

MR. CAVE said, he wished to ask the Minister for India a Question relative to a projected treaty with France, enabling that country to draw a supply of labour for her colonies from our Indian territories. Knowing that Sir Frederick Rogers was in Paris last year for the purpose of arranging the terms of the treaty in question, and that he returned to England without having succeeded in the object of his mission, he had hoped and imagined that the design had been entirely abandoned. But certain remarks by a noble Lord in "another place" on Friday evening last had shown him that the scheme was still under consideration. He would briefly state what the project was. Shortly after the emancipation of slaves in the French colonies, consequent upon the revolution of 1848, similar results took place to those which were experienced in our own plantations. The emancipated negroes showed a natural repugnance to that agricultural labour which was their lot during slavery, and retired in large numbers from the estates. It was also well known that the remedies so confidently suggested in our own case of high wages on the one side, or Government interference on the other, proved unavailing to induce them to return. Accordingly, the French planters were obliged to follow the example of our own, and to look elsewhere for a supply of labour. The French Government thought these colonies of sufficient importance to make their restoration a public measure, and a more extensive system of immigration from the coast of Africa was established. How that scheme was conducted the blue-book published last Session abundantly testified. We found complaints from the west coast of Africa of so-called "free emigrants" brought down in chains, of the territory of Liberia violated, and the civilization of various African communities checked, and not only the flag, but even the uniform of France degraded by a revival of the slave trade. Similar transactions on the east coast soon led to the unfortunate collision with Portugal, which was fresh in the memory of the House. The fact was, indeed, that in the present condition of Africa a free emigration from that quarter was impossible. With the exception of some few places, where the population was scanty, and not fit for agricultural labour, an emigration from Africa necessarily implied a renewal of the internal slave trade. The conduct of France in this affair was most embarrassing to England, and the Earl of Clarendon, and after him the Earl of Malmesbury had addressed strong remonstrances to the Emperor on the subject of the emigration scheme. They saw, no doubt, that the perseverance of France must necessarily lead us to the alternative of a rupture with our powerful neighbour, or of acknowledging that we had been forced to abandon our traditional policy, because it would have been impossible to continue repressive measures on the coast of Africa if one Power were allowed openly to defy them. Though he could quite well imagine that Her Majesty's Ministers were glad of any opportunity of escaping from this dilemma, he must protest against the plan they adopted of furnishing the French colonists with labourers from our Indian possessions, as a sort of bribe for giving up the African emigration. The House knew how strict and jealous were the regulations with which our emigration of coolies from British India to the West India Islands was rightly surrounded. Unlike emigrants from our own shores who were considered able to protect themselves, these people were watched and guarded like children. From the moment of agreeing to indenture themselves to British colonists to that of setting foot again in their native India, (stipend made and solicited, th

Kings Lynn, when in office, thought it his duty to disallow a Jamaica immigration ordinance, which deviated, though slightly, from the prescribed model. In common justice to our own colonists and to the Indians themselves, we should be as strict and uncompromising in regard to France. But could the Government say this was possible? He might be told that the French would give up their own Passenger Act and adopt ours, and that our consuls might act as emigration officers in the ports of the French colonies. But was it probable that so jealous and sensitive a nation would allow the interference of foreign officials to be more than nominal? Again, he might be told that the authorities would guarantee their proper treatment, but who was to watch the authorities in a case in which the interest of the whole community would be on one side? He did not say that the emigrants would be ill-treated, yet it was but the other day that the Governor of St. Louis was surprised by the appearance of a French war steamer in hot pursuit of free immigrants escaped from Guadeloupe, and with an account of others having been drowned in the attempt. And for how long were these poor people to be indentured? It could not be for less than five years—a long time in the history of slavery; and were we prepared, in the event of any of the emigrants being ill-treated, or their liberty improperly curtailed, to insist upon their restoration? The example of Spain showed we were not. We knew from the report of our own Consul that slaves, at the rate of 40,000 a year, were introduced into Cuba, contrary to express treaty with Spain, for which we paid her, and yet we did not demand that they should be restored to liberty. Upon these grounds he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India whether Her Majesty's Government still contemplate legalizing the exportation of natives of British India as indentured labourers to French colonies?

SCOTCH EDUCATION.

QUESTION.

Mr. BLACK asked the Vice-President of the Committee of the Privy Council for Education if, in preparing the Estimates will be any by the grantsotland, distinguished for schools, Church,*

the Free Church, the Episcopal Church, the Roman Catholic Church, and the Ragged or Industrial Schools, instead of including them in one gross sum for public education in Great Britain.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the question to which the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith) had called their attention was of great importance to the commerce and manufactures, as the opening up of the navigation of the river Godavery would be of great benefit in developing the resources of the country for a distance of 500 miles. The question, had not escaped the attention of the Government, for the letter of Captain Haig which had been referred to was a report which he (Sir Charles Wood) desired that officer, a gentleman of very great intelligence and well acquainted with the subject, to make, being anxious to see in a condensed shape the result of all the information obtained as to the practicability of opening out the river, great portion of which Captain Haig had himself surveyed. Since that Report had been made Captain Haig had been authorized to commence the works for the removal of the first barrier, provided an objection of a serious nature could be got over. The barrier first to be removed was in the Nizam's territory, who was to a certain extent an independent Prince, and it would be absurd to commence works in a territory not belonging to the Indian Government, and where that Government could not protect the persons employed. It was, therefore, necessary that measures should be first taken to remove the obstacles to the work arising from that circumstance. Directions had been given to the Indian Government to enter into communications with the Nizam for the purpose of obtaining the requisite command of the territory, and when that was accomplished measures would be taken for the removal of the first barrier, which would open the navigation for 250 miles. With respect to the question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Sykes) concerning the closing of the $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent loan, he had to say that, immediately after he became Secretary for India, he directed that no measures should be taken to raise any further loan there without the consent of the Home Government. However, having regard to the nature of the loan, the Government, on considering the question, doubted whether it would be consistent with good faith to close the $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent loan before the end of the Indian financial year, and, therefore, no directions had been issued to close it earlier than that period, unless the entire sum raised should have been paid before that time. Seeing that not quite £2,000,000 had been raised up to the present time, he did not think there was much chance of the entire sum of £5,000,000 being taken before the end of April, at which time the loan would cease. As to the piers on the west coast of India, for the embarkation of cotton, three would be constructed in the course of the ensuing year. To the other question of the hon. Gentleman he had already given an answer. He had stated that the arrangement as to the grant of batta to the troops of the Persian expedition was, that one-half of the charge was to be borne by India, and the other half by this country. He had, in consequence of the recommendation of the Governor General, applied to the Treasury on the subject, but had not yet received an answer. The subject involved in the first question of the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. W. Ewart)—the constitution of the Legislative Council—was, no doubt, a matter of considerable importance; it had engaged, and it would continue to engage the attention of the Home Government, but it was involved in considerable difficulty. Representatives of Calcutta, settlers and Native Bengal merchants, might be introduced into the Legislative Council, but the important class of landowners far up the country would not really be represented by the Native merchants. As far as that class was concerned, the Indian official servants constituted a far better representation. He had no objection to a financial statement or approved estimates being published in India; and this was done the other day, the Indian Government having published the estimates for the ensuing year; but he had objected to the publication of the estimate actually given, as from not having been corrected here, it gave an inaccurate view of their financial state. With respect to the question of the hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Cave) respecting the exportation of natives of India to French colonies, he might state that when he came to the India Office he found that a treaty was being negotiated with the French for the purpose of allowing the exportation of coolie labourers to those colonies in the same manner as the exportation had been legalized in regard to the British colonies, it being hoped that by that means an end might be put to the system of slave trade—

for it amounted to that—which had been carried on upon the eastern coast of Africa to the French colonies. The question was not concluded, but he could assure the hon. Gentleman on the part of the Government that in any arrangements that might be made, every care would be taken to promote the comfort and health of the coolies.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury when “Models of gasholders measuring a cubic foot, and such multiples and decimal parts of the said cubic foot,” “with proper balances, indices, and apparatus for testing the measurement and registration of meters,” would be deposited at the office of the Controller General of the Exchequer, in pursuance of the terms of the third section of the Act 22 & 23 Vict. c. 66, commonly known as the Act for Regulating Measures used in Sales of Gas?

MR. LOWE said, that in answer to the question put by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Black), he should be very happy if it were in his power to adopt the mode of making out the Education Estimates suggested by him, but he hoped to be able to show him that it was impossible to do so. The hon. Gentleman was aware that the Estimates for Education differed in some respects from other departments. The Government was in this condition, that they offered grants to various bodies on certain conditions, and it was in the power of the latter to accept whatever they pleased. The Estimates, therefore, had to be founded on the best conjecture that could be formed of the amount of money that would be accepted by the public. The accounts were at the same time exceedingly complicated, and it would be very difficult to frame them in the way specified by the hon. Gentleman. The Estimates were under eleven heads—such as for buildings, books, pupil teachers, schoolmasters, and the like, and putting the sums for each of these heads together they endeavoured to arrive at as correct an estimate as possible of what was likely to be required for the year. If the proposition of the hon. Gentleman were adopted, however, they would have to multiply these eleven heads by five, making in all fifty-five heads under the five distinct bodies among whom the grants were divided. That would not only make the matter more complicated, but it would expose the Estimate to a much greater risk than at present of being fallacious, because, when they estimated on a large scale, they were more likely to be accurate than when they made up a great number of small details. There was another reason against the proposition of the hon. Gentleman. The principle of the present system was, that each denomination, in receiving the public money for its own educational purposes, was content to waive its objections to all other denominations which it believed to be in error, receiving it too. It was a sort of truce, by which every particular denomination waived all objections to others getting the public money on consideration of receiving it for themselves. Now, if the proposition of the hon. Gentleman were adopted, it would be found that debates would take place on all the grants. It would be impossible to keep peace among the different bodies. They would have a regular hunt, each denomination turning out to hunt down the others. That would not be a desirable state of things. The hon. Member had asked for an account of the expenditure; but he would find that this was usually given in the tables annexed to the Estimates. He wished the hon. Member would distinguish between estimates and accounts. An account in the fullest detail would be willingly given, but he (Mr. Lowe) greatly objected to breaking up the Estimates into a number of small portions, merely for the purpose of giving an opportunity for a great number of debates on merely denominational questions. For these reasons he could not comply with the request of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. LAING observed, in reply to the question of the hon. Member for Dudley (Mr. Sheridan), the Act of Parliament to which he had referred imposed upon the Treasury duties which that department was unfitted to discharge. The object of the Act was to supply the public with a standard measure of the foot of gas, and the Treasury had called the Astronomer Royal to their assistance, and with that assistance a model gas-holder had been prepared as prescribed by the Act of Parliament, and it had been deposited in the office of the Exchequer. The Act further required that copies of the model should be sent to the Lord Mayors of London and Dublin and the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, and those copies had been sent. The whole duties thrown upon the Government had, therefore, been duly performed. He believed the Astronomer Royal was the only person who really understood the Act of Parliament, and he stated that it was very defective, and he doubted whether it would be of practical utility without further legislation. At present the Government had no power to compel private companies to avail themselves of the models provided, and therefore it would remain a good deal with the local authorities of the different towns as to how they would apply the measure and prevent fraud. The Astronomer Royal was devoting his attention to the subject, and he would shortly make a report to the House, and then it would be seen whether further legislation would be necessary.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he did not wish to add another to the twenty speeches they had heard, but could not help calling attention to the example they had had of the moderation of hon. Members in making use of the privilege they had of putting questions and making speeches on the Motion for adjournment till Monday. They had been taken over the whole of the world, and had heard discussions on almost every conceivable subject. They began with an airing in the parks, and then took a sail down the river Godavery; from thence a journey to Morocco was deemed advisable, and then a trip to Jersey. Then, after travelling over a great part of the world, they amused themselves with discussing such matters as education estimates, exportation of coolies, and some thirteen or fourteen subjects of similar interest. He could not think this was a course of procedure calculated to add lustre or dignity to their proceedings. Friday was fixed for Orders of the Day; but these had been neglected in order that hon. Members might have an opportunity of bringing forward questions on which they happened to take an interest. Such a course of proceeding must be thought by any stranger who happened to be present unworthy of the first assembly in the world.

MR. WILLIAMS said, if the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman had been carried, it would have been of the utmost possible convenience to the House in passing the Estimates. It had been rejected, but he would call upon the Government to go on with the Estimates on Mondays, and to give up their precedence on Fridays.

PROBATE AND ADMINISTRATION (INDIA) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Motion made and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read a Second Time.

MR. CRAWFORD said, the object of the Bill was to give persons holding certain Indian securities in this country the power of taking out letters of administration, but he thought the Government had lost sight of the fact that there were notes issued in India upon which interest was received in this country, and it would be a great convenience to the holders of those securities if the same privilege were extended to them.

COLONEL SYKES said, that if a person lent money at Bombay or Madras, and died possessed of property at Calcutta, administration granted at one place was of no effect in the other. Power ought to be granted by this Bill so that one administration should suffice, whether the property was in India or in England.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the questions of details raised by the hon. Members could best be discussed in Committee on the Bill. In reply to the question relative to the loan, by the Act of 1858 a loan of £8,000,000 was authorized to be raised on debentures. By the Bill of last year power was given to raise £7,000,000 by way of debenture, of which £5,000,000 had been raised when he came into office. After he had assumed office, he proposed to raise £5,000,000 more by debenture or stock, and at the time he obtained that power he stated, that there was an unexercised power of raising £2,000,000 as well as the £5,000,000 he proposed to raise. Instead of raising the latter amount by debentures, he raised it by stock. That operation had succeeded better than anybody had expected. He postponed taking any steps with regard to the debentures until after that period. His object was to add to the stock and not to the debentures to the extent of the other sum of £2,000,000; it being acknowledged that the larger amount of stock the better, and his desire being not to add to the debenture debt. He had therefore issued debentures for £1,000,000 for a limited time, meaning to convert them into stock (which would be saleable as it was wanted) after the period of the debentures becoming payable. A second issue of debentures had taken place, which were not yet payable; but it would be satisfactory to the country now that the western portion of the re was about to make a considerable investment in the stock of the eastern portion of Her Majesty's dominions. He was happy to state that the Governor General of India had applied to him for upwards of £1,000,000 Indian stock, to be approved for that colony. Independently of ordinary considerations, it was a satisfactory thing that one portion of our colonial stock was prepared to take the surplus of the other. He had therefore willingly acceded to the request, and Canada had taken the whole of the first £1,000,000 issued on debentures, and a considerable amount of the second £1,000,000 of debentures, which would become payable in April. It was a gratifying circumstance that £1,300,000 of the second £2,000,000 of the Indian loan should be taken by the Canadian Government. The remainder would be available whenever it might be thought desirable that it should be taken by the public, for which there was no hurry. He was happy to say that the greater portion of Indian stock which had been created was taken, not by the great capitalists, but by persons of moderate means, and it had now passed into the category of permanent investments. That was the most satisfactory way in which the stock could be held, and it showed the confidence which was felt in the future of our Indian Empire.

PETITIONS OF RIGHT BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BOVILL moved that the Petitions of Right Bill be now read a Second Time.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he regarded the measure, on the whole, as a very valuable one, and thought the hon. and learned Member deserved the thanks of the House for the care and attention he had bestowed on a subject of considerable obscurity, which did not lie within the usual reading of even an accomplished practitioner at the bar. There was, however, one point in the Bill he wished to bring under the notice of the House. Although the monarchy of Great Britain was a constitutional and limited one, still the law assumed that the Crown was actually sovereign and supreme, and that no subject could sue the Crown. That, however, was merely a technical view of the matter, and, practically, the Crown submitted to be sued, but not in the ordinary way. The subject must approach the Crown by the presentation of a Petition to the Home Office, which was referred to the Attorney General, who, if he approved it, wrote on it "Let right be done." Having received his sanction, the action, could be proceeded with in the ordinary way. In the measure before the House it was proposed that the reference in the first instance should be made, not to the Attorney General, but to the Lord Chancellor, for the purpose. He presumed, of having the permission given by a judicial officer. Now, there was no reason whatever why the application should be made to the chief of any court of law, and if the Lord Chancellor were fixed upon as referee this inconvenience would arise, that he might be called upon to hear as an appeal a suit which he sanctioned in the first instance. It appeared to him that the application had better be made, as at present, to the Home Secretary, and through him to the Attorney General, and he hoped, therefore, the hon. and learned Member would consent to modify his Bill with that view in Committee.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he could not but admit that the proceeding by Petition of Right was somewhat cumbersome, but he doubted whether, as had been stated, it amounted to a denial of justice. He was willing, however, to give his approval to the general principle of the Bill, although he concurred with the right hon. Baronet (Sir G. Lewis) in the belief that the petition should be referred, as at present, to the Attorney General, and not to the Lord Chancellor. The privileges which the Crown possessed, such as choosing the venue in any suit with a subject, fixing the time for the trial to take place, and so on, he thought ought to be retained. At least, that was a question which would require careful consideration in Committee.

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH remarked, that he saw no reason why an individual in a suit between himself and the Crown should not have the same right to obtain justice as in a suit with another subject, and therefore cordially supported the valuable measure of his hon. and learned Friend.

MR. BOVILL said, that there were not wanting precedents for proceeding directly against the Crown. In matters connected with India a subject could bring an action against the Government as represented by the Secretary of State for India, and in the same way a suit could be instituted in Scotland against the Crown in the person lieved, whether the salary of a Roman Catholic chaplain to a workhouse should be £20 or £30. It was true that the cost of printing the Return would only be about £200; but as when it was printed few hon. Members, and certainly not he, for one, would read it, and as the hon. Member could see the Return in manuscript in the library of the House, he (Sir George Lewis) thought he was only acting in the interest of the public in proposing to negative the Motion of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. HENNESSY observed, that since the Return had been ordered the Irish Bishops had communicated with the Government as to the salaries of Roman Catholic chaplains in workhouses; and the correspondence in question, although relating to an individual case, had a general interest.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS observed, that the correspondence referred to took place in 1857.

COUNTY COURTS.

RETURNS MOVED FOR.

LORD BROUGHAM, in moving for Returns connected with County Courts, called the attention of the House and of his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack to the enormous amount of business which was performed, and he believed satisfactorily performed, by the Judges of those Courts. From 1854 to 1857, three years, there had been an increase in the number of plaints from 536,000 to 744,000. The number of causes tried, and where the parties complaining obtained their purpose, either by a judgment or by the money having been paid into court, had increased from 250,000 to very nearly 400,000. The sums received had increased from £1,500,000 to nearly £2,000,000. The number of suits for sums between £20 and

£50 constituted by far the larger proportion of this increase, and these were the causes in which the Superior Courts had concurrent jurisdiction in point of fact. For lower sums the number of causes had not increased in the same proportion, but still they had very largely increased. By the last Returns the number of causes actually tried, and where the parties had obtained the fruits of the trials, amounted to 400,000, and the sums actually received to £1,200,000. He had tried to discover how much of this was for causes under £20, and how much for causes between £20 and £50, and on no calculation that he could make did the amount received for the larger class of causes amount to a less sum than £200,000 of the £1,200,000. This was an important consideration with respect to the labours of the County Court Judges as compared with the Judges of the Superior Courts. There were ten circuits over England and Wales, and two in the metropolis, in the course of the year. The number of causes adjudicated at these circuits in the course of the year were about 1,200, but the amount covered by these causes he had no means of ascertaining; but they must be much less—greatly less—than the lower of the sums he had mentioned as adjudicated upon in the County Courts—the sum of £200,000; he had no doubt at all that they were very far below the larger sum. Under these circumstances he looked to his noble and learned Friend to assist him in his endeavours to extend the jurisdiction of these Courts still further, not only by adding equity jurisdiction to them, but also by extending their jurisdiction beyond the sum of £50. He would also wish to call the attention of his noble and learned Friend to the consideration that the labour of the County Court Judges had very greatly increased of late years; and it was said that they did not afford such relief to the Superior Courts as had been expected, and in consequence of changes in procedure the labour of the latter had increased, for no doubt the number of causes tried had diminished; the change which permitted two counsel to plead for each party had greatly increased the time occupied in the trial. The change, he believed, had tended greatly to the furtherance of justice and to the elucidation of the cause before the Court and jury, but it caused considerable delay. On the other hand, he considered that the alteration he introduced by his Bill of

1851, by which parties were allowed, and in some cases compelled, to give evidence in their own causes, had tended greatly to shorten the proceedings, to diminish the number of causes, and to lessen the time consumed in each case. The noble and learned Lord concluded by moving an Address for—

“Return of the Total Number of Complaints entered in each County Court for Sums above £20 and not exceeding £50, from the 14th August, 1850 to the 31st December, 1857; and also a like Return of the Number of such Complaints in each Year from the 1st January 1858 to the 31st December 1858, and from the 1st January 1859 to the 31st December, 1859.”

RIFLE VOLUNTEER CORPS.

QUESTION.

LORD VIVIAN rose to ask a question as to the intention of the Government with respect to the farther encouragement of Rifle and Artillery Volunteer corps. The noble Lord accompanied his question with certain remarks, which, from his Lordship speaking with his back to the gallery, were totally inaudible, though their purport may be gathered from the reply.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, Her Majesty's Government fully concurred with his noble Friend in the high appreciation he entertained of the loyal and patriotic spirit which had prompted such large numbers of the community voluntarily to come forward and offer their services to Her Majesty in Rifle and Artillery corps. Those offers had been made under very remarkable circumstances. They had not been made, as in the time of the old Volunteers, under the immediate apprehension of war or invasion. They had been made calmly and deliberately, with the view to supplement the defences of the country, the necessity of which had been pressed on the public mind; and they had been made, too, in a manner which, so far, he thought, encouraged the hope that the Volunteer force would become in the course of time to a great extent a permanent institution of the country. But, in reference to the Question put by his noble Friend, it must be borne in mind that the nature of Volunteer corps, as they were now being raised, was essentially that they came forward and offered their unpaid, voluntary services to the country; and it would be inconsistent with their present character to become a charge on the public revenue. That, he believed, was the principle on which it was originally intended by the late Government that these corps should be established, and it was also the view of Her Majesty's present Government. Her Majesty's present Government, indeed, had gone beyond what was originally intended by the late Government with regard to the assistance to be rendered to those corps. At an early period after the present Government came into office, his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War intimated an intention on the part of the Government to supply rifles to 25 per cent of the effective volunteers. Since then the percentage had been gradually raised, until at the present time the possession of a rifle had been guaranteed to every effective member of a Volunteer corps. But when his noble Friend went further than that, and suggested that the Government should supply the volunteers with uniforms, his noble Friend asked the Government to do that which was inconsistent with the character of this force, which was a force that came forward offering voluntary services to the Crown, and to which the Government had thought it right to supply the arms necessary for its efficiency. He was unable to assure his noble Friend that Her Majesty's Government intended to supply clothing to the volunteers. It had appeared to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War that a more material service would be rendered to the volunteers, and one more consistent with the origin of the force, if the Government were to assist them in making themselves efficient in their drill and military instruction. He was therefore authorized to state that the Government have it in contemplation to afford assistance in the way of obtaining the services of paid and efficient adjutants, which would be more valuable assistance than that of clothing the volunteers; because they will be then enabled to secure the services of military officers well and thoroughly instructed, and who will be able to conduct their drill on sound principles. Having regard to the position which this Volunteer movement had now assumed—embracing as it did, he was happy to be able to state, between 60,000 and 70,000 men at this time, and the number was increasing every day—the question now was, how such a force could be properly organized and instructed. For that purpose an Inspector of Volunteers, Colonel M'Murdo, an officer of experience, had already been appointed, who was to be assisted by six Assistant Inspectors, who would take different districts of the country, and visit the various corps, and superintend their organization from time to time. A plan was also now in contemplation for arranging the corps throughout the country into battalions—interfering, however, as little as possible with their special arrangements and local organizations,—each of which battalions would be provided with a military officer as adjutant. With regard to the Artillery Volunteers, his noble Friend advanced a further claim than he urged in the case of the Rifle Volunteers. For the Rifles his noble Friend was content to ask for clothing, targets, and ammunition; but for the Artillery Volunteers he claimed, in addition, that they should be paid for each day's drill. That certainly appeared to be inconsistent with the principles on which those corps were being raised, besides instituting a distinction of an individious character between Artillery and Rifle Volunteers. The Government already afforded valuable assistance to the Artillery Volunteers; they supplied them with guns complete, with instruction, and with ammunition; but to go beyond that, and pay them, seemed to him (Earl de Grey and Ripon) to be wholly inconsistent with the character of the force. Did his noble Friend suppose the Government would pay those men for their day's drill under the existing Act of Parliament, according to which any one of them might withdraw from the service after giving fourteen days' notice? Surely it was impossible to do that, seeing that such corps might at any time be dissolved after fourteen days' notice. He (Earl De Grey and Ripon) earnestly trusted that the measures which had been taken and were in contemplation by the Government were such as would give to this force a permanent character. It was highly desirable that these corps should become part of the military institutions of the country. Besides the interest which attached to the service of the Artillery and Rifle Volunteers, if they who joined these corps attended as far as might be to their military duties and training, he believed, from what he had seen and heard, that their efficiency might be raised to a very high pitch indeed under the voluntary system. Very many of the regiments formed within the last few months, by constant attention to drill had attained such a state of efficiency and aptitude as to excite the surprise and admiration of military men of high rank and experience who had seen them. He believed the same patriotic spirit in which the Volunteer Movement had originated would continue to maintain it and lead to its being eventually made a permanent institution of the country. He believed the measures taken, and to be taken, by the Government in aid of that result would be sufficient for the purpose, and were the only measures to which recourse could be had, consistently with the character of the force and the principle on which it had been formed. He trusted the large force which had been raised, and which was receiving fresh augmentation daily, would be found of the greatest utility, and go far to induce the feeling that we had a reserve in this country on which we might to a great extent rely for the protection of our shores in the event of their being threatened with danger, and which, in such times, might occupy our garrisons and enable us to set free our regular troops for service in the field.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH remarked, that no reply had been given with reference to the Government finding drill sergeants.

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, he had served in the Volunteers fifty years ago, and he was promoting the formation of a corps in his neighbourhood; but it was a great tax on them to pay the drill sergeants.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, it was not at present the intention of the Government to pay drill sergeants for every company of Volunteers. There was a very large number of companies throughout the country. The Government hoped, however, that when the Adjutants were generally appointed they would themselves be able to superintend the drill of each corps. It was intended that sergeants of the line, discharged with the consent of their commanding officers, should be allowed to reckon their time of service with Volunteer corps for pension at the rate of one month for every two months' service with the Volunteer corps.

THE COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, the greatest possible anxiety existed amongst commercial men to know the terms of the treaty which had lately been entered into by Her Majesty with the Emperor of the French. The treaty was ratified on Saturday last, and was to have been brought before the other House that evening with the Budget, but an unfortunate circumstance had prevented the Chancellor of the Exchequer making his financial statement. He, however, could not see why that circumstance should prevent the production of the treaty, and he hoped the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) would not object to lay it on their Lordships' table. But if any reason did exist for the non-production of the treaty at present, which he confessed he did not see, perhaps the noble Earl would state whether the summary of the treaty which had appeared in L'Indépendance Belge, and been republished by some London journals, gave, on the whole, a fair and correct representation of its provisions.

EARL GRANVILLE regretted that the noble Earl had not given earlier notice of his Question, as in that case he might have been pressed to give a satisfactory answer; but at present all he could state in answer was that, not being a subscriber to the Indépendance Belge, he could not say whether the résumé referred to was correct or not. The unfortunate indisposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer having rendered it necessary to postpone the financial statement, it was thought best to defer the production of the treaty until the whole subject could be brought under the notice of Parliament.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he could not acquiesce in the doctrine that it was necessary to postpone the production of an important paper because the Chancellor of the Exchequer was unable to make his financial statement. No doubt if it were produced beforehand it would take off the gloss from a portion of the facts which the right hon. Gentleman had to announce, but the public advantage in reference to the discussion upon the Budget itself, as well as the state of public affairs generally, were in favour of having so important a treaty laid on the table at the earliest possible period, in order that there might be ample time for the fullest consideration of it in all its bearings—financial, commercial, and political. He therefore hoped that if the treaty were in the possession of the Government, they would not wait until the Budget was brought forward before making it known to their Lordships.

EARL GRANVILLE said, however desirable it might be that the treaty should be considered without delay, not only in its commercial, but in its political aspect, it was also clearly very desirable that the public should be enabled to judge of all the facts laid before them at one and the same time.

LORD MONTEAGLE thought that whatever information they got with regard to the treaty should be complete, and not in a shape which would only puzzle and mislead.

POSTPONEMENT OF THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I take the earliest opportunity of appealing to the indulgence of the House, and to advert to the course of business with respect to the Financial Statement. The House is probably aware that in consequence of the unfortunate indisposition of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he is unable to bring it forward to-night as he had intended to do. I trust that there is good reason for hoping and believing that on Friday night he will be in a condition to make his statement to the House. That statement will probably involve a considerable length of speech, and it will be desirable for my right hon. Friend to have the interval between this and then in which to regain his powers. I shall not have occasion, therefore, to ask the House to depart from its usual course of business on Thursday. Friday being our own natural day, my right hon. Friend will, I trust, make his statement on that day. I beg accordingly to give notice that on Friday night the Chancellor of the Exchequer will make his financial statement to the House.

MR. DISRAELI: I am sure we have all heard with universal regret the cause of the delay. I wish to ask the noble Viscount whether the commercial treaty with France, if it is ratified, will be laid on the table previous to the financial statement on Friday?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: It is the intention of my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to lay the Treaty on the table on Friday.

MR. BAXTER wished to ask the noble Viscount when it was proposed to take the debate on the Financial Statement and Treaty?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will make his statement on Friday, and it will then be for the House to decide, according to its pleasure, when the discussion arising from it shall take place.

ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.

QUESTION.

MR. BYNG called the attention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the outrages which had taken place on the previous day in the parish church of St. George's-in-the-East, and asked, Whether it was the right hon. Baronet's intention, either by legislative enactment or by giving more explicit directions to the police, to prevent, if possible, the repetition of such scenes in future?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Before I answer the question of my hon. Friend, I must demur to the phraseology which he employs in designating the scandalous scenes which occur on the Sundays in the church of St. George's-in-the-East by the name of outrages. There is nothing, so far as the matter has been reported to me—and I have received to-day reports of what took place at the several services yesterday—which amounts to what is ordinarily understood as an "outrage," that is to say, a forcible breach of the peace. There is certainly one sense of the word "outrage," which may be applied to what is undoubtedly an offence against the decorum and propriety of public worship. But the House is aware that the law does not arm the police with a power of summary interference in case of a noisy disturbance, or an interruption of silence and order during public worship. I have taken the steps which appeared to me necessary for maintaining the public peace; and as far as I could collect the feeling of the House upon a former evening, there appeared to be many Members who thought I had gone even further than I was justified in going for the purpose of preventing disturbances. The steps which I have taken and which have been taken by Sir Richard Mayne, the Chief Commissioner of Police, appear to me adequate for the purpose of preserving public order and preventing breaches of the public peace. Further than that I am not prepared to go; and I can only express my regret that the mode of performing Divine worship at St. George's-in-the-East, which the incumbent thinks fit to adopt, should be such as to create so much popular excitement.

THE STADE DUES.

QUESTION.

MR. J. L. RICARDO asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What course the Government have taken in reference to the Stade Dues, and how far they have acted in accordance with the Report of the Committee appointed in the last Parliament to consider the subject?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: In answer to the hon. Gentleman I beg to state that I found that an opinion upon this subject had been given by the law officers of the late Government, I thought it proper, however, that the matter should be further investigated, and I submitted the question to the present Law Officers of the Crown. Their report, which is a very learned and able one, is to the effect that the only practical mode of dealing with the Stade Dues is to negotiate with a view to compensation being given for their remission. I have accordingly proposed to the Hanoverian Government that the treaty, which will expire in the course of a month, should be renewed for a few months longer, with the view of negotiating, in conjunction with the other States interested in the question, for the abolition of the dues on the ground of redemption.

SCHOOL SHIPS.

QUESTION.

MR. HORSFALL asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it was the intention of the Government to carry out the recommendation of the Manning Commission, as to placing twelve School Ships at the principal Commercial Ports; and if so, the probable time that will elapse before the scheme may be in operation?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: The hon. Gentleman is probably aware that the Commissioners for Manning the Navy recommended two distinct schemes for the education of boys. The first was that 2,000 boys should be brought up in training ships for the navy, all of them to belong to the navy. The second was, that there should be another class of boys which should be educated, partly at the public expense, and partly at their own expense; and that for them an additional number of training ships should be provided. The Admiralty have taken a very large sum in the Estimates I have just laid upon the table for the general schemes of the Royal Commission; but we found that a very great expenditure would be incurred in preparing training ships for the Royal Naval Volunteers, and also for the boys included in the first scheme, that the Admiralty think it would not be wise, at present, to hold out any hopes that ships will be prepared, during the ensuing financial year, for carrying further the scheme of the Commissioners in this respect; but I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we are fully alive to the importance of that matter, and we shall be very glad at some future period to take up this scheme of the Commissioners.

EDUCATION IN SCOTLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. CAIRD asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is the intention of Government to introduce any measure this Session respecting Education in Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that it was his intention to submit to the Government a measure for the purpose of regulating or abolishing tests in parochial schools in Scotland.

CORONERS' FEES.—QUESTION.

MR. COBBETT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any measure during the present Session to alter the Law as regards the payment of Coroners' Fees and Expenses.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, there was considerable uncertainty and inconvenience in the present state of the law with respect to the payment of those fees and expenses, on account of the conflicts between county magistrates and coroners as to the fees and expenses of the latter. The county magistrates frequently disallowed the expenses, and there was no appeal to any third power. The Secretary of State was often applied to, but had no jurisdiction in the matter. It was his intention, under these circumstances, to bring in a Bill for the purpose of giving to the coroners an appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench in disputed cases respecting the payment of fees and expenses. He hoped that before long that power of appeal would lead to a decision of all the principal points in dispute, and if the law laid down by the Court were not satisfactory to the House, an amending measure might then be introduced.

GOVERNOR OF THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS asked the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether there is any objection to lay on the Table of the House the Correspondence which has taken place between the Colonial Office and Sir George Grey, respecting his recall from the Cape of Good Hope, and his subsequent return to the Government of that Colony?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the Secretary of State had no intention to volunteer the production of these papers, but if any hon. Gentleman moved for them he should make no objection to produce them.

IRISH ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

MR. VANCE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to bring in any Bill during the present Session for the better regulation of the Irish Ecclesiastical Commission.

MR. CARDWELL said, a Bill had been drawn by the Commissioners and was then in his hand; and when he had an opportunity to introduce any Bills on the subject of Ireland he would state the course which he intended to pursue with regard to it. He was not prepared, at present, to give any notice of Irish measures, except a measure on the subject of the tenure of land in that country.

PROBATE AND ADMINISTRATION (INDIA) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

House in Committee, according to Order.
(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

In reply to Mr. GREGSON,

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the first clause of the Bill was not limited to notes registered and transferable, but applied also to "enfaced notes" which continued to be held by the proprietors, and were presented periodically for the half-year's interest. Also, that the clause did not include notes carrying coupons; but he had no objection so to alter it as to place the holders of them in the same position as the holders of "enfaced notes," provided the holders of notes with coupons attached would consent to allow themselves to be placed in the same position as the holders of "enfaced notes," that is, to receive their interest only by drafts from the India House.

Clause agreed to, as were the remaining clauses.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

CONTINUANCE BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the Bill was only intended to be in force for a year, to enable the proceedings that were going on under the old Act to be completed. Next Session he intended to bring in a Bill to place the management of the prisons of Scotland on an entirely new footing. But it was absolutely necessary, in order to enable some money to be raised, to proceed with this Bill.

MR. CAIRD gave notice of his intention to propose some Amendments in Committee.

Bill read 2°.

REGISTRATION OF BIRTHS, ETC. (SCOTLAND) BILL,

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR WILLIAM DUNBAR moved for leave to bring in a Bill.

"To amend two Acts of the seventeenth and eighteenth years, and of the eighteenth year, of Her present Majesty, relating to the Registration of Births, Deaths, and Marriages in Scotland, and also an Act of the nineteenth and twentieth years of the same reign, relating to the Law of Marriage in Scotland."

After stating the provisions of the Acts of 1854 and 1855, the hon. Gentleman said that time and experience had developed deficiencies and suggested improvements in those measures, and hence the necessity for the present Bill. As the measure was one entirely of detail he would defer any further explanation until the Bill was in the hands of Members.

Sir Charles Wood

Leave given;

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir WILLIAM DUNBAR, Sir GEORGE LEWIS, and the LORD ADVOCATE.

Bill presented and read 1°.

THE BILLS FOR THE CONSOLIDATION OF THE CRIMINAL LAW.

EXPLANATION.

LORD LYNTHURST said, he wished to call the attention of his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack to certain Bills for the improvement of the Criminal Law which his noble and learned Friend had laid on the table a few days ago. He found that those Bills were not confined to the consolidation of the Criminal Law, but that they extended to its amendment. The noble and learned Lord, when he laid those Bills on the table, said he had not read them.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Oh, no I said no such thing.

LORD LYNTHURST certainly understood his noble and learned Friend to have said so; but if his noble and learned Friend had read the Bills, then it became of still more consequence that he should call his attention to the subject. He found in looking at one of these Bills, that in one of the sections, the crime of wilfully setting fire to premises was to be punished with seven years' penal servitude; but in a section or two further on, he found that the attempt to set fire to premises—the attempt only—was to be punished with a sentence of fourteen years' penal servitude; and with this apparent inconsistency he thought it his duty to call the attention of his noble and learned Friend to the subject before the Bills were brought forward for a second reading, as he placed every confidence in the accuracy of his noble and learned Friend.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, if his noble and learned Friend had done him the favour, with his usual courtesy, to give him notice of this question, he might have been prepared to give him an answer. As it was, the question came on him totally by surprise. But he could assure his noble and learned Friend that he had totally misunderstood what passed on a former occasion if he supposed that he had not read any of the Bills. What he then said was this, that infinite pains had been taken with the preparation of the Bills, which were intended not only to consolidate the statutes as they stood on the statute-book, but moreover tended to assimilate the law of Ireland with that of England. He stated that, he could not pledge himself that he had read every word of all the Bills, but that he had bestowed upon them great labour. He could inform his noble and learned Friend that he had spent hours and hours on the consideration of these Bills with Mr. Greaves, than whom there was not a more able and painstaking lawyer, and with Mr. Pigott, who represented Ireland. It might be that what his noble and learned Friend pointed out was an inconsistency, but that was no objection to the course he had himself suggested when the subject was last before them—that the Bills after being read a second time should be referred to a Select Committee. His noble and learned Friend would then have an opportunity of pointing out any inaccuracies he might have detected.

LORD LYNTHURST read the clauses already alluded to, and said he should have thought his noble and learned Friend, who had spent so many hours in drawing the Bills, would have thanked him for pointing out to him an apparent inconsistency which he had discovered on first reading the Bills.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was not prepared at that moment to explain what his noble and learned Friend had referred to, nor was it to be expected that he should. If his noble and learned Friend had done him the favour to have informed him that he should call his attention to the subject, he thought that, with the assistance of his learned Friend, Mr. Greaves, he should have been able to show his noble and learned Friend that he was entirely under a mistake.

ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I should be very sorry if it were supposed that I am about, for more than a few moments, by the question which I am about to put to my noble Friend opposite, to take up your Lordships' time, or delay you from the consideration of the important and interesting question which the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Normanby) is about to bring before you; and it is the less necessary that I should do so because the circumstances to which I am about to call your attention have unhappily attained so great a degree of notoriety and scandal that there is no need for me to enter upon them in any detail. But I am sure that my noble Friend opposite (Earl Granville), will be glad to have the earliest possible opportunity to correct in his place in Parliament what I am satisfied must be a misrepresentation of what is reported to have lately fallen from one of his colleagues, while referring to this subject elsewhere, when a similar question was put to him. I may say at the outset, that I have no feeling whatever in common with those clergymen who are bent on introducing into the ancient, simple, and commonly received forms of public worship of the Church of England novelties that are unpalatable to the great bulk of their congregations, or who persist in forcing on their unwilling parishioners forms of worship which may perhaps not be illegal in themselves, and which, if they were ever in former times sanctioned by the Church, have long since fallen into disuse—forms which they may consider to add to the solemnities of public worship, but which, I am sure, none of them can consider essential in the eyes of Almighty God. I cannot, my Lords, imagine how any right-feeling and right-minded clergyman can persist, for such an object as this, to incur the fearful responsibility of driving from the Church of their fathers,—perhaps to a Dissenting chapel but perhaps worse, driving away from any place of religious worship—a large proportion of those of whose spiritual welfare he, as their pastor, must one day give account. I must also say that I can make great allowance for the feelings of those congregations who, finding themselves debarred by the introduction of these rash novelties in services and forms—be they right or be they wrong is not the question here—I say I can make great allowance for the feelings of those who, finding themselves thus debarred from the church where they have been accustomed to worship, feel themselves aggrieved and irritated. But, whatever may be the course pursued in St. George's-in-the-East and elsewhere, I feel sure your Lordships will agree with me that this affords no palliation—I will not say no excuse, but no palliation even—for the scandalous and disgraceful scenes which, Sunday after Sunday, take place in the parish church of St. George's. I have been assured, my Lords, since I gave notice of this question, by two of the clergymen of this church, that whatever may have been the objections of the parishioners to the services on former occasions, there have been, during the last few Sunday evening services, when the most disgraceful rioting has prevailed, no deviation whatever in any one respect from that which is universally practised in our cathedral services—that full choral service which passes unblamed in Westminster and St. Paul's. Now, my Lords, I go further than I have yet gone, and I say I do not think the full choral service as practised in our cathedrals is fitted for our ordinary parochial services; and if the chants and anthems which are practised in our cathedrals were introduced into every parish church I should prefer to attend in some other place where the services were conducted in a simpler and what appears to me in a more devotional form. But I know that, on the other hand, to some persons the services performed in this manner are eminently attractive, and that they are regarded by them as helps to devotion. I have further been informed that in this parish of St. George's the service was introduced at the desire of a considerable number of the parishioners; that they have been conducted for fifteen years without the slightest remonstrance, until unfortunately in the month of May last, a difference of opinion arose—of the merits of which I wish to say nothing—with respect to the introduction of a clergyman into the parish as a lecturer, who held opinions belonging to a very different section of the Church from that to which the rector belonged. From that time the parish has been in continuous conflict. I should have thought myself, that in a parish church, where there are two services conducted according to the usual form, and the third only is conducted according to the full choral or cathedral service, there was ample room for a compromise if the parties could be brought to join in a course so desirable. But whether the services be or be not as I have described them, or whether these forms be more or less offensive to the congregation, I say again, that the proceedings which have lately taken place reflect the utmost disgrace on all concerned in them. Your Lordships have all seen in the daily papers accounts of the disgraceful riots which take place there Sunday after Sunday—how the service of God is interrupted by whistling, by singing, by banging of doors, by loud coughing, by catcalls, by throwing hassocks and other articles of church furniture at the altar, by the singing of songs and by other scandalous proceedings, by which the congregation seek to testify their objection to the religious forms and ceremonies observed in the worship. But, my Lords, to say for a single moment that this objection is any palliation for these disgraceful proceedings, or that they are in the slightest degree connected with religious feeling, is to express what to me appears little short of blasphemy. It is, perhaps, true, that these parties are encouraged by others who themselves shrink from taking a prominent part in the riots; but it is certain that the congregations for the last few Sundays have for the most part been composed of a mob of the lowest character, who have no reverence for a place of worship, or for the Being who is adored there; who are actuated by a pure love of mischief, and who carry out their wishes in the most disgraceful manner. I need not enter further into a description of those scenes, as your Lordships have seen the accounts of them that have been published in the newspapers. I have only to add further that one of the clergymen who performed the services, and with whom I had no previous acquaintance, called on me and stated that, in addition to the statements which had been given in the newspapers on Monday morning, he had himself been assaulted and severely struck; and that during the performance of the services he was struck in the face with peas discharged from peashooters from different parts of the church. I am certain—at least I am all but certain—that my noble Friend will not say that these riots cannot be put down; I think he will not say—as must have been an erroneous report of what was said elsewhere—that these proceedings are not to be characterized as “outrages”—that the Secretary of State has done all that was in his power to put down these riots; that he has even gone farther than some persons thought he ought to go, and that he is not disposed to take any ulterior steps in the matter; I shall not be told that Sir Richard Mayne had done all he could to preserve order, and I shall not be told, in conclusion, that my noble Friend regrets that the proceedings of the clergy connected with the church have led to this unhappy state of things. That was said to be the substance of an answer given to a question on the same subject "elsewhere." I think we may be sure that that answer will not be given here. My Lords, my Question is whether the Government have taken into their serious consideration the scandalous outrages that have taken place in the church of St. George's-in-the-East. Next, I wish to know if they have inquired into the state of the law, and have ascertained whether the law is sufficient as it stands to put an end to scenes so disgraceful? If the law is sufficient to put an end to them I am sure my noble Friend will not dispute that it is the duty of the Executive Government to put that law in force. If, on the one hand, their inquiries satisfy them that there is no power of restraining a clergyman from a mode of conducting the service offensive to the parishioners; or if, on the other hand, the law is not sufficiently powerful to prevent or control an outburst of popular feeling such as has been manifested in the parish in question, then I submit it is the duty of the Government to consider in what manner the law can be strengthened so as to give the Executive sufficient power to deal with such cases. But, if those proceedings are allowed to go on with impunity, they may be expected to become more scandalous day after day. Magistrates before whom offenders are brought are compelled, in the present state of the law, to discharge them, and the police apparently take no adequate part in the preservation of order, though they would undoubtedly act if such scenes occurred in a theatre, in a Mormon chapel, or in Hyde Park. I do not understand that the police have not the power to act in such cases; and if they have the power, I want to know why they have not been ordered to take such steps as appeared necessary to prevent a recurrence of such scandalous outrages. I submit it is the duty of the Government to interpose their authority with the view to put an end to these disgraceful brawls; and I hope my noble Friends will state on their part that they are prepared to exercise their authority for that purpose, or, if that power be unequal to the emergency, that they are prepared to invoke the assistance and sanction of Parliament in devising some adequate remedy. The noble Earl then put the Question of which he had given notice, What course Her Majesty's Government intend to adopt with respect to the proceedings in the Church of St. George's-in-the-East?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I agree in great part with the observations made by the noble Earl, especially as to the extreme indiscretion of introducing novel ceremonies into the mode of conducting Divine worship in parochial churches. Those observations appear to me so pertinent that I have great hope that the manner in which he has put the matter to your Lordships will have the proper effect on the few clergymen to whom they apply. I quite concur with the noble Earl as to the great scandal attaching to the proceedings which have taken place in the church of St. George's-in-the-East. There is no doubt that the opposition to these novelties originated with parishioners; but many of the persons who go there for the purpose of making a disturbance do not reside in the parish, but would seem, nevertheless, to a certain degree, to be encouraged by the sympathy of the parishioners. With regard to the police, it is extremely difficult to define their duty under such circumstances, not only in a legal point of view, but as to the mode in which they should discharge it. The information I have is, that they have attended at the church several weeks running in order to keep the peace, and strict injunctions were issued to them to prevent any disturbance, and where they could not interfere they were to take down the names of persons, and so on. But the result is not satisfactory. When the disturbances consisted of shuffling of feet, slamming of doors, and making various other noises, it was impossible for the police to act. I should be sorry to take upon myself to lay down the exact state of the law. On the last two Sundays the disturbances have been of a different character, and the police were called upon to interfere; but when they went to the door the churchwarden told them it was not necessary for them to enter. Your Lordships will have seen from the detailed reports in the newspapers that persons implicated in the disturbances on the evening of Sunday last have been discharged from the want of tangible evidence. The magistrate (Mr. Yardley) on that occasion laid down the law in a very clear and lucid manner, and said if the authorities could point out the persons who had created a disturbance he could deal with them, and would punish them most severely. The police will have, as they hitherto have had, orders to give every assistance in their power to prevent a repetition of the disturbances, and, failing in that, to bring the offenders before a magistrate.

THE EARL OF DERBY: The noble Earl has not stated whether in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government the state of the law is sufficient to effectually repress such disturbances.

EARL GRANVILLE said, according to the law laid down by the magistrate yesterday, if the authorities could point out the offender the law was sufficient to punish him.

LORD BROUGHAM: The real difficulty is, that what has taken place in this church does not amount to a breach of the peace. Certain cries were uttered that were most reprehensible and disgusting, undoubtedly; these tended to interrupt the service, and are an ecclesiastical offence—that is to say, “brawling”—and may be visited with ecclesiastical censure. But that is not enough—there has been something more than these cries and brawlings in the church. My noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) has stated that a distinct breach of the peace has been committed and a clergyman been assaulted. There is another difficulty. The persons who promote these disturbances have selected boys and children, and made them their tools in creating a noise, and the magistrate has a difficulty in visiting those children who have not committed an assault or riot with the necessary punishment. We are told by my noble Friend opposite (Earl Granville) that the police, when they offered to enter the church, were informed by the churchwarden that their presence was unnecessary. I strongly recommend that, without asking the opinion of the churchwarden, and without asking his leave—for he has no right to refuse entrance—the police should enter the church, take their position in different parts of it, and if there were riots at once interfere. They might, moreover, discover who were the real agitators who made the children their tools; for although the churchwarden might not be able to detect the instigators of the disorders, the more practised eye of the policeman will probably be more successful. I will only repeat what my noble Friend has said so much better than I said yesterday, as to the utter abhorrence and disgust which I feel with regard to these proceedings. A at outrage has been committed in this ch. There may be a difference of opinion, as my noble Friend described it, as to the conduct of the clergyman. He may have been well advised, or he may have been ill advised, in the manner in which the service is performed. We have no right to visit with our censure conscientious differences of opinion from ourselves, whether those differences relate to matters of doctrine, or to mere matters of discipline, or to mere ceremonials. Although I may hold an opinion upon the subject myself I have no right to say that my brother is wrong who thinks that the performance of Divine service should be accompanied by certain changes of posture, by certain genuflections, or by certain turnings towards the altar. That may, for aught I know, be a ground for conscientious differences of opinion between one clergyman and another, or between a clergyman and his parishioners; but of this I am perfectly clear, that those differences of opinion, whether as to dogma or discipline, or mere ceremonial, are not to be decided by a mob—perhaps an infuriated mob—administering no law, but creating riots and disorders simply because they favour one party rather than the other. I hope and trust that we shall speedily see an end put to these proceedings, and if it should be found that there is a difficulty in obtaining the effectual assistance of the police that my right rev. Friend opposite (the Bishop of London) will see the propriety of shutting up the church of St. George's altogether—at least, for a time.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: The noble and learned Lord has stated that unless there be a breach of the peace the law has no power in this case. I think your Lordships ought not to adopt that view of the matter, because there are undoubtedly two distinct laws which have been violated here, and according to which the offenders may be punished. One of these is the statute of the 1 William & Mary, cap. 18, sec. 18, whereby a person disturbing any minister in the discharge of his duty in a church may be taken before the nearest justice of the peace, to whom he must produce sureties of £50 that he will stand his trial before the next quarter sessions. The other law is that of the 1 Queen Mary, cap. 3, sec. 2 and 6, whereby a person so interrupting the service may immediately be taken before the nearest magistrate, and I believe the penalty which may be inflicted in that case is three months' imprisonment. There are these plain modes of dealing with such offenders, besides the one which the noble and learned Lord has pointed out, of their being prosecuted in the Ecclesiastical Court for brawling. But the difficulty in this case has not arisen from the want of law, but from the impossibility as it would appear—though I cannot understand where the impossibility lies—in distinctly identifying the offenders. I was surprised to hear the noble and learned Lord state that the churchwarden requested the police not to enter the church. I presume, if he did so in this instance, that it was simply for the reason that he himself had captured several offenders whom he handed over to the police at the door of the church to be taken before the magistrate next morning. But when they came before the magistrate there was no evidence that they were the particular offenders who ought to have been arrested. I do earnestly trust, then, that steps will be taken to place somewhere such persons as will be able to see who are the real offenders, and bring them to justice under the existing law, when, I feel confident, the magistrates will not hesitate to make a very severe example of them. My noble and learned Friend has requested me, in the event of other measures failing, at once to close the church. Your Lordships are aware that that is a course which has already been taken by me, and I was greatly in hopes that the period for reflection which the closing of the church gave to all parties would have resulted in a cessation of those disgraceful proceedings. I have no hesitation in expressing my belief that if both parties had been willing at that time to place the matter in my hands that would have been the result. I do not desire to magnify my office; but I do not even now despair, and if the clergy of that church will do—what I feel confident I would do, if I were in their place, request me, their superior officer, to take the whole matter into my hands, and declare that they are willing to abide by my decision with regard to what ought to be the services in that church, I believe that we could easily put an end to these distressing scenes.

RUMOURED ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE.

ADDRESS MOVED.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY (who was very indistinctly heard), in rising to move the Address of which he had given notice respecting the supposed project for the transference of Savoy and Nice from Sardinia to France, said that their Lordships would hardly be surprised that he should revert so soon to the very important subject which he brought under their consideration on a former evening. In order to account for his so doing he must, in the first place, recur to the emphatic statement of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville), that Her Majesty's Government had conveyed to the Government of France in firm but temperate language the objections which they entertained to the plan which was supposed to be under consideration for the annexation of Savoy and Nice to the French empire. But with a view clearly to ascertain the actual position of the affair it was important that we should be informed when this declaration had been conveyed, and whether anything had occurred since to mitigate the satisfaction which Her Majesty's Government had derived from the first reception of their objections. He was surprised, however, to find the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in "another place" had given a somewhat confused account as to the date of this action of the British Government. Lord John Russell was reported to have said the other day,—

"In the beginning of July, in consequence of a despatch from Mr. Harris, the British Minister in Switzerland, Count Walewski was asked by Lord Cowley whether there was any truth in the rumour that there was a project on foot for the annexation of Savoy to the empire of France. Some conversation passed between them, and Count Walewski's remarks were not explicit on the subject on which Lord Cowley asked for information. Some time after this Count Walewski assured the Government that there was no intention on the part of the Emperor of the French to propose the annexation in question. On the former occasion Lord Cowley stated that such a proposal would be viewed with disapprobation by Her Majesty's Government, and the language he held was approved by Her Majesty's Government. On the second occasion Her Majesty's Government directed a despatch to the British Ambassador in Paris, expressing the satisfaction with which Her Majesty's Government had received the assurance that no such project was in contemplation."

Your Lordships will perceive that allusion here is made to two distinct communications with the French Government. The first not being satisfactory as not being explicit. In another report the noble Lord is stated to have said, "Count Walewski not being satisfactory on the point of territorial limits." The two communications appeared both to have taken place in the month of July, but the second sometime after the first. In reading this statement, he (the Marquess of Normanby) was impressed by the belief that he had heard something of the same

Piedmont, could the King of Sardinia look for that loyal attachment which would be his best support against foreign attack. Already, even in Milan, things were in a most alarming state. Robberies, accompanied by assassination, were nightly committed there; the garrison had been under arms and consigned to their barracks on two or three occasions, and exactly the same annoyances which used to be applied by the ladies of Milan to the Austrian officers were now applied to the Piedmontese officers, and that dissatisfaction on the part of Lombardy with the union of the Provinces was fast assuming the proportions it acquired in 1848. What was the cause of this? The cause was that the people had experienced no benefit from their annexation, but, on the contrary, were greatly aggrieved by the excessive taxation, which was 15 per cent more than during the Austrian rule. The French newspapers had very much alluded to what they represented to be the grateful feeling of the people of Savoy to France; but what happened in 1796, after four years of French occupation? There had then as now been an alliance between France and Sardinia against Austria. General Bonaparte, having flattered Sardinia into making common cause with him, returned to France and left the King to his fate; what that fate was to be, the following proclamation by the French General at Turin would show:—

“The French Government, to facilitate peace and the triumph of the great army, was obliged provisionally to consider Kings as the representatives of their subjects. This supposition was necessary to carry on negotiations, but is now evidently circumscribed and limited. To protect the feeble is one mode of annihilating them. The alliance of the King of Sardinia with the French Republic was, in fact, the moral abdication of her sovereignty.”

Immediately afterwards the citadel of Turin was seized and occupied by French troops, and in a few months the ancient head of the house of Savoy sought refuge in the Island of Sardinia, where he was protected by an English fleet. The allegation of the old sympathies of Savoy for France was most absurd; but with respect to Nice there was not even one solitary pretence for this rumoured act of intended spoliation. He would not at that moment stop to inquire into the importance to either country of the noble harbour of Villafranca, one of the finest in the Mediterranean. He was not one of those who were not anxious to do complete justice to the Emperor of the French. He was anxious that we should continue on the best possible terms with France. Nothing could be further from his mind than a desire to provoke a difference of any kind; but when questions were raised which directly affected the balance of power in Europe, we ought to understand to what extent the parties to the treaties which regulated the present settlement of Europe would agree to any modification of them. Even at the time of the revolution in France, when the popular impulse was so great, the French Government declared that, however much they disapproved the treaties of 1815, they were determined to adopt them as accomplished facts, not to be altered without the common consent of all the Powers. If such was the feeling in France in 1848, we had some reason to hope that at least an equal regard for the obligation of treaties would be evinced by one whom he should be glad to call our intimate and loyal Ally. He might be permitted, in conclusion, to say a word on the question of nationality. It behoved every settled Government in Europe to withhold its assent from the new and dangerous doctrine of the right of a people, on the ground of nationality, to transfer their allegiance from one Sovereign to another. He hoped, at all events, that so elastic a doctrine—a doctrine which threatened the security of all Governments—would receive no encouragement from their Lordships, or from those intrusted with the administration of our public affairs. Having, he trusted, clearly shown that his object was not to make an attack upon the Government, but rather to afford them an opportunity of stating those views upon the subject of the annexation of Savoy which he was bound to say they had very early if not very forcibly expressed, and leaving the matter to be dealt with by their Lordships in whatever manner they might deem consistent with their duty, he begged to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty,

“To represent to Her Majesty that this House has been informed that Her Majesty’s Government has made known to the Government of France the Objections entertained by Her Majesty’s Government to the Annexation of Savoy and Nice, which has been reported to be in contemplation.

“To thank Her Majesty for having conveyed that Opinion to the Government of France, and to pray that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to direct Her Government to use their best Endeavours to avert the Transfer of the above named territories to the French Empire.”

EARL GRANVILLE : My Lords, the noble Marquess at the commencement of his speech seemed to complain of the answer which I gave to his question last week on the subject of Savoy. That answer was perfectly correct, and, although my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs gave some further explanations on a subsequent occasion in the other House, his statement was not at variance with, though going rather beyond, the answer which I returned in the first instance to the noble Marquess. You are aware from what has appeared in the printed despatches, that during the Administration of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) some intelligence had been received respecting a treaty between France and Sardinia which contained a clause affecting Savoy. Lord Cowley was requested by the Earl of Malmesbury to ascertain whether or not the Report which had reached our Government was accurate, and he was assured by Count Walewski that no treaty between France and Sardinia was in existence, though it might be considered necessary to make an offensive and defensive one. Count Walewski made no allusion to the question of territorial aggrandizement, and the subject was dropped. I stated last week the steps which the present Government had taken on this subject last year, and may state to you Lordships that they have continued making friendly communications to the Governments of France and Sardinia with respect to the Report of a proposed annexation of Savoy to the French Empire. We have been told by the Imperial Government that there is no question at present of the annexation of Savoy ; that one of a great many points discussed before the war was the annexation of Savoy, under certain contingencies ; but those contingencies not having occurred, there is at this moment no question of annexation. The French Government adds, at the same time, that, in the event of Sardinia, with the addition of Lombardy and other provinces, becoming a powerful Italian State, they will feel themselves at liberty to consider for their own security, what conditions they should attach to the sanction they might give to such an arrangement. From Turin the answer we have received is, that there is no engagement whatever between France and Sardinia respecting the annexation of Savoy ; that it is not the intention of the King of Sardinia to yield, sell, or exchange Savoy ; that if the Savoyards have grievances to allege, they possess the constitutional right of petitioning the Sardinian Parliament ; that their petitions will be respectfully considered, and their just complaints will be removed by appropriate legislative measures sanctioned by the Crown. I imagine every one of your Lordships must admit that it is undoubtedly the duty of the Government of this country, on all judicious occasions, to speak to other Governments in a perfectly open manner upon all subjects which concern its interests. Even if this were not so, there are at this moment circumstances arising from the coincidence of our policy upon the Italian question, and from the prospect which now opens of extending the commercial intercourse between this country and France, under the more liberal commercial policy now inaugurated by the Emperor of the French, which would greatly facilitate any friendly representations we might make to either of the parties on this subject. What would render them still more easy in regard to this question of Savoy is, that England, so far as she is directly concerned, has no interest in the matter of the annexation, seeing that it does not make any great difference to this country, as England, whether or not France acquires upon her southern frontier territory giving her certain strategical advantages. But indirectly she has, with all other Powers, an interest in the question ; and what is of paramount interest to England is the interests of Europe as a whole. In this sense it is her interest to do everything she can to promote peace, to maintain the balance of power, and to prevent the commission of acts by any nation, particularly by any of the great Powers, which may create alarm and shake the public confidence in the maintenance of peace. Therefore I think it would have been most unfriendly of Her Majesty's Government if they had not laid before that of France all the objections which, in an European sense, would arise to the aggrandisement of the French territory which was involved in the supposed scheme. It is hardly necessary to dwell upon those objections to your Lordships. No doubt France, occupying so magnificent a geographical position as she does, and having so gallant a people, who have so frequently and so recently shown in so conspicuous a manner how able they are to defend themselves upon all occasions, cannot pretend to be jealous of a country like Piedmont, even though her power should be increased by an accession of territory and subjects in Italy. On the other hand, there can be no question that the extension of the frontier of France to the Alps would very much alter the arrangements for the preservation of the balance of European power. If France goes to the Alps now there is no good reason why she should not at a subsequent period go to the Rhine. Were this not so, however, it is clear that the annexation of Savoy to France would give rise to great European difficulty. The arguments of the noble Marquess were perfectly consistent upon this point, and no doubt therefore any such attempt would excite in the mind of Europe generally deep interest, and well-grounded alarm. The enemies of the Emperor of the French at the commencement of the late war endeavoured to make it appear that he had undertaken that war from motives of personal ambition and territorial aggrandisement; and I have no doubt your Lordships well remember the manner in which the Emperor disclaimed the imputation. Among the most noble words ever uttered by a great Sovereign at the head of a victorious army were those used by the Emperor of the French at Milan, when he told the Italians that his and their enemies had endeavoured to spread the belief, that he had undertaken the war for the aggrandizement of France and not for their advantage; that, although there might be some persons who were ignorant of the public opinion of Europe, he was not one of them, and that moral influence was of more advantage to a great nation than were barren conquests, and he declared that any alteration of the territorial arrangements of France as settled by the Treaty of Vienna, would be dangerous to the peace of Europe. These were noble words; and for the Emperor now to place it in the power of those enemies, by any act of his to represent his policy as contrary to that declaration would obviously be most injurious to his reputation, and most prejudicial to his interests. I will not trouble your Lordships with any reference to what the noble Marquess has said about the duty of the British Government to make friendly representations to the Government of France on this subject, because what they have done is a sufficient confirmation. In our communications with the French Government we have gone into the question more fully than it is necessary to discuss it to your Lordships, and we have done so in the confidence that our observations would be received with a feeling as friendly as that by which they were dictated. I beg your Lordships clearly to understand that our policy is not that of nationalities, alluded to by the noble Marquess, nor is it our policy to separate ourselves from other European Powers. Upon the Italian question we are at this moment in direct and friendly communication with France, Sardinia, and Austria, and we shall be happy to communicate with any other nations who feel an interest in the settlement of that question as affecting either Italy or Europe. The policy of the British Government is not to advocate or insist upon any particular mode of carving out Italy; we do not say that the central Provinces must be joined to Sardinia; we do not assert that there may not be a central Italian kingdom. If the great majority of the people of Tuscany are in favour of the Grand Dukes, let them show and assert their opinions, and it will not be for England to object to the restoration of their old sovereigns. Our simple policy—that which we have been urging upon other Powers, and in regard to which we have been met very cordially by France, and as cordially as we could expect by Austria—is to avoid any armed interference in the affairs of the Peninsula, and to secure that the Italians shall be left to themselves to judge what is good for themselves, and in what mode their ideas of liberty and independence can best be carried out. This Motion itself has been framed in very courteous terms, and, as stated by the noble Marquess, is intended to co-operate with and strengthen Her Majesty's Government. I am of opinion that it would not have that effect. Your Lordships are perfectly well aware that at this moment the enemies to the present commercial policy of France are trying to raise a cry that the religion and commerce of that country are being sacrificed to English interests, and they would probably make use of the agreeing to such an Address as this as a means of exciting an anti-English feeling, in order to strengthen them in their opposition; and under these circumstances I do not think that it would assist Her Majesty's Government that the Motion made by the noble Marquis, who has to-night spoken of the Emperor with great respect, but who at the same time holds very peculiar and very strong opinions upon continental politics, should be forced upon them; especially when they declare their intention upon all suitable occasions to give their advice and exert their influence to prevent that which the noble Marquess, in common with all your Lordships, deprecates. I quite acquit the noble Marquess of having intended that the Government or your Lordships should pledge themselves to war or eventualities of any description in resisting the alleged scheme. But, even in its more limited sense, inasmuch as the result would surely be to cause misrepresentation in France as to their intentions, I think the Motion would rather weaken than strengthen the Government, and therefore I hope that the noble Marquess will not think it necessary to press it to a division.

EARL GREY: My Lords, I think that the House is much obliged to the noble Marquess for bringing this subject forward. It seems to me to be impossible to overestimate its importance, and I confess that I should have heard with great pleasure a different conclusion to the speech of my noble Friend who has just sat down. I should like to have heard him state that Her Majesty's Government would agree to the Address proposed. The statement which he has just made affords the clearest proof of the necessity for this Motion; because I think your Lordships will agree with me that it is difficult to conceive anything more alarming than what has been communicated to us by my noble Friend. Nothing can well be more unsatisfactory than that which he describes to have been the language of the French Government to our own on this subject, coupled with that which has been used in the semi-official newspapers of France. It is, indeed, difficult to conceive, when we consider that language, that the scheme of the annexation of Savoy to France has not gone further than we, till lately, have believed. That annexation would be so pregnant with evil to this country and to Europe that it becomes Her Majesty's Government to use their best endeavours to avert it. I quite agree with my noble Friend that, as far as we are at present informed of the facts, no man in this House can wish that war should be resorted to to prevent such an arrangement from being effected; if unhappily it should have been agreed upon by the two parties most directly interested in it. But there is a great deal short of war which may be done by a nation to prevent the adoption of measures which are injurious to its interests and to those of the world; and I can conceive no case which calls for more energetic remonstrance on the part of Her Majesty's Government than the annexation which is supposed to be in contemplation. I do not pretend to say that the annexation of Savoy to France would materially alter the balance of power in Europe. Whatever may be the obvious objections to this extension of the frontiers of France, still, when we look at what the power of that great empire is at present, I cannot think that the addition of Savoy of itself would throw so great an additional weight into the scale as to be of any very serious importance. Nor do I believe that the honour of this country is involved in preventing the arrangement if the two parties more immediately interested should agree to it. But, although it may not in its direct consequences be so injurious as to induce this country to resist it by an appeal to force, still I think, if we look at the subject closely, we shall be convinced that few events would be more injurious both to this country and to Europe than the proposed annexation; as well from its indirect consequences as from the principle which it would tend to establish if it were to be carried into effect on the grounds that have been put forward in support of it. My Lords, in considering this question we cannot lose sight of the reasons that have been urged in its favour by the journals in France, which have an importance that does not usually belong to newspapers, owing to the countenance they receive from the Imperial Government of France. Now, what are those reasons? My noble Friend has already referred to that most extraordinary article which appeared in the Patrie a few days ago, and which I venture to say must have astounded every one of your Lordships who read it. That article states that two measures cannot be applied to Savoy and to Italy; and that it is intolerable that the Government of Sardinia should interfere with the manifestation of the wishes of the Savoyards. I think that every one of your Lordships concurs in the principle that no nation ought to be compelled by foreign force to submit to a Government to which it is averse. The passage in the Queen's Speech, in which that principle was enunciated with regard to Italy, received, I believe, the unanimous approval of your Lordships. But, my Lords, it would indeed be to push that principle to a new and somewhat dangerous length if it is to be assumed, not only that a nation which is de facto in the enjoyment of self-government is not to be coerced by the arms of a foreign Power to change its Government, but that you are to go beyond that plain and simple rule, and to say that even where a settled and long-established Government exists—where a people are living contentedly and peaceably under the rulers who have for centuries reigned over them, a few agitators are to be permitted to declare that the opinion of the country is the other way; that it wishes to shake off the authority to which it is by law subject; and that it is intolerable in the Government to adopt any means of counteracting the efforts of those who seek to subvert it. Why, if this rule of international right and wrong is to be recognized, we must be supposed to have acted most unwarrantably in the year 1848, when we would not suffer certain persons to put the question to the people of Ireland whether or not that country should continue to form a part of the British Empire. Is it to be held as an indication that the people of Savoy are hostile to the existing rule, that a few individuals get up demonstrations against the Government; and is it to be maintained that the Government, instead of putting these persons down by the strong hand, must allow them to have their own way, and then have the question of the continuance of the existing authority submitted to the vote? I venture to say, if that principle is to be established, that no Government in Europe is safe for a day. Apply that principle to France itself? How would the present Emperor receive the proposal that it should be again submitted to the universal vote of the people of France whether they would have an Empire, a Red Republic, or an Orleanist, or a Legitimist dynasty? I am sure that anybody putting forward such a proposal against the settled Government in France would meet with very prompt repression. Further, we are told that the Alps are the natural boundary of France, and that the Savoyards are united to the French people by a community of language. Do these pleas alter the case or diminish the danger? My Lords, we cannot help seeing whither such principles as these lead. Do not the majority of the people of Belgium speak French as well as the inhabitants of Savoy? If such grounds as these are to be assigned for the desire of unjust territorial acquisition on the part of France, what security has Europe that other aggressions of the same kind may not be attempted? It appears to me, therefore, that the proposal for joining Savoy to France, under present circumstances, is one which this country has a right to view with the greatest apprehension and alarm, and I certainly should have hoped that this House might be induced to agree, without a division, to the Address which the noble Marquess has moved. I am the last person to suggest that the Motion should be pressed contrary to the desire of Her Majesty's Government. I am persuaded that if it were so pressed, even though it were carried, it would do more harm than good; and for this simple reason—that it would make it appear that there exists a difference of opinion in your Lordships' House, when I believe no such difference really exists. I believe we are all united in condemning and reprobating the scheme which is supposed to be in agitation. If, therefore, we were to come to a division on the question—whichever way it ended—it would make it appear that a very considerable number of your Lordships dissented from what I think is our unanimous opinion. But it would be a very different matter if Her Majesty's Government could be induced to concur in this Motion. I cannot help feeling that at this moment a unanimous expression of the sentiments of this House would have great influence on the opinion of France and of the world. Powerful as France may be, I do not believe that she would despise such a manifestation of opinion, backed as it would be by the views of every other country in Europe. I would therefore earnestly entreat my noble Friend who spoke last (Earl Granville) seriously to consider this subject. I would especially ask him what motive he can have for resisting this Motion. My noble Friend who brought it forward stated most distinctly that he did so without in any way implying the most distant censure on Her Majesty's Government. On the contrary, his first words were those of thanks to the Government for the course which they have taken. The only object of the Motion is to strengthen their hands in pursuing the line of policy which, if I understood my noble Friend aright, it is their intention, of their own accord, to follow. The single objection which, as I gathered from my noble Friend, they have to this Motion, is the fear that it might be misinterpreted in France. My Lords, I cannot believe that there is any ground for such a fear; I cannot suppose that the Emperor of the French would see anything unfriendly towards himself in our expressing our opinion against the measure which he is supposed to contemplate. On the contrary, I think if the opinion of this House and the country were placed before the Emperor in language firm, and at the same time amicable, it would be calculated to produce considerable effect—because, it must surely be the interest of the Emperor to attend to our remonstrances. What, let me ask, can France gain by this comparatively insignificant addition to her territory to compensate her for the loss of confidence and the loss of character which such a measure must entail? My noble Friend has already adverted to the commercial treaty recently signed between this country and France. We are told that the Emperor of the French is about to adopt a liberal commercial policy, in which this treaty is the first step. But, can a liberal commercial policy produce its proper fruits unless there is commercial and political confidence in the continuance of peace? Confidence is the very breath of life by which trade and industry are maintained; and how can that confidence in the permanence of peace exist for a day in Europe if this annexation of Savoy to France is to be carried into effect, in a manner, and upon principles which hold out to all Europe the prospect of further and indefinite changes that cannot possibly be accomplished without provoking all the horrors of war? I say that this annexation would produce a shock to confidence, which in France and in Europe would be felt by trade and industry for years to come. And has not the Emperor himself the deepest interest (if he has a due concern for his own character) in abstaining from carrying this project into effect? We all know that statements have been made in the newspapers that this annexation is only the execution of a design long entertained though studiously concealed. We know that it has been asserted—I trust falsely—that this would be merely the carrying into effect of a secret stipulation entered into between Sardinia and France some considerable time before the breaking out of the late war, by which Sardinia was to be put in possession of a great increase of territory in Italy, in return for which France was to obtain Savoy and Nice. Now, my Lords, if that were true—and I trust most sincerely that it is not—it would be impossible to find terms sufficiently strong to describe the iniquity and the immorality of the two parties concerned. When we remember the language that was used in France before the breaking out of the war, the solemn protestations of her desire, up to the last moment, to preserve peace, her asseverations, even after the war had made some progress, that she had no selfish object in view, and had no intention of promoting her territorial aggrandisement, can we believe that all these solemn asseverations were made at the same time that there existed a private stipulation for dividing the prey, entered into before the quarrel was picked, through which the booty was to be obtained? If such a compact were entered into between France and Sardinia, I say it would be difficult to find in the annals of the world a case of more flagrant iniquity. I hope these things are not true. They have seemed to me so bad that I have tried as much as possible to reject the belief that such things can really be true. I still do so; but I cannot deny that those who affirm them are able to appeal to strong circumstantial evidence in favour of their assertions. I hope that, in spite of appearances, the fact is not as stated; but if, in addition to the circumstantial evidence we already have in support of these allegations, we should have the additional pregnant fact that this design of joining Savoy to France is carried into effect, it will be impossible, however anxious we may be to do so, longer to retain our incredulity. If the Emperor of the French has a due regard to his own honour and character, he will be grateful if this country should come forward in a calm and friendly spirit to urge him to abstain from that, which I cannot describe otherwise than as a great crime against the civilized world. My Lords, I have taken the first opportunity that presented itself to press upon my noble Friends on the Government bench my sense of the great importance of this question. I have done so from no hostile feeling, and with an earnest desire to avoid any remark of an invidious character on their conduct in relation to this matter; but with all my desire to avoid even an approach to censure, I am compelled to express my regret that my noble Friend and Her Majesty's Government have omitted some clearer expression of the opinion I am convinced they must entertain on this subject. It must have struck all your Lordships who take a view similar to my own as to the importance of this question of the proposed annexation, that the language of my noble Friend and that of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, as reported to have been used by him in "another place," have been singularly mild to say the least, considering the gravity of the case. I think it is specially important that Her Majesty's Government should at this moment give cordial expression to what I believe are the opinions of every Englishman on this subject. My noble Friend adverted to the commercial treaty with France. Now, I think that before that treaty was signed—before Her Majesty's Government consented to give to the Government of France so signal a mark of their friendship and good will—they ought to have required from the French Emperor, in some authentic and formal shape, a distinct disavowal of his entertaining any such designs with regard to Savoy as have been imputed to him. I deeply regret that the treaty was signed without having some such disavowal as that; but then the omission makes it the more important that we should now take some measures to obtain it; and, if in accordance with the unanimous vote of this House, and I hope of the other House of Parliament also, Her Majesty's Government should even now ask for such a disavowal, I am persuaded that it will not be withheld. I do not ask your Lordships to agree to the Motion if my noble Friend opposes it, but I hope that my noble Friend himself will see the propriety of adopting it.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: My Lords, I have all along shared in the deep and anxious feeling entertained by the whole people of this country in favour of Italian liberty, and in the wish entertained by all parties that the Italians should rise to everything that is honourable, free, and great; but I fear that if the matter now under discussion be allowed to find its consummation in the way in which it is said to be desired by France, we shall see the great question of Italian liberty mixed up with elements that must hereafter be productive of the greatest mischief to Europe, and that will cast a deep and indelible stain both upon the Emperor of the French and the King of Sardinia. I gathered from my noble Friend that this matter is not yet consummated—is still under consideration, and that, therefore, there is still time for this and the other House of Parliament, and the whole people of England, to declare their unanimous and decided opinion regarding it. I judge that the Emperor of the French is still endeavouring to carry out this object, and that the Sardinian Government are bringing forward as many arguments and as much influence as they can to prevent it. If so, now is the time to declare our opinion, and to do what we can to obtain justice for the weaker side in this contest. There can be no doubt that a great stain will be inflicted on all those engaged in this transaction should it be carried into effect. Such a result I should deeply regret. I am anxious for the honour of the French Emperor; but if he persist in this demand for the annexation of Savoy, how will he reconcile it with the words he uttered at Milan—those words with which he endeavoured to conciliate the opinions of Europe—and which I agreed with my noble Friend (Earl Granville) are among the most noble words that ever fell from the lips of man. We have been told that France goes to war for an idea; but in this case the abstract and sublime have been brought down to something that is concrete and commercial. Instead of standing by a mere idea, the French Emperor requires additional territory and additional influence, and the rights and interests of nations are merged in dynastic enterprises. Sardinia cannot come out unscathed from such a project unless she resist the attempt to the full extent of her moral power—and I will not hesitate to say to the full extent of her physical power also. That she should do rather than submit to the degradation. And even Italy herself will be in some measure to blame, because she will secure advantages to herself at the expense of the hereditary rights of another people. Indeed the elements of mischief in this matter are both abundant and dangerous. Are we to see French influence substituted for that of Austria in Italy? It is true that French influence would be exercised in a more careful, delicate, and astute manner than that of Austria—no doubt the policy of France would be more artful; but the dominion will be the same, and the independence of Italy will be placed in equal jeopardy. Then, are we to see the frontier of France advance until it comes in contact with the republic of Geneva? Does not this scheme affect the independence of Switzerland? Are we to believe that the acquisition of Savoy and Nice, and the beautiful port of Villafranca is not an important step towards realizing the French policy of turning the Mediterranean into a French lake? Then, coincident with this state of things, there is the revival of the wild scheme of the Suez Canal, which may be, commercially, the most absurd thing ever propounded, but considered politically has a very different meaning. There would be a French settlement established, and one more French port acquired on that side of the Mediterranean. But, my Lords, I look with far more apprehension on this new principle which is now to be laid down for the government of nations. We have heard much about natural boundaries, and have been told that Savoy has been claimed because rightly it belongs to France; but we are now, according to the new doctrine which has been propounded, to claim as a right conterminous nations speaking the same language. In that case the smaller nation speaking the language of the greater must invariably be absorbed, though not perhaps at first by open and direct violence, but rather by diplomatic trickery. I do not hesitate to say that if this principle is to be recognized and practically adopted in any single instance, all Europe, to use a common but significant expression, will be submitting to one of the greatest humbugs ever perpetrated on mankind. We are told that at a recent public meeting held at Chambery, a strong opinion was expressed in favour of annexation. But let me remind your Lordships that it is very possible for great personages to coerce priests in one country, and to coax them in another. But there has been another meeting at Chambery, at which a diametrically opposite feeling was expressed. Who is to decide? It is suggested in the French press that even the King of Sardinia is not to be at liberty to employ his own agents in the maintenance of his own and his people's rights. The case of Central Italy is not analogous. There we have the plain fact before us that the country is without a ruler. And the people of Central Italy have a perfect right to declare under what governor they will serve. But is that the case with the Savoyards? Have the Savoyards thrown off their allegiance to their rightful Sovereign? Are they in open rebellion? No. Their country is an integral part of the kingdom of Sardinia, and only by the whole mass of the people of Sardinia can the question be decided, whether Savoy is, or is not to be separated from the parent State. But, observe what a future is being opened up under this new policy! Take the case of Geneva. If this new principle be good, that conterminous nations speaking the same language are to be annexed to the greater nation, provided only there be an expression of sympathy on the part of the people, can any person who has lately been in Geneva doubt that an expression of sympathy might with great facility be got up there in favour of annexation with France? If this principle be good, see how easily the whole system of Europe may be broken up. I want to know, for instance; why Germany should not demand the Baltic provinces from Russia; and why Russia—who, as we well know, is not reluctant to put such principles in motion—should be hindered from claiming the Slavonic provinces of Austria. Once let such a principle be recognized, and everything will be broken up; all things will be at sea; and all to gratify the ambition and the policy of one man, who thinks he has new schemes to propound, but whose object is to break up the whole European system established on the treaties of 1815. But a new inducement has been held out by the French Government to induce Sardinia to consent to this proposition. We are told that the French Government will be content with annexing part and surrendering part to the Swiss Republic. Is this to be done without the consent of the people? Is such a proposition to be entertained in the present day? Is it not a revival of the wild principles that led to the partition of Poland, from the effects of which the nations of Europe are still writhing? If annexation is to take place—which God forbid!—let Savoy be annexed bodily to the Republic of Switzerland—the country that has the deepest interest in the peace of Europe, in the maintenance of treaties, and in the liberty of all nations. But, God forbid that anything of the kind should take place. I believe that nothing could be more prejudicial to the state of Europe, or more disastrous to the future peace of the world and the progress of civilization. These are the general and detailed arguments against such a measure; but it rests on great and broad principles that far exceed in importance any arguments founded on details which can be urged against it. To the latest hour of my life I will protest—and in doing so I am sure I speak the sentiments of the great mass of my countrymen—against handing over a nation that enjoys free institutions to a Government under a despotic dynasty; and against handing over a free people bound hand and foot to a country where they can enjoy no free expression of opinion, or, if guaranteed that expression of opinion, can exercise no power in giving it practical effect. I protest against a country where religious liberty is proclaimed, being handed over to a nation where religious liberty, if proclaimed, is often violated; and I protest also against the policy of treating nations like flocks of sheep, and making them, regardless of their consent, the subjects of barter and exchange. We, in this country, have long protested against the traffic in human flesh. I equally protest against any traffic in human or national rights. I implore the Government, in the name of all the great principles cherished by the people of England, to use every effort in their power to place before the Emperor of the French the fearful consequences of such a measure as this — to appeal to his judgment, to his sagacity, and to his better feelings, and I doubt not that, if they do so, he will be brought to a wise conclusion. But, be that as it may, let the Government go forth, representing the deep sense of the people of this country, acting on the convictions of justice and the rights of nations, and I doubt not that then we shall succeed in the object we now have in view, and beat back, by the unanimous voice of the people of England, the consummation of this most pernicious and disgraceful project.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE:—I shall not, for more than a few moments, stand between the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby, who rose at the same time) and your Lordships. I do not rise for the purpose of interfering with the future progress of this discussion, but chiefly to implore your Lordships not to be led away by the tone which my noble Friend has just imparted to the debate. We are accustomed frequently to hear honest and honourable sentiments fall from the noble Earl expressed in very fervid language. He is accustomed to deal in a similar manner with domestic topics, in which the mischief done, if any, can be comparatively small compared with that which may arise from such language upon a question like that now before your Lordships. I cannot help thinking that the tendency of my noble Friend's language, and the tone he has given to this debate, are calculated to frustrate the object which we all have in view. Hoping that these questions are likely to receive a peaceful solution, I deprecate such expressions as he has used in reference to some of the countries concerned. Even were it justifiable, it is not dignified; but I appeal to him whether he was justified in using one phrase—namely, that in which he called upon Sardinia to oppose not merely with her moral influence, but with her physical power, the measure now under discussion. I apprehend that if such language coming from a Member of your

The Earl of Shaftesbury

Lordships' House, is adopted by the House, it will amount to a declaration that your Lordships would approve of resort to war; and I say it would not be just or honourable to call on Sardinia to enter on a war with this object unless we were fully prepared, under all conditions and under all circumstances, to assist her. My noble Friend followed two noble Lords who have spoken upon this question in a different tone, although they have had the same object as he has. I can assure your Lordships that while listening to the speech of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Normanby), and not less so to that of the noble Earl (Earl Grey), the Government have not felt any objection to the discussion of this subject by independent Peers, and if we do resist the Motion, it is merely because we are convinced that its adoption would, instead of assisting the efforts of Government, materially tend to thwart them; but if such would be the result of the Motion, to how far greater extent must it be the consequence of such speeches as that of the noble Earl who spoke last? I was distressed to hear one expression that fell from the noble Earl (Earl Grey) who complained of the mild language held upon this subject by my noble Friend the President of the Council in this, and the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the other House of Parliament. If the noble Earl had deprecated, not the mild language of Her Majesty's Ministers, but their weak conduct, I could have felt that he had indeed something to complain of. But I apprehend it is the conduct of wise and good Ministers not to indulge in violent language, but to express themselves in mild and respectful terms when addressing other Governments, to use such language as they would desire to have held towards them by foreign Governments; and while offering firm remonstrances, to do so in terms respectful and considerate towards the Government to which they are addressed. I am quite sure that if the language of Her Majesty's Ministers had at all approached or resembled that we have just heard, one of two events would have happened—a war, or the annexation, which we all deprecate, would have been carried out. We know, and must bear in mind, that all that is said here is read across the water, and we should not forget what we felt under similar circumstances. Have we forgotten the just anger that was exhibited when men, far less responsible to the Government, filling less important positions than Members of the Legislature, held such violent language with regard to us, how great was our indignation, and that the country was almost ready to take up arms to avenge itself? I do most earnestly deprecate language which tends to cause irritation on the other side of the Channel, and I feel a confident hope that if the matter be left in the hands of the Government, and they are allowed to carry on the negotiation in a firm but respectful and conciliatory spirit, we have a good prospect of attaining our object. But if noble Peers come forward to support the Government by violent speeches, there can be little doubt that the annexation which we all desire to prevent will be carried out. The noble Earl who spoke previously (Earl Grey) put the question of English interests upon a proper basis, not as a separate interest, but a European one, in which England was jointly concerned with other Powers, and, following out the principle, I believe your Lordships cannot doubt that the Government has from the first done all in its power by representations, both to France and Sardinia, to prevent that which we all deprecate, and, if permitted, will continue to do so in the same spirit which has hitherto guided it.

LORD BROUGHAM :—My Lords, I wish to make the few observations which I have to offer to your Lordships before the noble Earl near me (the Earl of Derby) rises to address you, because of the part I have always taken in all questions relating to Italy. In the first place, allow me to say I entirely approve of, and was much gratified by the statement of the noble Earl the President of the Council. I view with much satisfaction the statement which my noble Friend made in regard to the communications received from France and sent to France, and I will add that I entirely object, as much as my noble Friend the noble Marquess and the noble Earl object, to what is called the annexation of Savoy and Nice to the French Empire. My objection rests upon the grounds stated by my noble Friends, and it is not merely because of the comparatively trifling addition, whether territorial or strategical, which such an annexation would give to the French Empire, but because of the breach of principle there would be in the departure from the settlement of Europe, and the prospect of what may follow—of what may, without any unreasonable alarm or without any stretch of imagination, be done by other Governments; or even what might be done by our nearest neighbour. We must consider what every man in the north of Europe will feel if this annexation takes place, after all the declarations which have been made, and after all the abstinence which had been described as the governing principle of the French Emperor. If after the Italian war, so professed to have been undertaken, this annexation takes place, where is it to stop? Where is the principle of boundaries to stop? What becomes of the boundary of the Rhine?—I need go no further; but will there be a security against any further alteration or distribution of power in Germany as well as on the Rhine? But it appears to me that your Lordships are all of the same opinion on this subject. I see no difference, except in the mode of expressing ourselves. If I were asked, I should say that I object to the language which my noble Friend near me (the Earl of Shaftesbury) has used, particularly that which he has applied to Sardinia—not the language of deprecation against Sardinia, but in his words of encouragement to that Power to go to war to prevent this annexation, the use of what he called physical force. But I do agree with my noble Friend in one principle he has enunciated. I agree that there can be nothing more atrocious than the handing over, against their will, the people of one country to another Government—the people of a free country, with free institutions, to a Power partaking of despotic. This was the crime, greatest ever committed by nations, the partition of Poland; nothing then can be worse than such a forcible transfer. But I will go further, and I object to the handing over of one country to another, even if not contrary to the wishes of the people. I agree with my noble Friends, that there can be nothing more clear than the principle laid down on the first night of the Session namely, that the Italians ought to be allowed to manage their own affairs, to settle their own form of Government, and to choose the persons to execute it without any foreign interference whatever. Everything should be done by themselves, without the interference of France, Austria, or Sardinia. Such interference is to be entirely deprecated. Still, I think that foreign interference may be used—not by force—but asserted in another form. I agree that the people of a country are themselves to regulate their own affairs in all respects—that the people of the Duchies and all the several Italian Powers have a right to throw off their rulers—which they have done—to refuse to take them back—which they do not seem likely to do—and that they ought to manage their own concerns as regards the forms of government, or to institute new forms of government, whether they be monarchical, republican, or a mixture of the two, and the choice of rulers by whom their Government is to be administered. All that is their own affair, and no other Power has a right to interfere. But it is quite another thing even when the people of a country are unanimously desirous of annexing themselves to another Power—and here it is said on one side that the Savoyards desire annexation, and on the other that they object to it; but assuming that they are in favour of annexation, it is quite another thing if that change gives the other Powers of Europe reason to apprehend an alteration. I will not use the phrase so much abused of the balance of Power, but the distribution of territory. Then the principle of non-interference stops, and it becomes a question for the other Powers to entertain in regard to the distribution of Power in Europe. Now that, I contend, is quite consistent with the great doctrine of allowing the independence of Italy, and of allowing the Italians to arrange their internal affairs without foreign interference. But the practical question before the House is this: How are your Lordships to deal with the Motion before you? And I confess that, although I feel as anxious as any one to obtain the opinion of your Lordships upon this question, I should deprecate a course which would lead to the idea that there was any division of opinion, or which would show an indication that the great principles were not fully and unanimously approved of. Even suppose the Motion of my noble Friend is carried unanimously. I concur with the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Newcastle) that this also would be inauspicious, that it would tend very much to obstruct the friendly communications and shake the friendly feeling between this country and France. And if it is rejected it might go forth that the adversaries of the Government of the Emperor had been defeated. In any case the Motion is calculated to disturb the good understanding between the two countries, and interfere with arrangements that are most important to the prospects of peace, and I therefore advise the noble Marquess not to press that Motion to a division.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords,

when I rose a short time since it was not for the purpose of continuing to any length the present debate, or rather what has been not so much a debate as a conversation of the utmost importance; and in which, with regard to the main principle involved in the Motion of the noble Marquess, there has not been, so far as I have observed, the slightest difference of opinion expressed by any one Member of this House. Undoubtedly, various noble Lords have expressed with more or less force the views they entertain of the supposed policy or scheme for the annexation of Savoy to France. The noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), who always speaks with considerable power, in alluding to this annexation, appeared to think that the measure has been finally determined on; while my noble and learned Friend, who has just sat down, spoke of the arrangements with respect to this matter as still trembling in the balance. [Lord BROUGHAM explained that what he spoke of as still trembling in the balance was the commercial treaty with France.] The only thing with which I have felt disappointed in the course of this debate is that in the address of the noble Earl the President of the Council, while he described the advice—the undoubtedly friendly advice, offered in firm and temperate language—Her Majesty's Government has tendered to the Government of France, he did not add that the advice so tendered has been accepted as conclusive and satisfactory, and that there is no reason for apprehending that the project, so fraught with evil and mischief to all concerned in it, is likely to be carried into effect. The noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) has pointed out, in the strong and forcible language he generally employs, the dangerous consequences arising from the present state of the affairs of Italy, and the dangerous consequences of substituting French for Italian influence in the Northern Provinces. Certainly, my Lords, that influence will be enormously augmented if the power of France is increased by the cession to it of the Province of Savoy, a measure that will leave open to France the gates of Italy. I must take the liberty of saying that when the late Government was using its utmost endeavours to persuade the several powers not to enter into that unhappy war, it especially pointed out the consequences that Sardinia and Savoy would have to apprehend from an alliance with France, should there be an actual outbreak of hostilities. These consequences are now, perhaps, more clearly seen than they were at that time ; and, however difficult it may be to effect it, I hope that the unanimous opinion of Europe, firmly and temperately expressed, may succeed in preventing a measure that can only lead to interminable complications or consequences yet more dangerous. In the course of this debate I think there has been much that must be gratifying to Her Majesty's Government. I do not agree with the observation that has been made that the adoption of the Motion would be disadvantageous to the general peace and good understanding existing between the two countries. I am certain that if it is rejected because there is a difference of opinion between the noble Marquess and Her Majesty's Ministers on the question as to whether the grounds laid down by the noble Marquess are not constitutional principles or sound international principles, that its rejection would be a singular evil. However that may be, making all allowance for the language which has been used by my noble Friend, Her Majesty's Government will be among the first to admit that the present discussion has exhibited a strong and unanimous feeling on the part of every Member of the British House of Peers, that must be a strong element in the preservation of the peace of Europe and the continuance of a good understanding with that Power whose conduct has been most strongly commented on. My Lords, it is not necessary to discuss the evils and dangers that will arise from the annexation of Savoy to France. They are admitted by all parties ; one noble Lord has gone beyond another in the earnestness with which he has pointed out the dangers and evils which must result from the sanction of Europe being given to it. But let me express to all concerned my conviction that the two parties who will suffer most in character and honour by such an annexation will be the two Powers between whom the supposed compact has been made. It has already been pointed out that, by consenting to such an act, the French Emperor will contradict the liberal sentiments he uttered at Milan, and belie the whole course he has pursued since he ascended the throne of France. On every occasion he has studiously declared, and his actions have never yet been in contradiction to it, that whatever he might think, that whatever France might think, of the treaties of 1815, he did not intend to infringe them, but that he recognized them as part of the international law of Europe. From that declaration the conduct of the French Emperor has never swerved. What course he might have pursued, had not Austria precipitated the war in Italy, it is now impossible to say ; how far he might have been involved with Sardinia it is impossible to discuss. But the precipitation of Austria, after the declaration of the Emperor that, as long as she continued within her own dominions, he was determined to give no material assistance to Sardinia, commenced the war by the invasion of her neighbour's territory, from that moment, whatever the provocation she received, she precluded herself from calling on Europe to maintain her territorial rights as fixed by the treaties of 1815. But, my Lords, if any Power will suffer more than another, more even than France, and incur an indelible disgrace by giving up Savoy, that Power is Sardinia. She claimed to be the champion and vindicator of the liberty of Italy ; she always declared that she entered into the war without any motive of self-aggrandisement, animated solely by a desire to achieve freedom for Italy, thinking nothing of herself. I can hardly understand the language of the noble Earl (Earl Granville) to-night, when he admitted that previous to the war there was some negotiation between France and Sardinia on the subject of a possible annexation of Savoy on certain conditions or contingencies. Now, if such negotiations ever did take place, I confess it is difficult to give credit to the declaration that Sardinia engaged in the war without any previous idea of an increase of territory. You are aware, my Lords, that by a special treaty—the Treaty of Turin—to the provisions of which, I believe, the assent of the other Powers of Europe was obtained, Switzerland and Piedmont reciprocally bound themselves under no circumstances and upon no conditions to cede to any other Power the territory in question, and Piedmont, having accepted that territory, not simply by way of exchange or with the object of promoting the peace of Europe, but by way of affording mutual security as between Switzerland and herself, would, in my opinion, be guilty, not only of a violation of the general law of Europe, but of an infraction of those specific engagements she has contracted with that Power, whose independence and neutrality is the very key-stone of the peace of Europe. I am not, however, prepared to attribute to Sardinia conduct at once so discreditable and so inconsistent with the professions which she has made. I trust, on the contrary, that she will have the firmness to say to France—"This is a question with respect to which I am unable to comply with your wishes. I am bound, not alone by the general law of Europe and the treaties of 1815, but by a specific engagement into which I have entered with Switzerland, never to yield up to a third Power this particular territory." Could France, my Lords, in opposition to such a plea as that, by force and without the consent of Piedmont, take possession of Savoy? If she did seize upon that province, must it not be either by resorting to an act of the most unscrupulous violence—an act of which I am far from suspecting that she would be guilty—or as the result of the base and unprincipled connivance of the King of Sardinia, who would thus be despoiling his dominions of that portion of them which furnishes its best troops to his army and the most loyal and attached subjects to his throne? I do not, indeed think, my Lords, that the question is one in dealing with which it becomes this country to use the language of menace. I am, nevertheless, of opinion that it does befit England, as one of the great Powers of Europe, and by the free expression of the sentiments of this, the highest Assembly of a free nation, to have it placed upon record that the unanimous verdict of the Members of that Assembly is, that such conduct on the part of France as I have described would be inconsistent with the due maintenance of the treaties of 1815—that they deem it important, even in the interests of France herself, that she should do nothing to shake that confidence which it is so desirable should be established throughout Europe, and without the establishment of which no good security for the permanent peace of the Continent can be afforded. It is not, my Lords, the armed force of France, great as that undoubtedly is—it is not the important fact that the great resources of that great country are wielded by one absolute and despotic authority—it is not these combined circumstances which create apprehension. No, it is this which causes alarm—that she has never yet been able to succeed in inspiring Europe with perfect confidence in the steadiness of her policy, or in the pacific character of her intentions. Let her, then, show but the slightest design to annex to her own a territory, small in extent, but great in strategic importance; let her but exhibit the smallest indication, now that she has so far succeeded in expelling Austrian influence from Italy, to perpetuate her own domination in that country by means of large standing armies—maintained I know not for what purpose—and I speak not now of the French garrison at Rome—let her, in short, but evince the most trifling disposition to transfer to herself the authority which Sardinia at present possesses over Savoy, thus securing for herself a passage into Italy, and obtaining a resting-place whence her armies may overrun the territories of an ally whose dominions she has been the means of aggrandizing—but under such circumstances of aggrandizing, I would say, to the danger of that Ally—let France, I repeat, my Lords, but pursue such a course of policy as that, and then, indeed, confidence—which is a plant of slow growth, especially among nations—can hardly be expected to be re-established between the powerful French Empire and the rest of Europe, which is looking on and watching her movements, in an attitude of anxious and suspicious hostility. I must, at the same time, observe, my Lords, that a great opportunity is now afforded to the Emperor of the French to maintain unimpaired his character for scrupulous adherence to the principles of good faith. Let him, then, declare that he concurs with Her Majesty's Government in the view which they take of the evils which would be likely to flow, not merely from this annexation of Savoy to France, but from any infraction of those territorial limits which have been so long established, and that he desires the maintenance of the balance of power and the peace of Europe. Let him prove to the world that he went to war—as he declared it to be his intention to do—for the liberation of Italy from foreign control, and not with the view to wield himself that power the exercise of which he condemned in another; let him show that he respects England, and that right of self-government and independent action which we freely recognized in the case of that mighty Empire over which he reigns by the choice of its people; let him make it plain to Europe that neither upon the side of the Rhine nor the Alps is he to be tempted, by any vain idea as to what may seem to him the natural boundaries of France, to depart from those just principles which are far more potent than any natural limits whatsoever; let him frankly and avowedly take that course not under menace, for menace no nation would venture to offer him; but acting on the friendly representations of a country with which it is his boast that he is on terms of close intimacy and alliance, whose policy he declares to be identical with his own, and with which he does not hesitate to announce that he acts hand in hand and side by side. Let him, my Lords, I repeat, pursue that course; let him proclaim to the world that no violation of the existing boundaries of Europe is to be apprehended at his hands, and that he has given England the most solemn assurances that, in common with her, he will proceed upon the principle of absolute and entire non-interference with the affairs of other countries. If he so acts, then indeed, my Lords, will he have nobly availed himself of the opportunity which is now presented to him of reaping that best and most priceless fruit of the victories which he has won—the establishment over the minds of his fellow men of that moral authority which, unlike his great military power, is only to be attained by unswerving good faith, by scrupulous integrity, and by a strict adherence to the obligations of treaties and the rights of nations.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY expressed his regret that in the course of his speech in referring to the policy which contended that this country and Sardinia ought to pursue in reference to the question under the notice of the House, he should have used the phrase “physical power,” to which the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Newcastle) had alluded.

LORD STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE said, the remarks which had just fallen from the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby), who had spoken in terms so eloquent on the important subject under discussion, rendered him desirous to address a few observations with respect to it to the House. The noble Earl had stated that every noble Lord who had taken part in the discussion had in reality given expression to the same sentiments, modified although those sentiments might be by the form in which they were conveyed. It had so happened, however, that, with the exception of the noble Marquess by whom the debate had been opened, no noble Lord practically connected with the diplomatic service had ventured to address the House upon a question which in so eminent a degree came within the sphere of that department. As one, therefore, who had some experience in diplomatic affairs, he might perhaps be permitted to lay before their Lordships very briefly the views with respect to the present Motion which he entertained. He should, then, in the first place, observe that he entirely concurred with the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) in the opinion that it was for the interest of Europe at large that we should enter our protest against the addition of Savoy to the territories of the French Emperor, for it was impossible with justice to say that France by obtaining possession of that province and Nice would not be furnished with additional power of extending her influence over Italy; and although it might be said that England had no special interest in the latter country beyond that which related to her commerce, yet it was of the utmost importance that foreign influence should not be employed there in a manner prejudicial to us, especially if that influence were to proceed from a quarter which afforded indication of a readiness to pursue a policy unfavourable to this country—a policy on which he hoped the present Emperor of the French would never act, although it must be borne in mind that such had been the traditional policy of the French nation from the earliest times. He alluded to that policy which France had long been desirous of carrying out, which would convert the Mediterranean into a French lake. With regard to the territorial transfer now said to be contemplated, in proportion as it might be inexpedient to hazard the peace of this country and of Europe by our opposition to that transfer, so it was incumbent on Parliament at the proper time to express its opinions on the subject, and thus afford to the Government a support which would enable them when the time came to act up to their declarations. These declarations, though not quite so strong and so emphatic as had just been heard from other parts of the House, made it evident that the Government perceived the danger to which this annexation might lead, and felt themselves bound to take whatever measures could in prudence be suggested to prevent it. It could not be denied that, in addition to the increased influence which would accrue to her in Italy, France would derive from the acquisition of Savoy and Nice advantages infinitely superior to those which we had lately been accused of aiming at. What importance, for example, was attached by some of our neighbours to that miserable island at the entrance of the Red Sea, and what irritation had been produced by our supposed desire of acquiring it! The possession of Perim was, indeed, of little importance as compared with the possession of Savoy and Nice; but even these considerations, important as they were, became comparatively trivial by the side of the questions of general policy which had just been so eloquently commented upon by the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby). It was in this point of view that the strange and pernicious principles which had lately been put forward across the Channel were chiefly to be regarded. We had certainly no right to attribute these principles to the constituted authorities of France; yet they bore about them some marks of recognition by the authorities, and could not, therefore, be divested of importance. When their Lordships remembered these things, he could not help thinking that the Motions of the noble Marquess and the discussion which it had evoked were such as to inspire the strongest feelings of satisfaction; and he must therefore add his testimony to that of others as to the service rendered by the noble Marquess to this House and to the country by bringing the question forward. In the debate which had taken place he had heard nothing inconsistent with the language which a great assembly like this was entitled and was, indeed, bound to use. It seemed to him that just in proportion as they were called upon to do everything which might prevent the country from being plunged into war, so it became a more urgent duty on the part of Parliament to express a strong opinion when principles were enunciated which struck at the roots of all international obligations and of all international confidence. On such an occasion surely it was in the province of this House and of Parliament to meet such principles by a counter declaration, which should operate upon other countries, and, perhaps, thereby be the means of checking designs which it would be necessary to oppose even at the hazard of war. In the course of this debate a just tribute had been paid to the honour and the consistency of the great man now at the head of the French Empire. As far as the direct relations between the two countries were concerned this tribute was no doubt just and well-founded. But at the same time no one could help observing that during the last few years there had been certain transactions, by the side, so to speak, of the direct and public relations between the two countries, which had excited astonishment combined with some degree of distrust, not only here, but throughout Europe. When these matters were brought before Parliament, and opinions were frankly interchanged there respecting them, he thought their Lordships had a right to expect that instead of being treated as causes of offence or of quarrel by other Powers, these opinions should, on the contrary, be regarded as arising from a just sense of duty not only towards our own country, but towards Europe at large, and from a sincere desire for the continuance of that peace which was of so much importance to us and the whole world. This free expression of opinion on all subjects affecting our Foreign relations was not only of value in preventing bloodshed, but in extending also those great commercial interests which strengthened the friendship of nations; and he hoped that the present discussion would so be regarded, and would not fail of that happy effect.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY, in reply, said he was surprised to find that the Government made any difficulty in assenting to his Motion. It was not his intention to resist the appeal made to him by his noble Friend opposite, who said it would be inconvenient that the Motion should be pressed. But, although he was willing to withdraw it, he wished it to be understood that, his noble Friend excepted, every one who had spoken in this debate had assented not only to the principle which he had put forward, but to the expediency of giving expression to the unanimous assent of the House by adopting the Address he had moved; but by not pressing it he meant to leave upon Her Majesty's Ministers the responsibility of carrying out the views of the House in the way they thought most likely to be successful. It had been stated that if Savoy were annexed to France it would be by the decision of the people. He hoped their unbiassed decision was here meant, and that their opinions would be elicited without any foreign pressure. But he begged at the same time distinctly to be understood as not agreeing to withdraw his Motion for the reasons given by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham), that its adoption might endanger the success of the Commercial Treaty. The prospect of such a result would not alarm him at all. But if his noble and learned Friend were still in the House, he would tell him what he had often heard was said in Paris within the last few days as to the reason why England would not strongly resist this measure. The phrase used might be best trans-

FRIDAY ADJOURNMENTS.

MR. STEUART gave notice of a Motion for Thursday next,

"That it would tend to the regularity of Debate, on the Motion for Adjournment on Fridays, if the Clerk were instructed to place in their order on the paper, one after another, all questions to be addressed to each particular Member of the Government; and if Mr. Speaker were to call on honourable Members in such order, and the Member of the Government to reply, so that each subject might be closed before a different one taken up; and that the Clerk be so instructed accordingly."

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.

QUESTION.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he understood the noble Lord at the head of the Government to state on the previous evening, that the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would lay the Commercial Treaty with France, which had been lately ratified, on the table of the House on Friday. Since that time what appeared to be the contents of the Treaty had been published in a foreign journal, and had been copied into the London newspapers. After what had fallen from the noble Lord, he would not urge the immediate production of the Treaty, were it not that while the possession of no information on the subject might be inconvenient to those engaged in trade with France, the possession of information, imperfect and, perhaps, more or less inaccurate, would be likely to lead to very serious inconvenience indeed. He would, therefore, like to ask the noble Lord, Whether he can inform the House, whether the version of the Treaty given in the morning journals, and by them universally accepted as accurate, is substantially accurate or not?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I cannot say that I read with any attention the report of the Treaty given in the papers. No doubt it is partially accurate, but I do not think a Commercial Treaty of that kind, containing many complicated provisions, can be properly understood by the House and by the country unless they were in possession of the Treaty itself. I propose to lay it on the table, by Her Majesty's command, on Friday next.

THE PATENT FOR PRINTING BIBLES, &c. QUESTION.

MR. BLACK said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Patent of the Queen's Printers for printing Bibles and Acts of Parliament has been renewed, and, if so, what are the terms on which it has been renewed; and, if the Patent has not been renewed, on what conditions are Bibles and Acts of Parliament now printed?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the Select Committee which was appointed by the House to inquire into the propriety of renewing the Patent of the Queen's Printer with regard to the printing of Bibles and Prayer Books, not having been able to complete its inquiries last Session, had recommended the appointment of a similar Committee this Session, and the temporary renewal to the Queen's Printer in the meantime of the Patent for printing Bibles and Prayer Books for a limited period. The Patent had therefore been renewed for the object stated, during Her Majesty's pleasure. With regard to the printing of Acts of Parliament and public Proclamations the Patent had not been renewed, but an arrangement had been made by which the Queen's Printer was to print them for the public at a reduced rate.

MR. BLACK: Would the right hon. Baronet have any objection to produce the Minute?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was not aware that there was any Minute, but he had no objection to produce any documents on the subject.

AFFAIRS OF ITALY—QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if it is true that Lord Cowley has been instructed to communicate to the French Government a project for the definitive settlement of the Italian question ; and, if so, whether he has any objection to communicate the details of that project to the House ?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, it will be necessary for me, in order to give satisfaction to the noble Lord, to enter into some account of what has lately taken place. At present I cannot produce the papers because negotiations are still pending which, however, may soon be in such a state that I shall be at liberty to lay them on the table. What has passed is this:—The House is aware from Her Majesty's Speech that Her Majesty was invited to take part in a Conference or Congress respecting the affairs of Italy. At a certain period when it was expected the Congress was to meet, we received intimation from the French Government that it was adjourned sine die, but that we should be informed if there was any intention of its assembling hereafter. It was said that the delay, or rather the entire postponement, of the Congress was owing to the publication of an anonymous pamphlet at Paris. Be that as it may, Her Majesty's Government felt that it was a very serious condition of affairs if, that the Italians, who had hitherto been waiting in expectation that Italian affairs would be solved by the Congress, should have no regular Government and no apparent means of terminating the condition of uncertainty in which they were placed. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, made propositions to the Governments of France and Austria, with a view to the definitive solution of the Italian question. Those proposals were contained in a despatch to Earl Cowley, dated, I think, the 14th of January. The first proposal was that, as the rivalry of France and Austria had led to great evils in Italy and great danger to Europe, those two Powers should agree not to interfere in future by force in the internal affairs of the Italian Peninsula without the consent of the five great Powers. By the second proposition it was proposed that the French troops should, at a convenient time and with all proper precautions, withdraw from Lombardy and Rome. By the third proposition it was proposed that the Governments of Europe should not interfere in the internal Government of Venetia—that no proposition should be made to qualify the internal Government of Venetia by the Emperor of Austria. To these three proposals the Government of France, with certain modifications as to the time and season for withdrawing their troops, gave their ready consent. Upon the fourth proposition they begged time to consider, and time to communicate with the Government of Austria. The fourth proposition was to the effect that the King of Sardinia should be asked not to send any troops into Central Italy until there should be, by a new election and a new vote of the States and Provinces of Central Italy, a clear and unbiassed declaration of their wishes with respect to their future destiny—that if that wish should be in favour of annexation to Sardinia, then the restriction to which it was proposed to ask the King of Sardinia to submit should be removed, and no objection made to his introducing troops into the provinces of Central Italy—meaning, of course, those provinces which have declared they will no longer be governed by their late rulers. The French Government has accordingly communicated with the Government of Austria upon that subject, but no official communication of the decision of Austria has yet been received. This very morning I received a despatch from our Ambassador at Vienna, to the effect, that Count Rechberg promised to take the Emperor of Austria's orders, but that he could not give an official answer without receiving the Emperor's instructions and commands. With respect to ourselves, the Austrian Government, on receiving the communication of the three propositions to which they were asked to consent, made objection that it was not in conformity with their views and opinions as to the rights of sovereignty to make any absolute engagements with regard to non-intervention. With regard to the fourth proposition, although they could not acknowledge the state of things which has arisen in Central Italy from an insurrection, at the same time Count Rechberg declared to Lord Augustus Loftus in Vienna, and Count Apponyi has declared to me in London, that the Austrian Government have no intention whatever to interfere in the affairs of Italy; that they are not going to send any forces beyond their own frontiers; and that they shall confine themselves strictly to the defence of their own possessions, which are declared by treaty to be part of the dominions of the Emperor of Austria. These declarations, combined with the willingness of the French Government to entertain the three first proposals, give great hope that we shall arrive, by these means, at a settlement of Italy which, although not immediately acknowledged by all the Powers of Europe, will at the same time be a pacific settlement, and prevent a renewal of war. Immediately after communicating with the Governments of France and Austria, I directed communications of the same proposals to Prussia and Russia for their information and subsequent decision. With regard to Russia, I have not received any answer whatever. The Prussian Government has not made any objection to the proposals, but delays making a definite answer until the opinions of France and Austria have been ascertained. This is exactly the substance of what has hitherto passed. The noble Lord will see that these are rather the beginning of negotiations, and I cannot at present be authorized by Her Majesty to place the papers on the table of the House.

THE ADMIRALTY.—QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of the Admiralty what steps the Board of Admiralty have taken, or are about to take, to carry out the recommendations contained in the Report of the Committee of Inquiry on the Economy of Her Majesty's Dock-yards, presided over by Admiral Smart, and in the Report of the Committee on Steam Machinery, presided over by Admiral Ramsay?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the Admiralty had under their serious consideration the Report of the two Committees to which the hon. Member referred. They had been able to carry out various recommendations, but with regard to one of the most important they had thought it right to call for the opinions of the principal officers of Somerset House, as well as the superintendents of the dockyards. The observations of those officers he hoped to be able to lay on the table the next day. The Duke of Somerset had given the greatest consideration to the recommendations of the Committees, and had drawn up a memorandum, which had been laid before the Board of Admiralty. He also hoped to lay that paper, with a board minute attached, on the table at the same time. The Committee on the dockyards recommended that there should be laid before Parliament statements of the annual cost of all ships of Her Majesty's navy. He hoped to be able to lay on the table that return, which he thought was of some interest, in a few days. But he was bound to state with candour that the return was not so perfect as he should wish it to be. It was, however, a novelty, and the details of the expenditure upon the different ships had not perhaps been kept in as satisfactory a manner as they ought to have been. When the hon. Member for Newcastle brought forward his Motion for inquiry into the shipbuilding of the Admiralty, he should be able to go more fully into the subject.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON asked, whether the references to the officers at Somerset House, and the memorandum of the Duke of Somerset, related to the Reports of both the Committees?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the observations of the officers of Somerset House referred to the Report of the Dock-yards Committee only, but the memorandum of the Duke of Somerset related principally to the Report of the Dockyard Committee, but had also reference to that of the Committee on Steam Machinery.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES COURT.

LEAVE. MOTION NEGATIVED.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he rose to move for leave to introduce a Bill to enable the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes to hold its sittings with closed doors. He had hoped that the notoriety of the evil to which he had to direct the attention of the House, and the fact that the remedy he was about to propose was identical with one which had been proposed by her Majesty's Government last year, would have rendered it unnecessary for them to enter into any discussion at that stage of the question. But, as the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. E. James) had given notice of his intention to oppose the introduction of the Bill, he (Lord J. Manners) felt it necessary to preface his Motion by a few observations, and to describe the remedy he proposed. But at the outset he might say that it was not his desire in any way to re-open the discussions which had preceded the establishment of that Court. For good or evil that institution was now the law of the land, and whatever his opinion might be, he did not propose to say a word on its effect upon public morality or domestic purity. The evil for which he was then anxious to provide a remedy was one which appeared to him to be purely accidental, and quite unnecessary as a concomitant of the Act of Parliament which established that tribunal. It would be in the recollection of the House that in the course of the debates which had preceded the passing of that measure great stress had been laid on the good which would result to the community at large from the suppression of those painful and indecent details which used occasionally to transpire in what were called crim. con. actions and petitions for divorce to the House of Lords; but he would ask the House whether any change for the better had really taken place in that respect, and whether they could now place in the hands of their children, or of other members of their families, the daily records that were published of the proceedings in the new court with any greater security that their eyes would not light upon whole columns of indecency and moral filth than they could have done before that change in the law had been effected? The reverse was the case, and the question had now come to this issue—a man must either abstain, during the sitting of the Divorce Court, from taking in the daily papers, or consent to place in the hands of his wife and children details of the most indecent and abominable nature. It was a heathen moralist of corrupted Rome that exclaimed—

Intra quæ puer est.
Maxima debetur pueris reverentia.”

And acting upon that principle, the Legislature some three years ago, at the instance of the present Lord Chancellor, passed a law which had for its object the closing of those fountains of moral pollution which were calculated to corrupt the youth of this metropolis; but it was his (Lord John Manners') deliberate conviction that during the last autumn and winter the evils resulting from the publicity of the proceedings of the Divorce Court were far more widely spread than had been those which had resulted from the indecent publications of Holywell Street. And for this reason: the man who entered that place and purchased one of those publications did so with his eyes open; but in the instance of the Divorce Court, wherever the English language was read or understood, details equally corrupt and disgusting were by a sort of unfortunate fatality spread broad-cast before the public eye. Hence had arisen the feeling in the public mind to which he asked the House to pay respectful deference. But the evil of which he complained did not end here. Last year the Attorney General directed the attention of the House to another and incidental evil attending the publicity of these transactions. He was no lawyer, but he thought, nevertheless, he should be able in a few sentences to remind the House of the importance of that particular aspect of the question to which the Attorney General had alluded. The Attorney General painted in strong, but by no means in too strong colours, the evils which would result if, by the rejection of the clause then before the House, they virtually compelled the Court to conduct all its proceedings with open doors. That learned Gentleman entreated the House to consider whether for the sake of justice itself the greatest evil would not ensue from enforcing publicity, and pointed out how a young and innocent and pure-minded woman might be compelled, by this system of enforced publicity, to come before the Court, crowded as it generally was with the most abandoned of both sexes, and before the recording pens of the representatives of the public press, to give evidence of a most painful and excruciating character. The Attorney General suggested whether it was not likely, rather than submit to so terrible an ordeal, that in many cases the innocent victim would not shrink from asking for that relief and justice to which she was by law entitled. He left it to those who presided over and who practised in that Court to say whether since the Attorney General had made that appeal the anticipations of the learned Gentleman had not been fully realized. He (Lord J. Manners) had been told that they had been so, and therefore the case he had urged primarily on the ground of public decency and domestic purity had become infinitely stronger; and he felt armed with an additional argument in favour of the measure he proposed to introduce, namely, that of simple justice to those unhappy individuals. The remedy he proposed to apply to the evils of which he complained, and to which he did not wish further to allude, was of an obvious character. It was not his intention to give a single instance of the indecency of those publications, nor to condescend to the mention of any one particular report. The facts to which he had referred were known to every Member of that House, and the evil of which he complained was patent on the surface. The remedy he proposed for this notorious evil was simply that already suggested by the able Judge who presided over the court in question, sanctioned by the highest authorities in the House of Lords, and recommended by the ablest lawyers in the Upper House—a proposition which had been urged upon the attention and consideration of that House by the learned Attorney General himself. That remedy was simply to grant to the Divorce Court the privilege of conducting its proceedings with closed doors whenever in its discretion it seemed fitting to it to do so. Such a privilege had been exercised by the Ecclesiastical Court and the House of Lords, when between them they managed the divorce business of the country. It was at present possessed by the Courts of Chancery and by the analogous courts of Scotland, France, and other countries, and according to universal testimony, it might be safely entrusted to the discretion of the eminent Judges that presided over the Divorce Court. That being the simple remedy proposed for the evil referred to, he was at a loss to see how his proposal could be so objectionable as to procure for it the unusual honour of being opposed at that stage. He might be told of the well known adage that "Publicity was the soul of justice." To that maxim he respectfully bowed. He was willing to admit its truth, which indeed was obvious. But he would meet it with another maxim, equally obvious and of equal acceptance "There is no rule without an exception." Now, he thought the exception in the present case was founded on the paramount interest of public decency and domestic morality. He was not going beyond the mark when he said that nine-tenths of the statute laws of the land were in reality exceptions to general and well-received principles. Take the case upon which such public interest was manifested at present, they were all most anxious for, and in expectation of, the perfect, speedy, and he hoped lasting, restoration to health of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in order that the right hon. Gentleman might, on Friday next, be able to explain to the House those reasons that had induced Her Majesty's Government to depart from the well-known and received maxim of political economy in the negotiation of a treaty of commerce with the Emperor of the French. If hon. Members, too, would cast their eyes upon the paper of the House for that night they would find mention made of three Bills for the enactment of provisions in direct violation of certain well-received principles of political economy. The exceptional legislation three years ago with the view of putting a stop to the indecent publications of Holywell Street was also in direct violation of a well-received principle. No doubt it was then exclaimed that "an Englishman's house was his castle." Notwithstanding the recognition of this popular maxim, however, the House departed from the rule and permitted an exception in the paramount interest of decency and public morality. Well, he simply asked the House to adopt a similar course now. Perhaps it might be said that the remedy was unnecessary, since it was already in the power of the Court to close the doors; but whatever might have been the case previously that argument could no longer be used after the introduction of the Bill of last year, which showed that the presiding Judge, the legal authorities of the House of Lords, and the law officers were of opinion that he did not possess the power of closing the doors of the court until the Legislature gave it by statute. No one, he thought, would contend that this power might not be exercised as advantageously for the public interests by the Judges of this court as it had heretofore been exercised in the Courts of Chancery; and if such a discretion were permitted, to whom could its exercise more properly be intrusted than to that distinguished man who presided over the Court of Probate and Divorce? In bringing forward this Bill he was actuated by no indirect wish either to damage or to prop up the new system of divorce by law. He scorned the motives which had been imputed to him, and he attributed no unworthy objects to others. The evil, he contended, was patent, flagrant, and increasing; the remedy was simple, obvious, and innocuous; and it came before them recommended by the heads of the law, and by the very founders and framers of that Court in which he proposed that it should be put into operation. If there were those who believed that any other remedy was capable of being applied to this admitted evil, let them propose their plan, and he would most cheerfully support it; but meanwhile, he entreated the House not to withhold its sanction from the introduction of a measure directed to so desirable an end, and recommended by so great a weight of authority. With these few observations he begged leave to move for leave to introduce the Bill of which he had given notice.

Motion made and Question proposed,—

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to enable the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes to hold its Sittings with closed doors."

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, his reason for taking the rather unusual course of resisting the introduction of the Bill was, that the matter had been fully discussed and decided in the last Session of Parliament. The Divorce Court Bill came down with a clause introduced by the Lord Chancellor, with the object of accomplishing that which was proposed by the present measure. It was supported to some extent by the Attorney General; but the feeling of the House had so strongly manifested itself against closing the doors of this court that the clause was rejected without a division. After this express decision, he believed the House would now declare its opinion that the present Bill was inexpedient and unnecessary. He imputed no motives whatever to the noble Lord; he believed that he was actuated alone by the sincere desire of suppressing what he considered indecent reports of the proceedings in that court; but he hoped to show the House in a few sentences that such a course would be highly injudicious. The noble Lord had referred to the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts and the Court of Chancery; but if ever the Court of Divorce—which as at present administered enjoyed the sanction and confidence of the public—were to adopt the same rules for the administration of its business as the old Ecclesiastical Courts to which reference had been made, it would soon fall into utter contempt and disrepute. The Lord Chancellor, it was true, equally with the Judge of the Divorce Court, had power, with the consent of counsel acting for both parties, to retire into a private room and hear the case, if he thought proper to do so; but he entertained great doubt whether the Lord Chancellor could close his court against the public, and he believed that if a case of trespass were brought by any person who had been excluded, it would be established by the constituted authorities that the Court of Chancery was a public court, and the Lord Chancellor had no right to close it. The notion that closed doors would effect the object the noble Lord had in view was quite delusive. Why, if it were known that a sort of mysterious Court was sitting at Westminster Hall, whose avenues were unapproachable to the public, and that cases were going on there which might not be reported, a prurient curiosity would at once be engendered, and they would have all sorts of erroneous reports furnished either by reporters in wigs and gowns or by attorneys or their clerks; and a morbid desire to procure them would be evidenced on the part of the public. Was the noble Lord, who had cited no instance which occurred since last Session in support of his argument, prepared to extend the principle of his Bill to the Police Courts, and other courts of criminal jurisdiction in this country? Yet a charge of perjury had arisen out of proceedings in a suit before the Divorce Court, which it became requisite to try before one of the criminal tribunals, and the details of which occupied day after day the columns of the public journals. The better course, he believed, was to repose confidence in the taste and good sense of the press, which, since the decision in August, had not abused the power of publishing cases from that court. Hon. Members who had acted as counsel in cases of this nature would bear him out in the statement, that since that period cases had occurred involving details of the most filthy or disgusting character, and yet no such details had been given to the public. These cases might be safely left to the judgment of the press, for if there existed a prurient desire on the part of the public to have these details, they would be furnished in a much more objectionable way than at present. The debates in that House were at one period forbidden to be published; and Dr. Johnson told the translator of Demosthenes that he got from the door-keepers and uniformly published imaginary debates; and that he always took care that “those dogs of Whigs” always got the worse of it. The noble Lord was of opinion that by the reports which appeared from the Divorce Court a public scandal was occasioned; but he considered that a vital principle was at stake in the matter, and that although the maxim might be trite it was still as true as when Bentham wrote it, that publicity was vital to the administration of English justice, and to the confidence which the people of England reposed in it. He should therefore conclude by moving, as an Amendment, the Previous Question.

“That that Question be now put.”

MR. ROEBUCK said, a remark had once been made by Swift, which the present Motion of the noble Lord fully verified. This was, that “the nicest persons had the nastiest ideas.” The proposition of the noble Lord seemed to have originated in the same state of feeling that possessed the American lady whose sense of modesty was so wonderfully acute as to be offended by the naked legs of her pianoforte. If the noble Lord had taken into account the end which was sought to be attained by the Divorce Court, he would, he thought, have arrived at a different conclusion. That Court had been created for a mixed object; it affected not merely private rights and obligations, but also public obligations. It not only determined whether a man should be divorced from his wife, but it went further, and declared why he should be divorced, and by that means it affected public morality. If the Court was shut up, one of these great means of operating upon the public morality would be utterly taken away. He was aware that it had been said that the English notion of morality was confined to picking a pocket and seducing another man's wife. But there were other things which he read daily in the papers by which he was much more affected. He constantly saw in the reports of the Police Courts that men were brought up for thrashing their wives, almost beating out their eyes, and nearly taking away their lives. These things went on from day to day, and disgraced the people of England in the eyes of Europe and of the world; but no one got up and said that they ought not to be made public. Another great object which had been effected by the publicity of proceedings in the Divorce Court was the dispelling of the idea that immoral practices were confined to the upper and lowest classes of society; and it had been shown that among the middle class what was particularly recognized by Englishmen as immorality as was rife as in any other, and he thought this a very great benefit; he hated shams, and he believed the morality of the middle class to be as great a sham as had ever existed. There ought, then, to be a degree of healthy hardihood in a man's character which would enable him to bear this exposure. The noble Lord had stated that it was impossible to put a newspaper into the hands of one's wife or daughter since the establishment of the Divorce Court. This statement he denied altogether; and he maintained that nothing had been more creditable than the conduct of the public press on this question. They had the most filthy details before them—aye, and from the middle class too, and they had not shocked any decent man's or woman's mind by what they had disclosed. Were they to live in a fool's paradise? Was it right that the middle class should continue to appear as models of angelic purity, when they were as earthly and immoral as any other class? No; let truth be told. The noble Lord stated that the Judges of the criminal courts had the power of shutting out women and children. Yes; but how was it done? In a criminal case, the Judge has the depositions before him, and knows what is going to be proved is of a character that women and children had better not hear. The Judge of the Divorce Court could not do this; and, as a Judge, would act only on his individual caprice, and he would ask the House whether it could expect from a court of justice the advantages it was intended to produce, if it was left to the caprice of the Judge to decide what was fit to be made public? When the name of Sir C. Cresswell was mentioned, no one was more ready than he (Mr. Roebuck) to bear testimony to his merits; but though the law would be everlasting, the Judges would change. Each Judge would act on his own opinion; one might exclude the public, the next might take a different view of the case. Then they might have a prurient Judge—there were such things—who might delight to make jokes before his Court that he would not dare to utter if the press was present. Even now, with the control of the press, he could put his finger on Judges whose jokes did no honour to an English court of justice. One great use of a court of justice was to serve as a guide to the morality of the people. The people would be shut out from one of the best schools for teaching morality, and their imaginations would picture the secret proceedings a thousand times worse than anything the public was likely to read. The Motion of the noble Lord, therefore, though made with the best possible intentions—hell was paved with them—would do the greatest possible mischief, and he should oppose it.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had argued the question as if obscene publications could do no harm to public morals. [Mr. ROEBUCK: No.] He could not now take that line of argument, the House having three years ago passed a statute prohibiting the sale of such publications. In the works prescribed by that statute there was nothing that equalled in grossness the reports of the Divorce Court that appeared in some of the newspapers. He admitted this reproach did not apply to the respectable journals; but there was a class of newspapers that derived their most attractive matter from the Divorce Court. It was stated that the Lord Chancellor and other Judges could hear cases in their private rooms with closed doors, but by a decision of Sir Cresswell Cresswell that was no longer possible in his Court. He had chosen to decide, because this House had rejected a clause giving him power to exclude reporters from his Court, that therefore it was not competent for him to exercise the power possessed by the other Judges of hearing cases in a private room. The Divorce Court, therefore, no longer possessed the power of the other Courts. The argument had been urged that it would be a grievance to the public if publicity were not given to the proceedings of these Courts; but it should be remembered that publicity was a grievance to the suitors. The most refined as well as the lowest of women might be concerned in cases of this nature, and to women of every class of society the publicity to which their cases were exposed acted, in many instances, as an absolute denial of justice. The tendency of all recent legislation had been to make justice easy to be obtained by every one, as in the creation of County Courts. If the Legislature had done so much where only money was concerned, it was the more bound to do something for the class of cases that affected public morality and decency. By the old system the evidence in such cases was given in writing, not viva voce. Notwithstanding the insinuation of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he should support the Motion of the noble Lord, trusting that the House would act in the decision of the question with a due regard to the interests of decency and purity.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Sir, the most convenient course when there is any doubt as to the provisions of a Bill is to agree to the Motion for its introduction, in order that those provisions may be afterwards explained by the hon. Member who wishes to bring the subject under the consideration of the House. In this instance, however, I am bound to say the noble Lord has treated the question as if he were debating the Bill on the second reading. He has made a speech of a somewhat controversial nature, and he has removed all doubt as to the nature of the measure which he seeks to introduce by saying that it was a repetition of the proposal made last Session. Therefore, not entertaining any doubt as to the vote which I should give on the second reading, I am prepared, though contrary to what I consider to be the most convenient practice of the House to vote in favour of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone. Now, Sir, I will proceed to discuss this question as if the question before us were the second reading of the Bill. The proposal of the noble Lord is in fact to bring in a Bill, the effect of which would be to create a privilegium with respect to the Court of Divorce. He does not propose to alter the general law of the country with regard to trials in which indecent matter, matter which is unfit for general perusal, may be given in evidence before the Court, commented upon by the counsel, or stated in his charge by the Judge to the jury. He does not propose to introduce a general measure including every civil court, every criminal court, and the preliminary proceedings before magistrates, but he proposes to establish a separate rule with reference to the Divorce Court. Well, now, Sir, my objection to this Bill rests upon its being a peculiar and discriminating measure. If the noble Lord had proposed a general measure with respect to all courts I might have been disposed at all events to go to a second reading of the Bill; but it appears to me that unless he is prepared to lay down a universal rule there is the gravest objection to the singling out of the Court of Divorce as a subject of exceptional legislation. On what ground does the noble Lord rest this exceptional—this differential measure, if I may so term it? It may, perhaps, be argued that trials in which highly indecorous and obscene matter is introduced do not come before our criminal courts. Now it must be a matter of notoriety that cases far more gross in their literal description occur in the administration of the criminal law than occur before the Court of Divorce. I do not wish to pain the House by a more minute allusion to such cases, but it is notorious they do occur. Now what is the course which the Judges pursue on such occasions? They order the women and children out of court, and that, I presume, is in accordance with the law of the country. I presume that a woman who was ordered out of court under such circumstances would have no action of trespass. But there is no attempt to drive reporters out of court under such circumstances, or to carry on the proceedings with closed doors, which is what the noble Lord proposes shall be done in the Divorce Court. The Lord Chancellor, I think, sometimes retires into a private room, and hears counsel there

the public being altogether excluded; but those cases are purely exceptional; and I believe that the exclusion takes place not because there is anything to shock public decency, but because the private interests of the parties render such an arrangement desirable. Such a power is undoubtedly exercised, but it is rarely exercised by the Lord Chancellor. Now, Sir, under these circumstances it does not appear to me that a sufficient case has been made out for subjecting the Court of Divorce to special legislation. We know that when cases similar to those now tried in the Court of Divorce came before the House of Lords and before the Ecclesiastical Courts they were reported at great length—the cases tried in the House of Lords especially, which sometimes had lengthened interrogatories introduced into them by some noble Lords, and the evidence was duly reported in the newspapers. I do not remember, however, that any Peers of Parliament ever had such a regard for public decency as to insist on the examinations taking place with closed doors, although, be it borne in mind, it would have been competent to the House of Lords, without any special legislation, to exclude strangers during the reception of the evidence on a private Bill. Nevertheless I am not aware that any of the noble Lords who have had so much experience in the administration of justice ever resorted to that contrivance for the purpose of preventing the publication of that class of cases. Under these circumstances, and not thinking it necessary for the protection of public morality to subject the Divorce Court to this special legislation, I shall vote for the Amendment. I cannot conceive that there is any reason for doubting that the ordinary law and the ordinary practice of newspapers with respect to the publication of details of this kind will afford less protection to the public interest in the case of the Divorce Court than in the case of other courts.

MR. MALINS said, he did not deny the existence of the evil for which the noble Lord (Lord J. Manners) sought to provide a remedy, but he could not on that account consent to arm the Judge of the Divorce Court with a power which he regarded as unconstitutional, and which he believed would be found to be detrimental to the public interest. The noble Lord, in dealing with the subject, had made some observations which showed that he laboured under an erroneous impression with respect to the practice of the Court of Chancery, for it was only in certain cases, such as those affecting the relations between guardian and ward, parent and child, husband and wife, and then only when no question of a dissolution of the marriage tie was involved, that the Lord Chancellor disposed of cases in private; taking that course, it should be remembered, not because of the injury which a hearing with open doors might do the public morals, but out of regard to the feelings and interests of the parties themselves and their families. In the case of the suits which came before the Divorce Court, however, the matter was entirely different, for they involved not only questions bearing upon family relations, but questions deeply affecting the public whose interest it was to know what the causes were which had led to so important a social disruption as the breaking of the marriage tie. Let him for a moment suppose that such a step could be taken without the knowledge of the public, where, then, he should like to know, would any adequate safeguard against collusion between the husband and wife desirous of a separation from one another be found? He should, moreover, wish to be informed in whom the discretion as to whether a particular case should be heard in public or with closed doors, was to be vested? Was it to be a point on which the parties to the suit might themselves decide? If so, it would often happen that the wishes of the different parties would clash, inasmuch as the offending wife or husband, as it might be, would naturally seek for that secrecy which the innocent petitioner or respondent would as naturally desire to avoid. He might, however, be told that the Judge was the person to whom was to be committed the authority to hear a cause in private or not, as he might think fit; but to the proposal to confer such a discretion upon our Judges he could only say that while they themselves would be the very last persons to wish for such a power, which was of a character much too arbitrary to be intrusted to the hands of any public functionary, however high, he believed its exercise would have the effect of removing that check upon the violation of the marriage vows which the fear of publicity now supplied. Entertaining these opinions and a strong repugnance to the principles of the Bill, he should vote for the Amendment.

MR. MACAULAY said, that from the observations which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of

stated that the Lord Chancellor and other Judges could hear cases in their private rooms with closed doors, but by a decision of Sir Cresswell Cresswell that was no longer possible in his Court. He had chosen to decide, because this House had rejected a clause giving him power to exclude reporters from his Court, that therefore it was not competent for him to exercise the power possessed by the other Judges of hearing cases in a private room. The Divorce Court, therefore, no longer possessed the power of the other Courts. The argument had been urged that it would be a grievance to the public if publicity were not given to the proceedings of these Courts; but it should be remembered that publicity was a grievance to the suitors. The most refined as well as the lowest of women might be concerned in cases of this nature, and to women of every class of society the publicity to which their cases were exposed acted, in many instances, as an absolute denial of justice. The tendency of all recent legislation had been to make justice easy to be obtained by every one, as in the creation of County Courts. If the Legislature had done so much where only money was concerned, it was the more bound to do something for the class of cases that affected public morality and decency. By the old system the evidence in such cases was given in writing, not vivâ voce. Notwithstanding the insinuation of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he should support the Motion of the noble Lord, trusting that the House would act in the decision of the question with a due regard to the interests of decency and purity.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS : Sir, the most convenient course when there is any doubt as to the provisions of a Bill is to agree to the Motion for its introduction, in order that those provisions may be afterwards explained by the hon. Member who wishes to bring the subject under the consideration of the House. In this instance, however, I am bound to say the noble Lord has treated the question as if he were debating the Bill on the second reading. He has made a speech of a somewhat controversial nature, and he has removed all doubt as to the nature of the measure which he seeks to introduce by saying that it was a repetition of the proposal made last Session. Therefore, not entertaining any doubt as to the vote which I should give on the second reading, I am prepared, though contrary to what I consider to be the most convenient practice of the House, to vote in favour of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone. Now, Sir, I will proceed to discuss this question as if the question before us were the second reading of the Bill. The proposal of the noble Lord is in fact to bring in a Bill, the effect of which would be to create a privilegium with respect to the Court of Divorce. He does not propose to alter the general law of the country with regard to trials in which indecent matter, matter which is unfit for general perusal, may be given in evidence before the Court, commented upon by the counsel, or stated in his charge by the Judge to the jury. He does not propose to introduce a general measure including every civil court, every criminal court, and the preliminary proceedings before magistrates, but he proposes to establish a separate rule with reference to the Divorce Court. Well, now, Sir, my objection to this Bill rests upon its being a peculiar and discriminating measure. If the noble Lord had proposed a general measure with respect to all courts, I might have been disposed at all events to go to a second reading of the Bill; but it appears to me that unless he is prepared to lay down a universal rule there is the gravest objection to the singling out of the Court of Divorce as a subject of exceptional legislation. On what ground does the noble Lord rest this exceptional—this differential measure, if I may so term it? It may, perhaps, be argued that trials in which highly indecorous and obscene matter is introduced do not come before our criminal courts. Now it must be a matter of notoriety that cases far more gross in their literal description occur in the administration of the criminal law than occur before the Court of Divorce. I do not wish to pain the House by a more minute allusion to such cases, but it is notorious they do occur. Now what is the course which the Judges pursue on such occasions? They order the women and children out of court, and that, I presume, is in accordance with the law of the country. I presume that a woman who was ordered out of court under such circumstances would have no action of trespass. But there is no attempt to drive reporters out of court under such circumstances, or to carry on the proceedings with closed doors, which is what the noble Lord proposes shall be done in the Divorce Court. The Lord Chancellor, I think, sometimes retires into a private room, and hears counsel there, the public being altogether excluded ; but those cases are purely exceptional; and I believe that the exclusion takes place not because there is anything to shock public decency, but because the private interests of the parties render such an arrangement desirable. Such a power is undoubtedly exercised, but it is rarely exercised by the Lord Chancellor. Now, Sir, under these circumstances it does not appear to me that a sufficient case has been made out for subjecting the Court of Divorce to special legislation. We know that when cases similar to those now tried in the Court of Divorce came before the House of Lords and before the Ecclesiastical Courts they were reported at great length—the cases tried in the House of Lords especially, which sometimes had lengthened interrogatories introduced into them by some noble Lords, and the evidence was duly reported in the newspapers. I do not remember, however, that any Peers of Parliament ever had such a regard for public decency as to insist on the examinations taking place with closed doors, although, be it borne in mind, it would have been competent to the House of Lords, without any special legislation, to exclude strangers during the reception of the evidence on a private Bill. Nevertheless I am not aware that any of the noble Lords who have had so much experience in the administration of justice ever resorted to that contrivance for the purpose of preventing the publication of that class of cases. Under these circumstances, and not thinking it necessary for the protection of public morality to subject the Divorce Court to this special legislation, I shall vote for the Amendment. I cannot conceive that there is any reason for doubting that the ordinary law and the ordinary practice of newspapers with respect to the publication of details of this kind will afford less protection to the public interest in the case of the Divorce Court than in the case of other courts.

MR. MALINS said, he did not deny the existence of the evil for which the noble Lord (Lord J. Manners) sought to provide a remedy, but he could not on that account consent to arm the Judge of the Divorce Court with a power which he regarded as unconstitutional, and which he believed would be found to be detrimental to the public interest. The noble Lord, in dealing with the subject, had made some observations which showed that he laboured under an erroneous impression with respect to the practice of the Court of Chancery, for it was only in certain cases, such as those affecting the relations between guardian and ward, parent and child, husband and wife, and then only when no question of a dissolution of the marriage tie was involved, that the Lord Chancellor disposed of cases in private; taking that course, it should be remembered, not because of the injury which a hearing with open doors might do the public morals, but out of regard to the feelings and interests of the parties themselves and their families. In the case of the suits which came before the Divorce Court, however, the matter was entirely different, for they involved not only questions bearing upon family relations, but questions deeply affecting the public whose interest it was to know what the causes were which had led to so important a social disruption as the breaking of the marriage tie. Let him for a moment suppose that such a step could be taken without the knowledge of the public, where, then, he should like to know, would any adequate safeguard against collusion between the husband and wife desirous of a separation from one another be found? He should, moreover, wish to be informed in whom the discretion as to whether a particular case should be heard in public or with closed doors, was to be vested? Was it to be a point on which the parties to the suit might themselves decide? If so, it would often happen that the wishes of the different parties would clash, inasmuch as the offending wife or husband, as it might be, would naturally seek for that secrecy which the innocent petitioner or respondent would as naturally desire to avoid. He might, however, be told that the Judge was the person to whom was to be committed the authority to hear a cause in private or not, as he might think fit; but to the proposal to confer such a discretion upon our Judges he could only say that while they themselves would be the very last persons to wish for such a power, which was of a character much too arbitrary to be intrusted to the hands of any public functionary, however high, he believed its exercise would have the effect of removing that check upon the violation of the marriage vows which the fear of publicity now supplied. Entertaining these opinions and a strong repugnance to the principles of the Bill, he should vote for the Amendment.

MR. MACAULAY said, that from the observations which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of Bill presented, and read 1°. To be read 2° on Tuesday, 6th March, and to be printed.

CHARITABLE USES.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. HADFIELD said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law relative to the conveyance of land for charitable uses. This Bill was in substance approved of by the highest authorities and by hon. Members on both sides of the House. It was not for the purpose of enabling persons to devise property by will in weak moments and in their dying hours, but simply to enable conveyances to be taken for various charitable purposes, schools, and places of worship. There were at least 30,000 of such institutions in the country, all of which were affected by the mortmain laws, and some of which in consequence existed upon uncertain title.

Leave given;

"Bill to amend the Law relating to the Conveyance of Land for Charitable Uses, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HADFIELD and Mr. MALINS."

Bill presented, and read 1°. To be read 2° on Wednesday, 15th February, and to be printed.

MARRIAGES (ENGLAND AND IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. MELLOR moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Acts relating to marriages in England and Ireland, and extending certain provisions thereof to persons professing with the Society of Friends, called Quakers. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the object of the Bill was to extend privileges hitherto enjoyed by members of the Society of Friends to persons holding the same views and desirous of being married according to their usage. When the Bill was printed and laid upon the table it would, he thought, be found to be one to which no hon. Member could have any objection.

Leave given;

"Bill to amend the Acts relating to Marriages in England and Ireland, and extending certain provisions thereof to Persons professing with the Society of Friends called Quakers, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MELLOR and Mr. BRIGHT."

Bill presented, and read 1°. To be read 2° on Monday next, and to be printed.

RETURN MOVED FOR.

MR. HADFIELD said, that not being satisfied with a reply to a question addressed by him to the Home Secretary a night or two since, he rose to move for a return showing the names of the Commissioners, Secretary, and of all other Persons employed on the Jersey Commission, and in what capacity they are employed; of the number of days on which the Commissioners met, distinguishing those days on which they met in Jersey, from those on which they met in London; of the entire expense of the Commission in detail up to the present time.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Commission was issued while the Administration of the Earl of Derby was in power, and Her Majesty's present advisers had no share in recommending its appointment. He would take it for granted that, as it was issued in consequence of an address from the House, it was issued with sufficient reason; but he submitted that it was not usual to impute dereliction of duty or unnecessary delay, without some proof, or to cast the censure which this return seemed to apply to the Commissioners. When the Miscellaneous Estimates were presented there would be a complete account of the expenses, and that would be the proper time to object to them. He did not see that any advantage would be gained by this return; and therefore, if it were pressed to a division, he should feel it his duty to vote against it.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the Secretary of State appeared to draw a distinction between the appointment of Commissions by the late and by the present Governments; but it should be remembered that all such appointments were really the acts of the House. It was most important that the House should know what the Commission had done, and he was very much surprised at the opposition offered by the right hon. Baronet.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE.

MR. LAING said, that in the absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he wished to move the appointment of the Select Committee on Packet and Telegraphic Contracts. It was his belief that no opposition would be made to the Motion.

MR. SPOONER said, he must object to the appointment of the Committee, in the absence of the hon. Member for Berkshire (Captain Vernon), who had postponed his Motion on this subject, on the understanding that this Motion also would be postponed.

MR. LAING explained, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman's notice related to a substantive Motion; it was not an Amendment; and the hon. and gallant Gentleman had not himself hinted to the Government the slightest desire to have the nomination of the Committee postponed.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he also must deny that there was any such understanding. The two Motions had no connection with each other. The hon. and gallant Gentleman's Motion referred to the proceedings of the Committee of last year, and this was for the re-appointment of another Committee this Session on the same subject.

The appointment of the Committee was then agreed to, and the following Members nominated to serve on it;—SIR FRANCIS BARING, SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, MR. HENRY HERBERT, MR. CORRY, MR. SCHOLEFIELD, SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY, MR. DUNLOP, CAPTAIN LEICESTER VERNON, MR. BAXTER, CAPTAIN GLADSTONE, MR. HUBBARD, MR. ROBERT CRAWFORD, MR. HOPE, MR. LAING, MR. BAZLEY, SIR EDWARD GROGAN, MR. HOWES, MR. EDWARD ELLICE, and Colonel GREVILLE.

ABOLITION OF CHURCH RATES BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he rose to move the second reading of the Church Rates Abolition Bill. In dealing with this subject, he thought every hon. Member, whether on one side of the House or the other, ought to show great moderation, and remember that they were considering a religious question of vital importance to earnest men, and one closely connected, it was alleged, with the interests of the poor. He felt that he could not on this occasion dismiss a subject of such intricacy and difficulty with a few cursory remarks, but was bound to advert in detail to the arguments which ought to be considered before they came to a conclusion upon it. The weight of authority, he believed, was decidedly in favour of a settlement of this question. It was now more than twenty years since Sir Robert Peel declared that not another year, not six months, should be allowed to pass without a settlement; and about the same period the noble Lord at the head of the late Government (the Earl of Derby) admitted that in church rates Dissenters had a serious and substantial grievance. Then there was the opinion of the Royal Commission which in 1849 reported that as the law stood it was "vague, defective, and unjust," and that it placed the greatest difficulty in the way of adopting a "sound parochial system;" and the opinion of Dr. Lushington, who asserted that church rates had "created" more "feuds" than any other "subject" he had known. He might also claim the authority of the whole House as in favour of a settlement, seeing that it had in two Parliaments pronounced in favour of the abolition of church rates. Even the party who opposed his measure expressed a decided opinion that the question must be dealt with, and the late Government actually brought in a Bill which purported to give exemption to Dissenters. The principle, therefore, that the present state of things required alteration had been generally admitted; and, whatever certain archdeacons might think, something must be done to allay the irritation which prevailed. It was not a matter which could be left to right itself. Since last Session an ex-

Judge (Sir John Coleridge), in speaking upon this subject, had thought it consistent with his knowledge of the law and facts of the case to assert that the present law in regard to church rates provided a fixed, legal and permanent fund for the sustentation of churches, which ought not to be lightly surrendered for something which was precarious. He put it to the House whether that could be called a fair statement of the condition of church rates, which had been pronounced "vague, defective, and unjust" by a Commission, among the members of which were Bishops, Peers, and Ministers of the Crown? A great deal had been said by the supporters of the existing system about church rates being the inheritance of the poor; but he thought, if hon. Members would consider what benefit the poor really derived from that fund, in how many cases not a third of the church was set apart for the poor as it ought to be, in the case especially of certain district churches under Act of Parliament (as was shown by Archdeacon Rushton's evidence before the Lords' Committee on means of Religious Instruction), and how great a deficiency of church accommodation existed in Liverpool, Bradford, and numerous other large towns, (space being required for 614,000 persons in London alone) and this, in spite of large pecuniary resources which Her Majesty's Commissioners assert to exist, they would be convinced that a more unfortunate, ill-advised, and indiscreet observation could not be made on that side of the question. A noble Lord in "another place" had spoken of the intimate association of the interests of the poor with the maintenance of church rates. Yet that noble Lord was a member of the Government that suggested and adopted the total abolition of the assessment which in Ireland was the equivalent of church rates in England, and formed the fixed and permanent fund for the sustentation of churches in that country. The noble Lord was a large landowner in Ireland, but he never heard him complain at that time about depriving the poor of Ireland of their inheritance. It was no doubt very true that at the time when a fourth of the tithe in Ireland was given up in 1833 and vestry cess abolished, the other three-fourths of tithe were not worth two years' purchase; but the fact must not be overlooked that the fourth went into the pockets of Irish landlords, and thus saved the remainder. What he asked was that the same thing should be done in England; and was he (considering how the Church property in England has been managed and the people unsupplied with accommodation while funds were available) to be met with arguments about the inheritance of the poor? He suspected that hon. Gentlemen would by no means like on the present occasion to press such an argument to its full consequences. A noble Lord (Lord St. Leonards) who had been Chancellor in Ireland, had also recently made a statement of his opinion, which he (Sir J. Trelawny) thought it would be right to read to the House. The noble Lord contended that "no man held any species of property, the enjoyment of which was more sacredly guarded by the law than the obligation to pay church rates. By the law of England church rates were a charge on land." The opinion, however, of almost every other legal authority was that church rates were not a charge upon land at all, but upon occupiers in regard to land. (Opposition cheers.) Hon. Gentlemen need not cheer too soon. The very phrase in respect of land showed the injustice of the case, for why should church rates not be a charge on persons in respect of other property. In some cases customs exist to rate personally—in Boston to rate ships. And before the Court of Delegates—when it was observed that Rundell and Brydge might as well be rated—the answer was "and so you may," and Dr. Lushington seemed to think that a very difficult question might thus be raised. As a proof that it is the person and not the property which is liable, it is only necessary to cite the decision where a chancel was in disrepair (the chancel being repaired by owners of glebe), that you may proceed against the person but not the property. The land was taken merely as a test of the ability to pay the charge. In early times there was practically no other property but land. If there had been, to all intents and purposes it would have been liable. It was a mere accident that land only paid, and every other Judge but those he had quoted was of opinion that the church rate was not a charge upon land at all. The difference between tithe and church rate was very great. In the case of tithe there was a remedy against the property. They could levy a distress, or actually seize the land for non-payment of tithe; but in the case of church rate, the only proceeding to enforce it (except in cases of small sums under Acts of Parliament) was against the person by means of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and that proceeding was almost sure to fail. Dr. Lushington said it was quite clear that these remedies, in the long run, would be very likely to fail, because the processes had been nearly obsolete for the last 400 years, and no one would think in these days of carrying them out in all their rigour, although they might have been tolerated at a period when the whole people belonged to one denomination. Among other reasons why Parliament ought to deal with this question at once was, the difficulty with regard to some churches, the congregations of which were not satisfied with the practices of their clergy. He had no wish to introduce a discussion as to who was right and who was wrong, or to defend those who had taken a violent course. On the contrary, he thought people who created disturbances in a church were deserving the greatest reprobation. At the same time, they could not blink the fact that objections were made to the practices of some of the clergy, and therefore it was their duty to strengthen, if they could, the hands of the laity, rather than deliver them over to the clergy, to maintain services with which they could not agree. As there was no effective synodical action, it was a fair question whether some control over those who were appointed to the livings should not be given; and in that view he was borne out by what fell from the Bishop of London. A witness was asked by the House of Lords Committee whether or not a clergyman, in the event of the voluntary principle being adopted, would not depend on his own popularity? The answer was that he would. The Bishop of London then asked, would not that have a certain influence over the patron in not nominating persons who might not give satisfaction to the congregation? It appeared to him a very pertinent question, and supported his argument that the laity should have some control over the practices of the clergy. If hon. Gentlemen agreed in that proposition, they ought to vote for the second reading of this Bill. He had not dealt with the theoretical question, whether parishes were not bound to repair their churches. He had simply proposed the abolition of church rates [Cheers]. Hon. Gentlemen might cheer, but let them consider whether the moral duty would not be more likely to be discharged if the theoretical obligation remained, however imperfect and defective in practice. The landowners could still give the sum which they believed they gained by the abolition of church rates. All he proposed to take away was the power to enforce church rates. Under the present law, if people chose to exert their power, church rates were practically extinct. The use of technical objections to items might be used to the extent of making the forms of process illusory. Among the many advantages of his measure was the relief it would give to magistrates, who had, especially in the recent Market Harborough case, where they tried to make the law, paid heavy compensation after appeal to the Queen's Bench. It was only necessary for a person, when summoned, to say, "I dispute the validity of this rate," and the magistrates were bound, on Dr. Lushington's authority, to dismiss the case. Those few words put an end completely to the proceedings, and obliged the parties who wished to enforce the rates to have recourse to the obsolete machinery of the Ecclesiastical Court. There were 500 summonses recently issued in the City for non-payment of church rates. The objection was taken, and the whole were dismissed. Another reason why the question ought to be settled was the injustice of rating small occupiers who, since the passing of the Small Tenements Act, had lost by a recent decision their votes. So here there was a new form of taxation without representation. The only franchise is that settled by the 58 Geo. III. which is a poor rate one, and by the Small Tenements Act the landlord votes instead of the occupier. The recent disturbance in Edinburgh, though not about church rates, showed that if church rates were enforced by proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Courts, and two years' imprisonment inflicted, as it might be, in extreme cases, on signification for contempt to the Court of Chancery in respect of sums over a certain amount, there would be great excitement, resistance to the law, and breach of the peace. The decision of the House of Lords that there must be a majority to make a church rate, had entirely altered the character of the rate, and it could no longer be contended that there was an absolute liability. As the knowledge of the exact state of the law became more widely diffused, all sorts of difficulties and technicalities would be taken advantage of. Neither the owners of property which was unoccupied, nor executors, were liable to church rates, on the principle that he only is liable who gets the benefit; and yet it was often coolly assumed by his opponents that the liability was absolute. He wished the House to consider the facts of the case. He found, by a return, that the whole amount of church rates was £263,709 14s. 9d.

MR. WALPOLE: That return applies only to 10,000 parishes.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he had added the original amount returned to that which appeared by the supplemental paper, and, with the income from voluntary contributions and endowments, the total was about £600,000. But he was speaking of the smaller sum of £263,709 14s. 9d. produced by church rates. A sum of no less than £318,000 had been borrowed on the security of the rates, the interest on which, amounting, he presumed, to some £15,000, was the first deduction from the fund, since his Bill would leave the interest of debts incurred untouched, and the £263,000 could be still further greatly diminished by excluding all illegal items. He attributed a great deal of the agitation on this subject to the presence of these illegal items. In a rate at Putney he found £10 for two French cambric surplices, and various other charges; for a case and roller for the parish map; for repairs to the fire-engine; for visitation fees, care of engine, dinner, carriage hire, printing, thirteen persons from 10s. to 5s. each for a procession; for payments to ringers; for a dinner to the charity children; for bows, rosettes, and white rods, and for a band, flags, and a carriage for the day. These sort of charges had led to a gradual diminution in the amount produced by the rate. Some years ago it had been shown by a return of Sir George Grey's, that the amount reached £314,000; but many persons being aware of the illegal purposes to which it was devoted, had withdrawn their contributions, and he (Sir John Trelawny) considered that it was thus the amount had been diminished by £50,000—which reduction would go further still as the mode of raising valid objections came to be better understood. He next came to consider the amount which was contributed by Dissenters themselves. In spite of the talk about the inheritance of the poor and the liability of landlords, hon. Gentlemen opposite were prepared to give up the charge on Dissenters, but they demanded a declaration from them that they were Dissenters. In doctrine there was a wonderful agreement between Dissenters and Churchmen. They differed more on points of discipline; and when a clergyman, as sometimes happened, came to a parish with views very much in accordance with the views of Dissenters, Dissenters frequently attended his church. How much better, then, would it be for them to say frankly, "We do not want your money, and we do not want any declaration which may prevent your attending the church if you like." He would offer to the House the following statistics on the subject. The whole amount of population of the country for whom religious services were required to be provided was 58 per cent, out of which the number attending the Church of England occupied about 29½ per cent, and the Dissenters 27½ per cent. Would it not be wiser, considering the small differences of doctrine which existed between the great mass of the Dissenters and the Church of England, to prevent men from absolutely recording their secession from the Church by a distinct form? By the last Census returns it appeared that on a given Sunday the Church afforded accommodation to 5,317,915 persons; the Independents to 1,067,750 persons; the Wesleyans to 2,194,298 persons; the Baptists to 752,243 persons; and there was a large body—5,288,294 persons—who did not go to any place of worship on that day. If those who attended Dissenting places of worship were exempted, would not the 5,288,294 persons complain of the unfairness in leaving them liable? The proposal of the late Home Secretary, that those who wished to be exempt need only say they objected to pay, was far more reasonable and tolerant than to require a declaration that they were Dissenters before they should be exempted. Indeed, he thought the latter proposition worse than the present state of the law, and he knew that many clergymen were opposed to any such broad line of distinction being drawn between Churchmen and Dissenters. Presuming that Dissenters were exempted (for which the Opposition was prepared), this would get rid of about half the church rate, and a further amount might be given up in the interest of Churchmen, who already had a serious complaint against paying double and triple rates, as they did sometimes where more than one church was supported in the same parish. In the Report of the Committee on subdivision of parishes in 1849 it was stated that one of the great hardships complained of was the double rate which some owners had to pay when their property was situate in different parishes. If this double rate were got rid of, a further sum would have to be deducted from the whole amount still contended for, namely, £263,709 14s. 9d. Then there was the money to be taken into consideration which the Church lost by the excitement and ill-will caused by church-rate contests. In the town which he represented there had been great excitement on the subject somewhere about twenty-five years ago, and the Dissenters at last got rid of the church rate. Since that time the Dissenters had contributed largely to the restoration and decoration of the parish church, so that it was now one of the finest ecclesiastical edifices in that part of the country. At least £2,000 was spent on it—one Dissenter having given £25. In Leeds, too, according to the evidence of Mr. Baines before the Committee of 1857, there had formerly been great excitement on the subject; but when Dr. Hook went there he pursued a different plan, and he managed in a very short time to raise somewhere about £100,000. The parish church alone cost £30,000. Numerous new churches and school-rooms soon arose. In the Lords' Report, the Rev. Cole Miller states, that he attributed much of the good feeling between Churchmen and Dissenters to the circumstance of this question being in abeyance in Birmingham, where, on the other hand, a church rate would set "the town in a flame." More money would undoubtedly be got by trusting to voluntary contributions than by persevering with the compulsory rate, and that being so he put it to hon. Gentlemen opposite whether it would not be better to accept his plan than to seek about for a compromise which would satisfy no one. There was no doubt that there were plenty of funds belonging to the Church applicable to the purposes of this rate. Not very long ago (in 1850) a Commission, consisting of the Arch-Bishop of York, the Bishop of London, the Earl of Harrowby, Lord Ashley, and other very eminent individuals belonging to the Church, had suggested that in order to raise funds for church purposes a certain number of the 777 livings in the gift of the Lord Chancellor should be sold, which they calculated would fetch £1,000,000, and this added to another £1,000,000, which they expected would be forthcoming from voluntary contributions, would make a fund of £2,000,000, which it was calculated would at £3,500 each enable the country to have 600 new churches, for the endowment of which also money might, it was added, be expected from the improved management of episcopal and capitular estates. The livings of small income on this plan were to be augmented to £200 each, by persons allowed to become their patrons. He saw no reason why a fund should not be raised in some such way as this to supply the place of church rates, if the supporters of the Establishment were still unwilling to trust to the voluntary principle. According to Blackstone, one fourth of the tithe had originally been applicable to the repair of the fabric of parish churches; but this charge had been gradually shuffled off, when the tithes got into the hands of the monasteries, upon the shoulders of the congregation. Besides the money which might be got from a better management of episcopal and capitular estates, it had been shown very clearly before a Committee of the House of Lords on Religious Instruction that in a few years £7,000 a year would become available from the falling in of a lease belonging to one of the prebendary stalls of St. Paul's, and in a few years more seven or eight times as much. There being, therefore, plenty of funds belonging to the Church applicable to this purpose, hon. Gentlemen opposite had no excuse for asking Dissenters to pay church rates, and after showing the abatements which might be made from the total now paid of £263,709 14s. 9d., he asked if the rest was worth further contention? The church-rate agitation had done a great deal of good to the Church. Twenty-five years ago, in consequence of the opposition then raised to the Church Establishment, and particularly to this rate, a Committee was appointed to consider the subject of Church leases and to ascertain whether larger funds might not be obtained from a better management of them. This was shown beyond a doubt, and not less than £82,000 a year (on the authority of the Lords of the Committee on Means of Religious Instruction) had since been derived from that source, for which the Church was entirely indebted to the agitation of the Dissenters. He hoped by consenting to the passing of this Bill, hon. Gentlemen opposite would at last put an end to this casual discordance between persons whose doctrinal differences were so slight that it was difficult to define them. If this wise and politic course were pursued, the Dissenters would forget the unkindness with which they had been treated in former times, they would attribute it to the errors of Statesmen of the time, and would give credit to the present generation of Churchmen for their generosity and good nature now. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

SIR CHARLES DOUGLAS said, he had acceded to the request which had been made to him to second the Motion of the hon. Baronet because he was one of the few remaining members of that House who served on the Church-rate Committee in 1851, and the only one who had not expressed his opinion otherwise than by his vote last year. He would not go into the evidence, but merely say that when appointed to serve on that Committee he was perfectly free from any foregone conclusion as to what its report should be; but the evidence brought his mind to the decided conviction, that it was impossible to settle the question except on the voluntary principle. What had been done on the subject in Parliament since 1834? In that year Lord Althorp proposed to abolish church rates, and provide for their object by a charge of £250,000 on the Land Tax. He then said there was a mode of settling the question by abolishing church rates and relying on voluntary contributions; but that, in his opinion, would not be sufficient for their purpose. There was another plan—namely, to continue church rates and exempt Dissenters from their payment; but that, he (Lord Althorp) thought, would be unjust. Lord Althorp, in whom the liberal party most confided, thought the voluntary system insufficient, and exemption of Dissenters by law unjust. On this, like other questions, Gentlemen opposite had resisted the mildest measures at first, and at last, when too late, came repentance—for now it was evident that they admitted of compromise, and every plan they had to propose involved that which, in 1834, Lord Althorp thought insufficient and unjust. Since 1834 many attempts to settle the question by a compromise had been made,—by Mr. Spring Rice (when Chancellor of the Exchequer) in 1837, afterwards by Mr. Divett, Sir J. Easthope, Sir W. Clay, Mr. Walpole, Sir G. Grey, and others; but all had been rejected by that House. He begged to call attention to the more important divisions that had taken place. In 1840 a Bill “to relieve Dissenters” was rejected by a majority of 55. In 1842 “leave to introduce a Bill to abolish Church Rates and provide for the maintenance of Churches and Chapels”

Sir John Trelawny

was refused by a majority of 82. In 1849 Mr. Page Wood (now Vice-Chancellor) proposed to “discharge Dissenters from payment of Church Rates,” which was rejected by 163; and a proposition of Mr. Trelawny, “that measures be taken to abolish Church Rates,” was refused by 35. Then, in 1851, the Committee was appointed, to which he (Sir C. Douglas) had adverted. In 1853 Sir W. Clay’s Bill “to abolish Church Rates and make provision in lieu thereof” was rejected by 48. In 1854 leave to introduce that Bill was given by 79, but on the second reading it was lost by 28. In 1856, for the first time, the second reading was carried by 43; in 1858, by 54; and that Bill passed that House by a majority of 69. In 1859 Mr. Walpole’s compromise was refused by 83, and the second reading of Sir J. Trelawny’s Bill “to abolish Church Rates” was carried by 74. Such was a rapid review of the question from 1834 to 1859. Mark the changes. Those who opposed all change in 1834 would now go beyond what Lord Althorp, the friend of Dissenters, then thought unjust; and those who then would have made other provision for the object of church rates, now admitted that the voluntary principle alone could settle the question. Observe the change of opinion in favour of abolition by the leading men in that House. Lord Palmerston, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Estcourt, Lord John Russell, Sir J. Graham, Sir G. Grey, and others, by the reasons they had given, had vindicated their convictions, all in the same direction, proving the time was at hand when the question must be settled. He (Sir C. Douglas) was of opinion it could only be settled on the voluntary principle. He was ready to acknowledge the difficulties with which Gentlemen opposite were, some of them, ready to deal as a matter of compromise. The best plan hitherto put forth, to the essence of which he (Sir Charles) would not object, for it was founded on the voluntary principle, was that given in the evidence of his right hon. Friend the late Secretary of State (Mr. S. Estcourt) before the Lords’ Committee. He would, that he might not misrepresent him, read in his own words the substance of his plan. His right hon. friend, whose name for twenty-five years was in every division in favour of church rates and against abolition or change, had declared in his examination before the Lords last summer that this question must be dealt with, for it had become one of "religious toleration or religious persecution." In that opinion he (Sir Charles) fully agreed. His right hon. Friend's plan was one with the details of which he could not agree but in so far as it adopted the voluntary principle; and he hoped, as Lord Derby must have great confidence in his right hon. Friend, he (Mr. S. Estcourt) would favour the House with his more matured views. This was the plan as sketched in his evidence:—

"I should propose, in the first place, to abolish church rates on their present footing; that, I think, is indispensable for political reasons. Then I should propose that a fund should be raised in every parish yearly, to be called a church repair fund, in the following manner:—That the churchwardens should make an estimate upon entering into office of the expenses which they think they will have to defray during their year of office for the following items, as to which I am not sure that my enumeration may not be improved; but still, practically, in the Act of Parliament I would give the exact purposes and the whole of the purposes to which church rates can be applied. I have put down, first, repair of the fabric; secondly, enclosure of the churchyard; thirdly, keeping the church and the yard clean; fourthly, a provision for services; and, fifthly, fees lawfully payable. Then I should propose that the churchwardens should affix to the door of the church a statement of the kind of expenses which they think they will have to incur during their year of office, and the amount; and by the Act I would forbid the raising of a rate in any year exceeding a certain sum. Then, having put that notice upon the church door, I would require the churchwardens to leave at the house of every ratepayer a paper, stating that such a sum would be required, in their opinion, and stating how much they consider that it would be in the pound. I would require them to have two columns upon that paper, one column for assent and the other for dissent. I would require them to collect these papers after a limited time, say one month, and all parties who dissented I should conceive to have thereby exempted themselves from the payment of the rate, whatever it might be. Those parties who signified assent would be the only parties who should have a place at the meeting where the church repair was to be considered."

When a similar Bill to the present was sent to the House of Lords last year, the noble Earl heading the Opposition said the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) who moved the second reading had undertaken a "hopeless task," but he (Sir C. Douglas) trusted that House would take care that no question sent to the other by a large majority should ever be hopeless. Be the majority this year greater or less, he advised the House to pass the Bill with a determination to persevere in the matter till the question was at rest. He was glad to see in the speech of the noble Earl, than whom no one knew better how to adapt his speech to his audience, indications that even he would be too happy to see the question settled by a compromise. The opponents of the Bill had made great efforts, by a fresh movement on the question, and brought up a great number of petitions in favour of church rates; but he (Sir C. Douglas) begged to observe, without alluding to the fact as to the facility with which petitions could be "got up" by either party, that they were as nothing when compared to those in favour of abolition. It should be proved by the Report of the Committee on Public Petitions that, if those in opposition to the Bill were tested by the number of signatures, he was correct; it would be found that the average number of names to each petition was twenty-nine; while on the other hand, he must remind the House that petitions in favour of the principle of this Bill had, ever since he sat in the House, twenty-three years ago, been pouring in annually, containing the signatures of hundreds of thousands. To show what was the real opinion of the majority of the country on the matter, he could quote no better instance than that which had once before been cited by the Foreign Secretary—that at the last election for the West Riding of Yorkshire, a right hon. gentleman (Mr. S. Wortley), formerly a member of that House, whose name had always been found in the divisions against the Bill, had been compelled to admit on the hustings that he should be prepared to vote for the abolition of church rates. And to that he might add similar declarations from nearly every candidate before popular, or independent constituencies. Though he did not agree with the grounds which had been urged in support of inquiry in "another place," he was glad that the Committee had been appointed by the House of Lords to investigate the matter; for the evidence, which he had read most carefully, all tended to support the view which he was advocating. He hoped he had consulted the convenience of the House by not entering into details on a question which had been so fully discussed and to which, after the speech of his hon. Friend, little could be added. He trusted that the Bill would receive the dispassionate consideration of the House, and that the tone and temper so creditable to the hon. Baronet who had introduced the subject would be adhered to throughout the debate. He was very glad, in one sense, that the matter had been taken up by his noble Friend, the Member for Huntingdonshire, who, in his opening speech last Session, gave indication of the talent and ability which he would bring to the consideration of any subject; and, at the same time, he felt sorry that he should be about to renew an opposition which it was impossible could be ultimately successful, and with regard to which he had manifested his unwillingness to accept a compromise. He had only further to say, he most cordially seconded the Motion of the hon. Baronet.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said: The Question has been so frequently debated and all which could be said on both sides has been already heard so often, that I shall to-day not ask the House to give me their attention for many minutes. All those arguments which have long since become trite and worn out need not again be repeated. I shall therefore decline to follow in the course which the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock (Sir J. Trevellyn) has marked out. He has employed arguments which the House must almost know by heart, as well as the answers which have so often refuted the same arguments which he now recalls. He has drawn bills on a bank which was completely broken last August; and therefore he cannot blame me for not answering them. He has spent nearly a quarter of an hour in considering whether church rates are or are not a charge upon land, a point with reference to which I remember to have read page after page last year in Hansard. The hon. Baronet likewise referred to the fact that payments from these rates had sometimes been made to persons for killing sparrows. Had he consulted the same authority he would have found that every parish had a right to rate itself for any object which it might consider beneficial to its interests. Doubtless the hon. Member for Shrewsbury will not attach any weight to such an argument against church rates, when he is introducing a Bill to enable parishes to do this very thing which the hon. Baronet is finding fault with. But I am desirous of laying before the House the evidence which was adduced last Session on the subject of church rates and published in August; and more particularly do I wish to do this, because I find that very few hon. Members are as yet acquainted with it. But it contains facts of the highest importance. The evidence will speak for itself. And it would be seen from it that this question has entered on an entirely new phase, and presented itself under quite a novel aspect. The hon. Member for Tavistock does not appear to be aware of this; he seems to have looked at this evidence from the old point of view; for he has told the House that they were dealing with a religious question. I hope to show that it is by no means a religious, but merely a political question. The hon. Member represented a great authority in the Upper House (the Earl of Derby) as having said at one time that the payment of church rates was a great grievance to Dissenters. So Lord Derby and every one else doubtless thought as long as they were under that erroneous impression which has now been removed. For the most direct evidence would be found in this book that Dissenters do not consider it a grievance; but merely wish to enforce a theory of government. He has likewise said that this is not a question affecting the poor; but even Mr. Morley, one of the chief agitators for the abolition of these rates, admitted that seats are not provided for the poor in Dissenting chapels; and Dr. Foster, the Chairman of the Liberation Committee, said that in those chapels the occupiers of seats are compelled to pay for them. Another witness stated that of the different sects the Established Church alone maintained a missionary character. Dissenting ministers visited those who attended their places of worship and who rented their seats, but the ministers of the Church of England, not content with visiting those who were attendants at church, went among the irreligious poor, of whom there were an enormous number in England, and laboured to bring the Gospel to their hearths and homes. That this is a question affecting the poor is still more strongly shown by the fact, proved over and over again in the Report, that Dissenting chapels spring up, not in humble, but in rich localities; and instances have occurred—as at Liverpool, where, when the neighbourhood became poor, the Dissenting chapels were shut up and sold. A clergyman in Nottingham bought two or three of them for the purposes of his schools. The hon. Baronet referred to the agitation which had taken place at Edinburgh respecting the annuity tax, and, possibly to strike terror into the House, he insinuated that some such excitement would overspread the land if church rates were not speedily abolished. But if he had read the evidence of Mr. Morley, Dr. Foster, and all the witnesses on that side, he would have seen that it is their intention, when the Church-rates Abolition Bill has passed, to continue their agitation as strenuously as ever. Did the House ever know an agitation which grew milder from victory, or which lessened its exertions when stimulated by success? And the Gentlemen to whom I refer have admitted that their views go much further than the mere abolition of church rates. The hon. Baronet has compared the relative number of Dissenters and Churchmen; but from whence he procured his figures I am unable to divine. [Sir JOHN TRELAWNY: From the Census returns.] Well, I have, fortunately, happened to bring with me some which I procured from a later document. Besides, the hon. Baronet unwittingly committed himself to a fallacy in comparing the number of Dissenters with Churchmen; for more than half the Dissenters were in favour of church rates. The fairer way is to compare the number of the opponents of that rate with the number of those who are favourable to its continuance. There are six sects of Baptists, numbering $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the general population, the Independents numbering $7\frac{1}{4}$ per cent, and the Jews, Mormons, and other sects, amounting to $6\frac{3}{4}$ per cent additional, raising the total proportion of those who are opposed to church rates to $16\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. Those who are not opposed to church rates are—Roman Catholics $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and seven sects of Wesleyans numbering 13 per cent, making in all a similar proportion of $16\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. The church-going members of the Church of England are 42 per cent, and the irreligious poor, whom, likewise, I feel myself entitled to count, are in the ratio of 25 per cent. [Laughter and Opposition cheers.] Yes, these are the poor who are never taught by the Dissenters, and never visited by Dissenters, but are left to the Church of England, whose ministers do visit and read to them, and send Bible-readers among them, and strive to bring the Gospel home to them, both in season and out of season. This calculation then shows a balance of 67 per cent in favour of the maintenance of church rates. The hon. Baronet has alluded to his own borough, where, though every man might be king in his own castle, I greatly fear the hon. Gentleman is not quite supreme. If, as was alleged, the inhabitants were unanimous in their opposition to church rates, how came it that a petition from Tavistock against the abolition of church rates had been laid on the table the previous day, which was not presented by the hon. Baronet himself? The hon. Baronet the Member for Banbury (Sir C. Douglas) had correctly quoted the evidence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt), but had scarcely laid the emphasis on the right word; the quotation runs thus: "whether it be true, or only assumed, at all events the objection which is stated has assumed a question of religious toleration." Moreover in counting up the relative numbers in the divisions on this subject, he has prudently omitted all mention of last year's division, in which there was no increase of the majority previously obtained, and which I hope the division on this day will still further reduce. This House, as the hon. Baronet has said, has, it is true, pronounced in favour of abolition; but then they have done so under a wrong impression. The House was formerly led away by the belief that this was a question of conscience, and by the desire to show consideration to honest objections of this nature; but now, on the contrary, we learn from the evidence of nearly all the witnesses examined last Session that the conscientious objections of Dissenters have nothing to do with the matter, that very few Dissenters have conscientious objections to the payment of church rates; that the majority of Dissenters are not against church rates, but are generally disposed to support the Church, because they feel the necessity of some establishment for the maintenance of religion. Dr. Hume stated that he never met with a Dissenter who objected to the payment of church rates, when the subject was properly explained to him; but, on the contrary, that he had often read able arguments by Dissenters to prove that these rates were right and proper. Mr. Osborne, a Methodist, declared that the Wesleyans do not desire to be absolved from these payments, but, on the contrary, look on the Established Church as an incalculable blessing; and Mr. Gladding, an Independent, testified that it is only some few Dissenters who desire to separate the Church from the State; and that the conscientious objection to church rates is not entertained at all as extensively as is commonly supposed. Three other witnesses, one of whom, Archdeacon Sanford, had been brought up as a Nonconformist, concurred in declaring that the objections were confined to a small class of

Dissenters, and that the opposition was principally based on political grounds. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Sotherton Estcourt) deposed that for the last fifteen years this question had been merely a source of political capital. And Dr. Foster, a prime agitator in the matter, gave evidence which, in fact, amounts to the same; he said (and the hon. Baronet opposite has said the same thing) for he admitted that the doctrines held by 19-20ths of the Dissenters are identical with those of the Church of England—so that the opposition cannot arise out of their belief; or, in other words, it is not conscientious. This point was truthfully and clearly put by one of the witnesses when asked to explain the objections which were entertained to church rates. He was then asked:—

“Do you believe that any strong conscientious objection exists on the part of Dissenters against contributing to a church rate?—I really do not think that it is the Dissenters so much as persons who are of no religion, who do not go to any place of worship, and who object to every rate or tax of every kind; and this is the only one as to which they have any opportunity of exhibiting their opposition or their bad feeling. The poor rate is made without their consent; the health of towns and the highway rates are made without their consent; and the county rate for the police is made without their consent; and this being the only opportunity they have for opposition, all their bad feeling about rates in general comes out upon the church rate.

Opposition, therefore, it is evident, arises not from conscientious objections but from political aims, or, I may be pardoned for saying, from factious agitation. The church-rates question, as I will now show, is merely put forward as a sort of stalking-horse by certain parties who desire in reality the severance of the Church from the State. This is the real point which is aimed at; so great is the extent of the designs which they entertain. According to Archdeacon Sanford, the abolition of church rates is merely the first step towards the entire abolition of the Established Church, which the Dissenters wish to pull down and reduce to the level of the sects. To the level of the sects? The ministers of every sect can have a seat in this House, and I believe certain ministers of Dissenting bodies are at that moment included in the assembly. But ministers of the Established Church are precluded from sitting in this House. If, therefore, the Church is to be reduced to the level of the sects, let it be at liberty to send its ministers likewise to this House; let the antagonists

meet on equal terms; and I venture to say that such an array of talent, such a weight of influence, and such a mass of intelligence would be thus brought to bear as would utterly overwhelm all the opposition which could be mustered against it. Now I must refer the House to the evidence of Mr. Morley, a member of the Liberation Committee, who has been most active in promoting the agitation against church rates. He stated candidly in his evidence before the Committee that their opposition is directed not merely against church rates, but against every connection between religion and the State, and that it was on this ground that the Dissenters objected to accept of any exemption in their own favour. He added, in reply to a further question, that “This opposition was not consequent upon any injury which was done to Dissenters by a payment which they are called upon to make, but arose from their wish to assert a principle which they believed to be a true principle in the theory of government.” He wishes, in fact, to dictate the true principles of legislation. And here, indeed, is the root of the whole matter; this is the underlying principle which causes all the difference in detail—it is a different theory of Government which they sought to force upon the House. In this notion they differed, not only from all the great statesmen of modern days, but from the political philosophers of former times; they do not even rise as high as the theory of the Chinese philosopher: namely, that it is, or it ought to be, the aim of Governments to seek the good of the nations which they govern; but the church-rate abolitionists differ not only from this belief, but from the principle which is almost the only one that pervades the writings of the present Emperor Napoleon—namely, that it is the duty of the Government to be foremost in leading the nation to those ideas which the Government believes to be true and for their good, even though the nation at the time reject them. Assuredly, if the Government were to seek the good of the nation, its first duty would be to maintain the established religion. But according to Mr. Morley, all that is required at the hands of the Government is to insure the security of person and property; he believes that Government is, in fact, nothing but a policeman. What may be his idea of the present Government I do not know; whether he believes that it is their duty to seek the good of the nation—or whether he regards all the occupants of the Treasury Bench as amounting but to one policeman, in the same way that nine tailors are supposed to make one man. And this is the only ground which those can consistently take who oppose church rates on any principle, and desire to overthrow the Established Church; while, on the other hand, all who believe that the office of Government is to seek the good of the governed, must hold it the chief duty of Government to support the Established Church. But even this security, which Mr. Morley desires, is, after all, only to be one-sided; for, that he desires the Government to take away the property of the Church is apparent by the following evidence:—

“You spoke of certain ultimate objects; do you suppose that the efforts which are now making are with the direct view of ultimately bringing about these objects?—I dare say the phrase has met your Lordship, ‘The separation of Church and State;’ I believe that that is an object which numbers of earnest men have set before themselves; and I venture to say, I would take the liberty to repeat it.”

So that, although in his opinion the proper end of Government is to secure property, the first thing which he wishes to accomplish is to take away from the Church the property which she possesses, and to transfer it to the State, to be employed in general purposes. Dr. Foster avowed himself to be the Chairman of the Liberation Society the objects of which are “to separate the Church from the State, to take away all funds and property with which the State had endowed any denomination whatever;” on this ground it objected also to the payment of tithes, and had taken an active part in the anti-church-rate agitation. It has been proved, then, in this blue-book that the church-rate agitation is merely political; and we are also shown the real extent of the designs of the agitators. You know, now, what we are required to give up. What, then, are we to receive in return? Rest and immunity from further vexation? When the Bill has passed, will the agitation be laid to rest? or will its supporters by that victory be rendered only more anxious to achieve their other objects? Mr. Morley, in his evidence, gives a direct answer to this question:—“I believe,” he says, “that the concession of the question of church rates would not satisfy the ultimate expectations—or, I would say, the requirements of Dissenters.” Dr. Foster admitted that if the question of church rates were settled to-morrow there were “ulterior objects which he should also wish to see accomplished.” He was further asked by the Committee, whether it was his opinion that the settlement of this question would tend to produce peace between the Established Church and the members of the Dissenting body; and he replied that such a settlement “could not be regarded as disposing of all the questions in which they had an interest, and that, so long as the Established Church existed, the same differences would, in his opinion, continue to prevail.” It is therefore quite hopeless to look for peace by a settlement of this question. Mr. Morley declared that the “existing organizations would continue as long as any connection is maintained between legislation and Religion,” and hinted that an influence was exercised by these organizations which hon. Members understand very well who have been led to vote in favour of the Bill. The Liberation Society, Mr. Morley stated, had correspondents in every constituency, and received the co-operation of earnest, thoughtful men in every moderately large-sized town; “and there is,” he says, “a course of action which candidates understand perfectly well, and which is found to be operative on this particular question.” It was also stated by Dr. Foster that the society had appointed a Committee solely for the purpose of influencing elections. Now I ask the House whether it is right to give way to such a system of agitation? and whether doing so would not encourage a new and dangerous principle in the State? In Sir John Stephen’s Anti-Slavery Recollections we might see a good instance of the unconstitutional power which may be exercised by only two members of a society organized for ostensibly religious purposes; it shows the kind of agitation which is carried on behind the scenes, and the way in which a few active and unscrupulous men may overbear the Parliament of the nation. I have said enough to show that this agitation for the abolition of church rates is merely a political movement, and that the ultimate aim of that movement is the destruction of the Church Establishment; I have shown, too, how hopeless it is to expect that the question would be set at rest by passing the present Bill. I have not time to go through all the copious evidence of the evil effects that have resulted in all parishes in which church rates has been discontinued. In many cases, the fabric of the churches has gone to decay for want of funds to repair them. "The state of the churches in Birmingham, "according to one witness," is conclusive against the voluntary system, for in that town the clergy were so active and zealous that if any of the body could succeed in obtaining the requisite funds, it would be the clergy of Birmingham." The church of St. Philip's abutted on a street; it was allowed to fall into such a state of disrepair that life was endangered by the risk of the fall of the church. The Corporation sent to the churchwardens a statement of the fact, with a view to that repair of the church. The churchwardens in their reply stated that they had no funds. The consequence was that the Corporation had to stop up the footway on that side of the street. In Nottingham also, the churches were in a similar state; the church of St. Mary's was in such a perilous state that the clergyman, after endeavouring without success to raise the funds to repair it, had to resign the living, and the church was shut up for four years. This is sufficient to show that the voluntary system has not succeeded in providing for the repair of churches. I need not remind the House that even in the matter of education, which is regarded as more worthy of support than the repair of churches, the voluntary system has proved a failure. In Manchester and Salford the attempts to provide the means of education by the voluntary system failed, and the inhabitants have had ultimately to strike a rate for the purpose. So much more then must it fail to provide for the repair of churches; so much more will a rate there be necessary. Public education, it will be admitted, is much more important than the repair of churches, yet the funds for it cannot be obtained on the voluntary principle, a fortiori it will be more difficult to obtain funds for the latter object by the same system. Some hon. Members voted in favour of the Bill last year because they supposed there was a growing desire on the part of the country in favour of the abolition of church rates. The evidence before the Committee that has since then sat upon the subject shows, however, that that is far from being the case. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Wiltshire said he believed that the only thing the rural parishes desired was to be let alone. The general feeling, too, in favour of the Church has greatly improved. This is proved by the facts reported from the archdeaconry of Bristol. Of 200 parishes in that archdeaconry only eight have refused a church rate, and in the course of two years five out of the eight have retraced their steps, and repented. This proves what two of the witnesses deposed, that a better feeling is growing up in favour of the Church. Another witness to the same fact is Dr. Lushington, the Dean of the Arches; he stated that during the last seven years there had been only two cases of disputed church rates, and those cases turned on incidental circumstances not connected with the principle of the rate itself. Even Dr. Foster allows that the ill-feeling formerly excited by church rates "is very much diminishing." Let the House, moreover, look at the comparative number of the petitions presented in favour of abolition, and against it. On the previous day there were 700 petitions presented against the abolition, and in the present sitting upwards of 1,000. What have they to show on the other side? Up to the 2nd February one poor miserable petition, that must have occasioned the opposite party much trouble to get up, was the only one presented, and only four since then, up to yesterday, have been obtained. I was glad also to see that so many Members on the other side of the House have had to present so many petitions against the abolition of the rate, although their propensity inclined the other way. Therefore one inducement to vote for abolition has been removed by the evidence which we now possess. Some, again, may have voted thus in the hope of restoring peace; which the evidence of all parties shows to be a most vain and delusive expectation. I might, perhaps, assume that some few Members voted for this Bill last year from hostility to the Church, but let these Members remember that the same party anxiously wish to do away with all grants to all religious denominations, with the Regium Donum, and the grant to Maynooth, and seek to secularize the property of the Scotch Presbyterian Church. Evil results have followed wherever a church rate has been refused: is the House prepared to extend those evil effects over the whole country? Those parishes that have already refused the rate will not thank the House for the Bill abolishing it, and the more numerous parishes that wish still to rate themselves will not thankfully receive such a prohibition and restraint at your hands. Lastly, I ask you who should rather be believed and followed,—those who arrogate the tone of Morley and Foster; or those who say with Gladding, the Independent, that “the present state of the law is satisfactory as well in towns as in the rural parishes.” In conclusion, I beg to move the Amendment of which I have given notice, that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

MR. RICHARD LONG, on rising to second the Amendment of the noble Lord, said it was the first time he had taken the liberty of trespassing upon their attention, and he felt all the difficulty of addressing an assembly so fastidiously critical as the House of Commons. The task would be difficult enough under any circumstances, but it was especially difficult when he had to follow the noble Lord (Lord R. Montagu) over ground so well trodden, and on a question that had been so often discussed. Yet he could not but feel obliged to the noble Lord for the able speech, a speech marked by so much moderation and sound judgment, in which he had moved his Amendment, though he should himself suffer from the disadvantage of having to follow it. The Motion being one for abolition, pure and simple, he should not stay to discuss any of those measures which had been put forward as modes of compromising the question by hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House, but which proved clearly that they were not indifferent to conscientious scruples, nor unwilling to show sympathy for the objections of Nonconformists even though they might deny that such objections were rightly founded. Since the question was last discussed, a Committee had been appointed in “another place” to inquire into this question; it had published the evidence, which he believed had been widely circulated. That report showed clearly what were the real objects of the opposition to church rates. Another and not the least important result of that Committee had been a reaction throughout England and Wales in the minds of independent Churchmen; they were resolved no longer to leave this question “cast upon the waters,” to find friends as it might; they were determined to give this unjust and iniquitous measure every constitutional and legal opposition in their power. The consequence was that in the last week of January alone there were 33 petitions, signed by 700 persons, against the abolition of church rates presented to that House. There were 332 petitions, signed by 7700 persons, against the abolition of church rates without an equivalent, and 99 petitions, with 3,500 signatures, against the particular Bill of the hon. Member for Tavistock, and he believed that the division would show signs of the reaction he referred to. Now what were the objects of the Bill before the House? The Bill proposed to abolish, without providing any substitute, equivalent, or compensation, the fund that had been raised in England for the maintenance of its churches for four or five centuries. The House did not abolish the Ecclesiastical Courts, it did not abolish the most petty office, without giving a compensation to every officer, and recognizing their vested interests. The House of Commons was, however, now asked to consent to the confiscation of nearly £300,000 a year, which sum, if capitalized, as Sir John Coleridge very properly observed the other day, would amount to something like £9,000,000. When Parliament abolished the slave trade, they thought it only just to pay the slave owners £20,000,000. Even when they thought it necessary to abolish some fiscal impost, a drawback was generally allowed to those who would be otherwise pecuniary sufferers by their commercial transactions. Where, then, was the justice or the policy of the measure before the House? He repeated, he believed the opinion of the public had very materially changed since the publication of the evidence given before the Committee of the House of Lords. He particularly referred to the evidence of Dr. Hume, of Liverpool, the Rev. J. C. Miller, of Birmingham, the Rev. R. C. Savage, and the Rev. G. Osborn. The blue-book contained evidence much more important than he could offer, or than had been offered by the hon. Baronet (Sir J. Trelawny), the mover of the Bill. The evidence proved that the abolition of church rates would almost entirely destroy the means of supporting the fabrics of the churches in large towns; he could not help asking what would be the result of this among large masses of the population? It was asserted that the abolition of church rates was required on the principle of religious liberty. But he put this question to conscientious Dissenters—were they, on the same ground, prepared to abolish the compulsory observance of the Sunday by the Jews? (“Oh! oh!”) Let them consider the question; what right had they to demand the abolition of church rates on the principle of religious liberty, and yet to prohibit the Jews from employing the Christian Sunday as they pleased?

They did not acknowledge its sacred character. Again, what would be the effect of the present measure upon the English clergy? Their anxieties and responsibilities, which were already very heavy, would be enormously increased; and a body of men, who were remarkable for their ability and their zeal in the discharge of their duties, would be placed in a position of great embarrassment and difficulty by the adoption of the principle now contended for, and by throwing on them the additional labour requisite to raise funds for the support of their churches. But beyond and above all these reasons there was one argument connected with the church-rate question, which struck him with peculiar force. This Spoliation Bill would be carried, if carried it was to be, by political pressure, not by force of argument. During the agitation of the question for the last thirty years, there was no bolder or more uncompromising opponent to the abolition of church rates than the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Lord John Russell). He regretted not seeing the noble Lord in his place to-day, to defend in person those principles with which he had heretofore identified himself. He wished to speak with all respect of that noble Lord, but he could not help thinking that the character of public men was the possession of the country. Until the last year no hon. Member of that House evinced greater earnestness, zeal, and determination in his opposition to every measure for the abolition of church rates than the noble Lord himself. What had since happened to change the noble Lord's opinions? What had changed his convictions? If he had not changed his convictions, why had he changed his vote? He (Mr. Long) was inclined to believe that it was not by the force of argument the noble Lord's convictions had changed, for they had changed not in the heyday of effervescent youth, but after many years of matured statesmanship,—but his conversion had been effected rather by a certain political pressure that had been put upon him. To anything like political pressure he (Mr. Long) had no answer to give but one of a firm, resolute, though temperate resistance, and a determination never to cease the expression of his convictions whilst he had a voice capable of uttering them. Such pressure, however, sometimes extorted votes; and after the many speeches they had heard made by the noble Lord from week to week and

from year to year upon this subject—after the able statesmanship he had displayed in that House as the leader of the Liberal party, he (Mr. Long) was unwilling to believe that the convictions of the noble Lord were in favour of the passing of this measure at the present moment; and, therefore, if the noble Lord should vote in favour of the abolition of church rates, that vote, he feared, would be given contrary to his convictions. “Oh.” He was simply expressing his own opinions upon the subject. He deplored the continuance of the agitation on this question; but would concession on the part of the Conservatives settle it? He believed not. Because he believed this Bill calculated to excite ill-feeling and acrimony, instead of salving sores and creating peace; because he believed it to be anything but a moderate Bill; because he believed it would, if passed, leave a sense of deep injustice rankling in the minds of the clergy and laity of the Church of England; because he believed it would, if carried in this House and thrown out in the House of Lords, generate differences between the two branches of the Legislature at a time when it was essential that those bodies should be in harmony; because he believed it would not be satisfactory to Dissenters any more than to Churchmen; and because he considered it would be a most dangerous precedent to concede to pressure that which could not be got by argument and fair logic, he had great pleasure in seconding the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Huntingdonshire, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question, to add the words “upon this day six months.”

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: The noble Lord who moved the Amendment laid before the House a full statement of the arguments which it appeared to him it was desirable to submit to our notice before we arrived at a decision on the subject under discussion. He was followed by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and who has spoken in a manner, on this, the first occasion on which he has addressed the House, which unquestionably creates such a presumption as to his knowledge and ability as to induce us to wish that he would on future occasions seize the opportunity of delivering his opinions on some of those various subjects which await our decision. There was, however, in the speech of the hon. Gentleman one passage of which I feel bound to take notice, and the tone and substance of which I trust he will in any subsequent speech which he may make not deem it expedient to imitate. He thought fit to state to the House that my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs had, in the case of the last vote which he gave with respect to church rates, acted in opposition to the sincere convictions which he entertained on that subject. Now, if the hon. Gentleman had been in the House when the debate to which this charge refers took place, he would recollect that my noble Friend stated at length his views upon this question; that he gave the reasons for that change with respect to it which his opinions had undergone; that those were weighty, although they may not be considered by hon. Gentlemen opposite conclusive reasons, and that there was, therefore, not the slightest ground for that imputation of insincerity which has to-day been made. The hon. Gentleman would do well also to bear in mind that hon. Members on both sides of the House have modified their opinions on many questions of much greater importance and magnitude than that which we are now discussing, without, in consequence, being held to be open to any such imputation of insincerity; and I trust, therefore, he will not, after he has had a more extended experience of our proceedings, seek to obtain an undue advantage for his own opinions by making unfounded charges against those from whom he happens to differ. Having now, as I hope, shown the House that the hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken in the view which he takes of the vote of my noble Friend, I shall proceed briefly to state the reasons why I mean to support the second reading of the Bill under consideration. I may, then, in the first place observe, that I have never been one of those who entertain extreme opinions on the question with which the Bill proposes to deal. I do not regard the maintenance of church rates in any form as necessarily an infringement of religious liberty; while, on the other hand, I am unable to agree with the great majority of hon. Gentlemen opposite in the belief that if church rates were abolished the fabrics of the Church of England would, as the result, fall into decay. I am afraid, therefore, that the opinions to which I am about to give expression are not likely to find favour with any large number of the Members of this

House. The views, however, which I on former occasions enunciated I still retain upon this subject, although I confess I have lost my faith in the probability of any reasonable compromise being effected, by which a satisfactory settlement of the question could be attained. I have therefore come—reluctantly, I must admit—to the conclusion that the best course to pursue is to vote for the second reading of the Bill which the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock has introduced. Now, one of the arguments which was urged by the noble Lord who moved the Amendment against the proposal which the Bill involves was, that in certain parishes in the town of Birmingham where no church rates were levied the fabric of the church had as a consequence fallen into decay, and the noble Lord having mentioned that fact, contended that if such was the state of things in a town such as Birmingham, there was a fortiori reason to suppose matters would assume a still worse aspect in the case of rural parishes. It seems to me, however, that that argument admits of being inverted, if we only for a moment take into account what the real position is of those churches which are situated in towns. The support of the Church of England may be said to be founded on a system of tithes; but that system entirely fails in towns, inasmuch as tithes are paid out of the annual increment of the land. But in those instances in which the land is covered with houses there can be no fund out of which tithes would be payable, and the church under those circumstances relies upon voluntary contributions. There are pew-rents and Easter offerings, and christening, marriage, and burial fees, and I may perhaps take this opportunity of saying that I had recently occasion to regret, in connection with those fees, that in the parishes in London, owing to the prohibition of intramural interments, that source of support is cut off. But, as I was observing, the church, under the circumstances to which I allude, has to be maintained by voluntary contributions, consisting of pew-rents, or other offerings, and it is therefore manifest that there is greater difficulty in collecting subscriptions for the maintenance of the church in towns than in ordinary rural parishes, where the incumbent receives a stipend adequate to his support out of the tithes of his parish, and all that is required in addition is a small sum to keep up the fabric of the church, and to make provision for the services. I cannot under those circumstances, but believe that in the event of the church rates being abolished, greater facilities would be found to exist in the majority of rural parishes for procuring that small sum, over and above the larger sum which is required for the maintenance of the clergyman, than could be secured in the poorer class of parishes in towns. Now, in dealing with this subject of church rates, I cannot refrain from suggesting to the House that it is one which has frequently been discussed with more of sentiment than of reason and solid argument. There has been a great deal of sentiment, for instance, indulged in with reference to the imaginary grievances of Dissenters; but there is also a certain degree of spurious sentiment pervading the views of those who contend that the Church of England is the church of the poor. It is said that if we abolish church rates there will be no free seats for the humbler classes; but how is it that under the existing law free seats are provided for them? Simply by the fact that those who are not poor pay church rates. If, however, an adequate sum for the repair of the church and the maintenance of its services were provided by means of pew-rents, even in rural as well as in the town parishes, the difficulty with which we are now dealing would be at an end. Money would be collected from those who are able to pay pew-rents, and the poor might be provided with free seats, as under the existing system. I am of course aware that there are at present prevalent strong objections to pew-rents; but how, I would ask, can a line be more effectually drawn between Dissenters, whose conscientious scruples we are anxious to respect, and those by whom the church is practically used—in other words, the members of the congregation—than by simply imposing on a portion of the pews a moderate rent? For my own part, I must confess that I see nothing in pew-rents which is at all opposed to the sanctity with which a place of religious worship ought to be surrounded. One of the reasons why they are objected to arises from the feeling that they are in some way connected with dissent; but what, I may ask, is a church rate, but a pew-rent under another name? The only difference between them, practically speaking, is that a church rate is a charge imposed on the inhabitants of a parish, for the most part in respect of their habitations, while, in the case of pew-rents, the churchwarden of a parish simply as-

signs a pew to the occupiers of each house, as far as the accommodation in the church will allow. I therefore cannot understand the justice of the objection which many persons entertain to resorting to pew-rents for the maintenance of the fabric of the church. If, then, a system were introduced in accordance with which it would be competent for the incumbent of a parish or the Bishop, on the abolition of church rates, to impose on a certain portion of the pews in rural churches a moderate rent, I apprehend an equivalent would be found for the sum—I believe it amounts to £250,000—which is at present raised by means of church rates. The hon. Gentleman who seconded the Amendment, however, contends that we ought not to abolish a tax of this nature without giving compensation; but I do not think he was happy in selecting the case of the practitioners in the Palace Court, or that of the proprietors of slaves in the West Indies, to whom compensation was, in consequence of the passing of measures affecting their interests, accorded, as furnishing an illustration of the justice of the view which he submitted to the House. I would, in dealing with this point, venture to point out to the hon. Gentleman that the principle upon which compensation is granted by Parliament in such cases rests upon the foundation of property. When, therefore, two Sessions ago, we went so far as to grant compensation to the proctors who practised in the Ecclesiastical Courts, we proceeded upon the assumption that they possessed a vested interest in their professional pursuits which it was but reasonable to take into account when those courts were abolished. In the present instance I am at a loss to point to any class of persons who can be said to have a vested interest, and I cannot admit that there is any ground for applying the doctrine of compensation to church rates. What I should wish to provide is, not compensation to any class of persons, but a substitute for the impost to be abolished, some payment which would discharge the same function as is discharged by church rates—at once certain in its collection and just in its incidence. That problem is, I think, solved by reference to pew-rents, and therefore I do not see that the objections to the second reading of this Bill have any force whatever. I have thus indicated, so far as I am able, the views I have formed on this subject. Notwithstanding the supposed light shed upon the subject by the Report of the Committee of the House of Lords, hon. Gentlemen opposite have no proposition to oppose to the second reading of this Bill; I shall therefore deem it my duty to support the original Motion.

MR. KER SEYMER said, he was not going to discuss the question of church rates. All that could be said on the general subject had been already said by others better than he could pretend to say it, but he wished to draw the attention of the House to the present position of the church-rate Question, and the steps by which it had reached that position, and he must say the friends of the Church had great reason to complain that noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen who had been in office, with a very short interval, since Sir Robert Peel's Government had left the question of church rates in the hands of independent Members pledged to their total and unconditional abolition. If he had to speak of noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen in their absence it was not his fault. He did not complain of the absence of Ministers on a Wednesday, but he did complain of their leaving questions of vital importance to private Members which thus came to be discussed during the absence of Ministers at a Wednesday morning sitting. Considering the importance of this Question—for, thank God, in spite of Mr. Morley and Mr. Miall, the Church was still a great institution of the country—considering the position of the Question ever since the decision of the House of Lords in the Braintree case, they had a right to complain of the course which had been taken by right hon. Gentlemen opposite in 1856. The predecessor of the hon. Baronet, Sir William Clay, brought forward his usual Motion for the abolition of church rates, and they were all very anxious to know what course would be pursued by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Morpeth, then Home Secretary (Sir George Grey) on that occasion. He voted for the second reading of the Bill for the total abolition of church rates, all though prepared, disposed, and determined to maintain church rates in some 9,000 or 10,000 parishes. A vote more inconsistent with the principles on which they considered the second reading of Bills never was given; and when the present Home Secretary said he would vote for this Bill, because no compromise had been provided, he would ask why did not right hon. Gentlemen opposite propose a compromise? After the decision of the House on that occasion, he got up and asked the Home

Secretary if the Government would take up the Bill. The right hon. Baronet said it remained in private hands, but they would endeavour to give it facilities. Those facilities never were available, and the Bill did not come on during that Session for further discussion. That course was most unfair and unjust to the Church of England, as well as inconsistent with the usual Parliamentary practice. On this subject he would quote the words used by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London (Lord John Russell), who took part in that debate, and said—

“With respect to the proposal which my right hon. Friend the right hon. Baronet (Sir George Grey) has made on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, he has chosen the inconvenient course, as I think, of not bringing into this House a measure founded upon the principles he has indicated, but, while proposing to sanction by his vote and by the votes of his colleagues a Bill framed in a very different spirit, he holds out the hope that he will be able to introduce in Committee, not some simple alterations merely, but material and somewhat complicated provisions.” [3 Hansard, cxi., 1918.] It was but just to the right hon. Baronet to say that he had endeavoured afterwards to retrace his steps, and on a subsequent occasion he voted in favour of church rates; but, having once led his friends into the wrong lobby, he could not get them out again. He went into that lobby accompanied by his right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Sir W. Hayter); the huntsmen and whipper-in were together, but the whole pack were running riot. The hon. Member who seconded the Motion spoke of the increasing majorities in favour of the abolition of church rates; but these were to be traced to the conduct of the Government. What said the Prime Minister on the occasion to which he had alluded? That noble Lord generally spoke very plainly, and he did so then. He said—and these were his own sentiments—

“The course we intend to pursue is, to recognise the existing state of things in parishes where church rates are levied, and to provide another arrangement for those parishes in which a different set of circumstances has arisen.” [3 Hansard, cxi., 1920.]

How the noble Lord, entertaining these views, could vote for a Bill proposing the total and unconditional abolition of church rates he had never been able to understand. In 1857 the noble Lord intimated his intention to deal with the question in a manner to please everybody. That was most gratifying to hear, and the hon. Baronet had been induced to proceed no further but no further proceeded the noble Lord. Then came the following Session, when the right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to retrace his steps. The Conservative Government lost no time in endeavouring to deal with this question. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) brought forward an honest and liberal measure, which proposed a settlement of this question. It did not receive that support to which he thought it entitled from right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. He was very reluctant to impute motives; but one could not help thinking that a disinclination to let the merit of settling such an important question fall to a Conservative Government had something to do with the opposition which his right hon. Friend's Bill had received. The measure was conceived in a liberal spirit. The Conservatives were prepared to make great concessions, and they ought to have been met in a fair spirit. He himself was very anxious for a settlement. He thought the question might be settled; but certainly not by a one-sided measure, such as that before them. He might observe with reference to his right hon. Friend's Bill that he differed from him in one respect. His hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) was desirous of discovering a locus penitentia for those who conscientiously objected to church rates. He proposed, where church rates did not exist, to give a legal exemption. After the decision of the House of Lords in the Braintree case, he (Mr. K. Seymer) did not think there was much need of that legal exemption. It seemed to him that the case for legislation was much stronger where they found the church out of repair. In the majority of town parishes, where church rates did not exist, means had been found for the maintenance of the fabrics; therefore he was bound to say that in legislating on this subject they ought to recognize that state of facts; but the case was different in rural districts. He had a letter from a clergyman the other day who stated the case of a district in which a Roman Catholic gentleman was the owner of six entire parishes. That gentleman was surrounded by a body of Protestant tenantry, who made and paid a rate at present; but when it came to making a collection, and when that gentleman refused, as no doubt he would refuse, to head the list, how would the case be then? Surely there would be little chance of sufficient money being obtained, and some of the vicars deriving a scanty subsistence from the small tithes—and many clergymen subscribed beyond their means towards religious and secular objects—would probably have to bear a part of the expense. His right hon. Friend also proposed to relieve those who had conscientious objections to paying church rates; but he (Mr. K. Seymer) did not go so far as that. Some persons had a conscientious objection to all payments. They could not admit the principle that people were not to pay for what they conscientiously objected to. Such a principle would lead much further than the abolition of church rates. Admit the principle, and he should himself object to support the churches and schools connected with the Presbyterian Church of Scotland. Admit the principle, and the Episcopal Church of Scotland would have a right to object to pay to the Presbyterian Establishment. He would exempt the Dissenters; and he would not go further. He remembered the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) objecting to the condition that the Dissenter who was relieved from the payment should have no right to take part in vestries as humiliating. God forbid that he should wish to humiliate any class of his fellow-subjects, but how excessive must be the pride that could consider this a humiliation! Although the conduct of the noble Lord the Member for the City of London had been defended by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, it was still open to some objection. The Bill of his right hon. Friend went too far for the noble Lord. The noble Lord said, "I cannot vote for that Bill, as you give up too much to the Dissenters." Now, that was in February last, and yet in the summer of the same year the noble Lord supported the second reading of a Bill for the total abolition of church rates. He made no comments on this fact; he thought it required none. In the rural districts there was no difficulty regarding church rates. He had that day presented a petition in favour of church rates, signed by every ratepayer of a large parish, with one only exception, and that was the dissenting minister. Now, as there was a minister, he supposed there were Dissenters in the parish, and, if so, they all signed in favour of the continuance of the rates. It might be said, "If you present petitions from parishes, the whole of the population of which are in favour of church rates, you could have no difficulty under the voluntary system." But that did not follow. People were willing to contribute to an old-established impost; but it by no means followed that when, under the voluntary system, "the burden was laid on the willing horse," the willingness to contribute would long continue. "The willing horse" would, after a time, refuse to bear the burden; and he thought that rural parishes would be thrown into a condition of much difficulty. He did not say that the churches would go out of repair; but this he did say, that the clergy would have, in many instances, to contribute largely themselves, and in others to go begging all over the country. In the Lords' blue-book on the subject of church rates he found in the evidence of Dr. Foster the following admission. He said, "The Dissenters conscientiously object to allow Churchmen who conscientiously approve of church rates to continue to rate themselves for that purpose." This was fairly elicited from the cross-examination of Dr. Foster. It was rather a roundabout case of conscience as far as the Dissenters were concerned. It manifested a desire on the part of the Dissenters to interfere with the free conscience of the Church, arising simply from a wish to attain ulterior objects, and separate the Church from the State. Dr. Foster was the chairman of the Parliamentary Committee of the Liberation Society—he did not give the full title, for life was not long enough for those long-winded, pompous designations, which this society gave itself; and he said, "With regard to our objections, I should say that I think the objections of the society are merely made in consequence of their being one means of weakening the connection between Church and State. We wish to take away all funds and property with which the State has endowed any religion whatever." "Do you include tithes in that?" "Yes." Now, many hon. Gentlemen saw a great distinction between tithes and church rates; but this far-sighted gentleman, who was at the head of the Liberation Society, did not see the distinction, nor admit it, and by and by this Dr. Foster, being chairman of the Parliamentary Committee of the Liberation Society—whose business, in other words, was to look after the borough Members—would not allow them to see, or if they did, would not allow them to own it. That was the real position of the Society for the Abolition of Church Rates. He only wished that the representatives of the gentleman who spoke out so boldly in the Lords' Committee would speak out as plainly in the House of Commons. If they were opposed to the connection between Church and State let them come forward like men, raise the question, and show their colours, and the Conservatives would fight it out with them. But, no, they preferred sapping and mining, and, unless prevented, they would go on till they blew up the Established Church. That was just what the Conservatives did not want. The hon. Baronet who opened the debate began by saying that the question was very complicated. It was so. His Bill, however, was delightfully simple, and when we proposed to deal simply with a very complicated question we dealt unjustly. This was exactly what was done by the hon. Baronet. Was he aware that there were many parishes under local Acts in which the stipends of the ministers were made payable out of church rates? This was the fact; and he understood that it was considered doubtful, at all events, whether the Bill before the House would not, if it passed the Legislature, override and abrogate those local Acts. The hon. Baronet said, "I merely abolish church rates. I make no provision for altered circumstances. Dissenters are still to come and vote in Church meetings, and object to rates of Churchmen." He did not wish to deprive Dissenters of the services of the Church, for many prefer being married where their parents were married before them, and to have their remains interred where those of their ancestors had been deposited before." But he (Mr. K. Seymour) said, "Do not interfere with the money, if you are relieved from church rates." The right hon. Baronet who spoke last said he did not take extreme views; still he gave a very extreme vote, and seemed to throw on the Opposition the responsibility of proposing a substitute. But, surely, if there was to be a substitute for church rates, it was for the Government, who supported the abolition, to bring in the substitute. The right hon. Baronet had, however, proposed nothing of the kind, but had sat down rather abruptly when it appeared as if he were only beginning his speech. The right hon. Baronet had, indeed, indicated one resource out of which to replace church rates—namely, pew-rents, which were entirely repudiated in the rural districts. But even that substitute he had not ventured to propose. All he had done was to say that he should vote for the abolition of church rates. A great question had never been left in a more unsatisfactory position by a Member of a Government. The House could not pretend to vote in ignorance of the ulterior objects of the body whose agitation had brought that question to its present state. Their aim was nothing less than the separation of Church and State. As the House had now the choice between the total and unconditional abolition of church rates, and a fair compromise relieving Dissenters from the impost, while, also, allowing Churchmen in the rural districts to rate themselves for their own purposes, he called on all who were in favour of maintaining the Established Church to vote against the present Bill.

MR. BRISTOW : Mr. Speaker, Sir, it is with extreme reluctance that I obtrude myself upon the notice of the House, but inasmuch as this is an occasion of great importance, and a subject upon which many of my constituents feel strongly, and inasmuch as it is the first time I have trespassed upon the indulgence of this assembly, I am convinced that I shall not ask for its favourable attention in vain. As a sincere and earnest member of the Church of England, too, I cannot but think that it would be well for me not to give an altogether silent vote in favour of the second reading of this Bill. I am not about to reiterate any of the arguments in favour of the measure which have been so ably adduced by the hon. Baronet who introduced it, neither is it my intention to debate the points so strongly urged against the Bill by the noble Lord who moved the Amendment; I believe that the House has been, so to speak, from time to time deluged with the pros and cons relating to this Question. I shall, therefore, confine myself to one or two points. It has always appeared to me, as an earnest member of the Church of England, expedient both for the good of the Church itself, and for the peace of society, that this measure should become law. Compulsory church rates are irritating and obnoxious to Dissenters, not because of their pecuniary amount, but because they jar against their religious feelings and principles. On the other hand the number of Churchmen who are in favour of their abolition is steadily increasing, because it is felt that they weaken instead of adding strength to the Church, while they are an annually recurring cause of strife and ill-will. Under these circumstances is it not expedient by means of a comprehensive enactment like that before the House to remove this grievance from the minds of the community? As a member of the Church of England, I believe her doctrines to be purely Scriptural, and I find in the Sacred volume no warrant for compulsory church rates, but I do find that the angelic messengers who proclaimed the advent of the great Founder of my creed declared that it was to bring not only glory to God in the highest Heaven, but on earth peace, good-will among men. I ask myself, and I ask the House, does this tax consist with the announcement of the foundation of my religion? does it produce peace, does it engender good-will? and the answer being, as it must be, in the negative, constrains me to vote for its abolition. If the argument that has been several times addressed, that our parish churches would go to decay if this rate was abolished, was well founded—if it is an argument which was demonstrated by facts, and not a mere theory, which practice has proved the fallacy of, then I might say I should pause before I gave my support to this measure. But is not the preamble of the Bill true? is it not a fact “that church rates have for years ceased to be collected in many churches;” and yet are not those churches existing in undiminished beauty and order, thronged with willing worshippers and the Divine service regularly performed therein? If this be so, then the argument that churches will go to decay and tumble down if church rates are abolished has little weight with me, it becomes but a mere fiction, and I prefer to it the fact that church rates are virtually abolished in many parishes, and that the churches still stand and flourish; and, Sir, I confess that I should greatly prefer to make one in the congregations of those churches for which no rates have been levied, but which are supported by their own occupants, because my worship would not have been made a cause of offence to my neighbour, because the walls of the sacred precincts in which I knelt would not have been cemented by ill will and strife, nor the atmosphere I breathed tainted by the invocations of anything but blessings. For these reasons, briefly and feebly expressed, in fine, because I do not believe church rates to be necessary to the existence or for the preservation of the Church of England; because I know them to be a fruitful source of evil and discord among many who are fellow-citizens and should be brothers; because I can see no good in their retention, and no harm in their abolition, I heartily and conscientiously give my vote for the second reading of this Bill.

MR. DISRAELI (to whom Mr. Packe

gave way):—I will not interpose between my hon. Friend and the House more than a moment; but, before we come to a division, I wish to place before it one view which I think has not been sufficiently, if at all, urged on their attention. And that is, the extremely centralizing character of the measure which the hon. Baronet recommends to our adoption this day. He calls upon the central authority to interfere with our parochial constitution—a constitution, I may say, in passing, not less important than our political constitution. For what are the circumstances of the case? To take the lowest estimate, 80 per cent of those parishes do not wish to be interfered with, and the rest have no grievance in the law and custom of the country at present; because if it be a grievance that they should be followed in those parishes, the majority of the inhabitants have the power to exempt themselves by their own act. Well, Sir, I look with great jealousy, then, on the central authority being called upon to interfere with the will of the great body of the parishes of this country in the exercise of a custom which has existed for centuries and which, in the great majority of the parishes of the country, has been productive of beneficial results. I admit the painful anomaly that on a subject of such general interest as the maintenance of the fabrics of our churches a custom should be prevalent in one part of the country and have fallen into desuetude in another. I think it of great importance that we should arrive, if possible, at some mode by which that anomaly might be arranged and terminated. We have had several schemes brought forward, many suggestions on the subject in the speeches of hon. Gentlemen; we have had the policy of one Government expressed but not proposed; and we have had another instance of the policy of a Government not only recommended, but brought before the consideration of the House in the form of a Bill. I admit that the experience of all these attempts to arrive at a satisfactory settlement of the question is not of an encouraging nature; but it does not follow that because they have not been of a successful character that we should immediately advocate a proceeding like that of the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock. Because if it be a fact—and I have not heard it denied—that the very great proportion of the parishes of the country are satisfied with the present state of the law, and that the minority who are dissatisfied are not suffering from any practical grievance, then what we have before us in the proposition of the hon. Baronet is not the redress of a practical grievance but the acceptance of a speculative theory. Well now, Sir, what is that theory? That theory has varied in its form and expression in the years during which I have had a seat in the House, and during the time this agitation has existed. It came forward at first in a very plausible form, which recommended it to the consideration of many in this House who are not favourable to the present scheme. We were called on then to recognize a conscientious scruple, and the recognition of a conscientious scruple was a basis for legislation which naturally recommended itself to every generous mind. But, Sir, that is no longer the case. No one seeks redress now for his conscientious scruples; and those who were once willing to listen to such an appeal have, I think, upon a wiser and discreeter reflection, felt that the admission of such a plea would lead to ultimate legislation upon other subjects of a character which few in this House would approve. Well then, Sir, what is the form which the speculative theory—for a speculative theory, and not a practical grievance, it is—what is the form that it now assumes? It takes one much clearer, much more sincere, much more honest, and much more intelligible. It takes the form of a controversy, whether there should be an ecclesiastical establishment in this country; and whether the union between Church and State that has so long prevailed should be acknowledged and supported. I do not mean to say that in this question of church rates, necessarily, that issue is contained. That is a point which—it is not convenient at this time to enter into, and which is not required for my argument;—but what I do say is, that we have it in clear evidence, acknowledged in a manly and straightforward manner, that is the real issue we have to try. Well now, Sir, I think we know where we stand. I have always observed that when the property of the Church is at stake, and when questions affecting it are brought forward in this House, the agitation which takes place is of considerable duration, and during that agitation the form of the question assumes different aspects; but, ultimately the real character comes out, and it is a great error to suppose that in questions of this kind a lengthened agitation is necessarily speak for itself. And it would be seen from it that this question has entered an entirely new phase, and presented itself under quite a novel aspect. The hon. Member for Tavistock does not appear to be aware of this; he seems to have looked at this evidence from the old point of view for he has told the House that they were dealing with a religious question. I hope to show that it is by no means a religious but merely a political question. The hon. Member represented a great authority in the Upper House (the Earl of Derby) having said at that time that the rates of church rates were a grievance to Dissenters. So it is not otherwise doubtless that the error has now been removed and the evidence would show that Dissenters do not object to church rates but merely wish to have them reformed. He is not a question of church rates even Mr. Morley has said for the abolition of church seats are not a Dissenting charge. The Chairman of the Church of England said that in the case of church seats are not a Dissenting charge. Another witness has said that the Established Church has maintained a mission to the Dissenting ministers visit the places of worship but the ministers are not contented with being attendants on the irreligious poor but they want to bring the Gospel to the homes. That is the real question. The poor is not the fact, but the Report, that the poor is not in humbly and instances of the poor, where, when they came poor, the poor are shut up and so the poor are bought for the purposes of the poor. The Baronet referred to had taken place in the annuity tax and the poor into the poor some such excuse the land if church rates are abolished. But

dence of Mr. Morley, Dr. Foster, and all the witnesses on that side, he would have seen that it is their intention, when the Church-rates Abolition Bill has passed, to continue their agitation as strenuously as ever. Did the House ever know an agitation which grew milder from victory, or which lessened its exertions when stimulated by success? And the Gentlemen to whom I refer have admitted that their views go much further than the mere abolition of church rates. The hon. Baronet has compared the relative number of Dissenters and Churchmen; but from whence he procured his figures I am unable to divine. [Sir JOHN TRELAWNY: From the Census returns.] Well, I have, fortunately, happened to bring with me some which I procured from a later document. Besides, the hon. Baronet unwittingly committed himself to a fallacy in comparing the number of Dissenters with Churchmen; for more than half the Dissenters were in favour of church rates. The fairer way is to compare the number of the opponents of that rate with the number of those who are favourable to its continuance. There are six sects of Baptists, numbering $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the general population, the Independents numbering $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and the Jews, Mormons, and other sects, amounting to $6\frac{3}{4}$ per cent additional, raising the total proportion of those who are opposed to church rates to $16\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Those who are not opposed to church rates are—Roman Catholics $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and seven sects of Wesleyans numbering 13 per cent, making in all a similar proportion of $16\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The church-going members of the Church of England are 42 per cent, and the irreligious poor, whom, likewise, I feel myself entitled to count, are in the ratio of 25 per cent. [Laughter and Opposition cheers.] Yes, these are the poor who are never taught by the Dissenters, and never visited by Dissenters, but are left to the Church of England, whose ministers do visit and read to them, and send Bible-readers among them, and strive to bring the Gospel home to them, both in season and out of season. This calculation then shows a balance of 67 per cent in favour of the maintenance of church rates. The hon. Baronet has alluded to his own borough, where, though every man might be king in his own castle, I greatly fear the hon. Gentleman is not quite supreme. If, as was alleged, the inhabitants were unanimous in their opposition to church rates, how came it that a petition from Tavistock against the abolition of church rates had been laid on the table the previous day, which was not presented by the hon. Baronet himself? The hon. Baronet the Member for Banbury (Sir C. Douglas) had correctly quoted the evidence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Sotherton Eastcourt), but had scarcely laid the emphasis on the right word; the quotation runs thus: "whether it be true, or only assumed, at all events the objection which is stated has assumed a question of religious toleration." Moreover in counting up the relative numbers in the divisions on this subject, he has prudently omitted all mention of last year's division, in which there was no increase of the majority previously obtained, and which I hope the division on this day will still further reduce. This House, as the hon. Baronet has said, has, it is true, pronounced in favour of abolition; but then they have done so under a wrong impression. The House was formerly led away by the belief that this was a question of conscience, and by the desire to show consideration to honest objections of this nature; but now, on the contrary, we learn from the evidence of nearly all the witnesses examined last Session that the conscientious objections of Dissenters have nothing to do with the matter, that very few Dissenters have conscientious objections to the payment of church rates; that the majority of Dissenters are not against church rates, but are generally disposed to support the Church, because they feel the necessity of some establishment for the maintenance of religion. Dr. Hume stated that he never met with a Dissenter who objected to the payment of church rates, when the subject was properly explained to him; but, on the contrary, that he had often read able arguments by Dissenters to prove that these rates were right and proper. Mr. Osborne, a Methodist, declared that the Wesleyans do not desire to be absolved from these payments, but, on the contrary, look on the Established Church as an incalculable blessing; and Mr. Gladding, an Independent, testified that it is only some few Dissenters who desire to separate the Church from the State; and that the conscientious objection to church rates is not entertained at all as extensively as is commonly supposed. Three other witnesses, one of whom, Archdeacon Sanford, had been brought up as a Nonconformist, concurred in declaring that the objections were confined to a small class of senters, and that the opposition was principally based on political grounds. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Seithron Batcourt) stated that for the last fifteen years this objection had been merely a source of political capital. And Dr. Foster, a prime mover in the matter, gave evidence which, in fact, amounts to the same; he said (and

are identical with those of the Church of England—so that the opposition cannot be out of their belief; or, in other words, is not conscientious. This point was thoroughly and clearly put by one of the witnesses when asked to explain the objections which were entertained to church rates. He was then asked:—

Do you believe that any strong conscientious objection exists on the part of Dissenters against contributing to a church rate?—I really do not think that it is the Dissenters so much as persons who are of no religion, who do not go to any place of worship, and who object to every rate or tax of any kind; and this is the only one as to which they have any opportunity of exhibiting their objection or their bad feeling. The poor rate is levied without their consent; the health of towns is levied without their consent; the highway rates are made without their consent; and the county rate for the police is made without their consent; and this being the only opportunity they have for opposition, all their bad feeling about rates in general comes out upon the church rate.

position, therefore, it is evident, arises not from conscientious objections but from political aims, or, I may be pardoned for saying, from factious agitation. The church-rates question, as I will now show, is merely put forward as a sort of stalking-horse by certain parties who desire in reality the severance of the Church from the State. This is the real point which is aimed at; so great is the extent of the signs which they entertain. According to Archdeacon Sanford, the abolition of church rates is merely the first step towards the entire abolition of the Established Church, which the Dissenters wish to pull down and reduce to the level of the sects. The level of the sects? The ministers of every sect can have a seat in this House, but I believe certain ministers of Dissent—bodies are at that moment included in the assembly. But ministers of the Established Church are precluded from sitting in this House. If, therefore, the Church is to be reduced to the level of the sects, let it be at liberty to send its ministers likewise to this House; let the antagonists

meet on equal terms; and I venture to say that such an array of talent, such a weight of influence, and such a mass of intelligence would be thus brought to bear upon the Government which would utterly overwhelm all the opposition which could be mustered against it. Now I must refer the House to the evidence of Mr. Morley, a member of the Liberator's Committee, who has been most active in promoting the agitation against church rates. He stated candidly in his evidence before the Committee that their opposition is directed not merely against church rates but against every connection between religion and the State, and that it was on this ground that the Dissenters objected to accept of any exemption in their own favour. He added, in reply to a further question, that "This opposition was not consequent upon any injury which was done to Dissenters by a payment which they are called upon to make, but arose from their wish to assert a principle which they believed to be a true principle in the theory of government." He wishes, in fact, to dictate the true principles of legislation. And here, indeed, is the root of the whole matter; this is the underlying principle which causes all the difference in detail—is a different theory of Government which they sought to force upon the House. In this notion they differed, not only from the great statesmen of modern days, but from the political philosophers of former times; they do not even rise as high as the theories of the Chinese philosopher: namely, that it is, or it ought to be, the aim of Government to seek the good of the nations which they govern; but the church-rate abolitionists differ not only from this belief, but from the principle which is almost the only one that pervades the writings of the present Emperor Napoleon—namely, that it is the duty of the Government to be foremost in leading the nation to those ideas which the Government believes to be true and for their good, even though the nation at the time reject them. Assuredly, if the Government were to seek the good of the nation, its first duty would be to maintain the established religion. But according to Mr. Morley, all that is required at the hands of the Government is to insure the security of person and property; he believes that Government is, in fact, nothing but a policeman. What may be his idea of the present Government I do not know; whether he believes that it is their duty to seek the good of the nation—or whether he regards all the occupants of the Treasury But but to one policeman, in nine tailors are suppose man. And this is the of those can consistently to church rates on any prin to overthrow the Establish on the other hand, all who office of Government is to the governed, must hold of Government to support Church. But even this see Morley desires, is, after all sided; for, that he desires to take away the property is apparent by the following

"You spoke of certain ultimate suppose that the efforts which are with the direct view of about these objects?—I dare met your Lordship, 'The and State;' I believe that thousands of earnest men have selves; and I venture to say liberty to repeat it."

"That step is taking away property, and giving it to the general purposes?—That is which is necessarily involved.' So that, although in his end of Government is to the first thing which he wishes to take away from the property which she possesses it to the State, to be employed purposes. Dr. Foster as be the Chairman of the L the objects of which are Church from the State, funds and property which had endowed any denomination on this ground it objected ment of tithes, and had part in the anti-church-rate has been proved, then, that the church-rate is political; and we are also extent of the designs of You know, now, what we give up. What, then, as in return? Rest and in their vexation? When the will the agitation be will its supporters by rendered only more and their other objects? Mr evidence, gives a direct question:—"I believe," the concession of the question would not satisfy the tious—or, I would say, of Dissenters." Dr. Fos

gone to decay for want of funds to repair them. "The state of the churches in Birmingham, "according to one witness," is conclusive against the voluntary system, for in that town the clergy were so active and zealous that if any of the body could succeed in obtaining the requisite funds, it would be the clergy of Birmingham." The church of St. Philip's abutted on a street; it was allowed to fall into such a state of disrepair that life was endangered by the risk of the fall of the church. The Corporation sent to the churchwardens a statement of the fact, with a view to that repair of the church. The churchwardens in their reply stated that they had no funds. The consequence was that the Corporation had to stop up the footway on that side of the street. In Nottingham also, the churches were in a similar state; the church of St. Mary's was in such a perilous state that the clergyman, after endeavouring without success to raise the funds to repair it, had to resign the living, and the church was shut up for four years. This is sufficient to show that the voluntary system has not succeeded in providing for the repair of churches. I need not remind the House that even in the matter of education, which is regarded as more worthy of support than the repair of churches, the voluntary system has proved a failure. In Manchester and Salford the attempts to provide the means of education by the voluntary system failed, and the inhabitants have had ultimately to strike a rate for the purpose. So much more then must it fail to provide for the repair of churches; so much more will a rate there be necessary. Public education, it will be admitted, is much more important than the repair of churches, yet the funds for it cannot be obtained on the voluntary principle, a fortiori it will be more difficult to obtain funds for the latter object by the same system. Some hon. Members voted in favour of the Bill last year because they supposed there was a growing desire on the part of the country in favour of the abolition of church rates. The evidence before the Committee that has since then sat upon the subject shows, however, that that is far from being the case. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Wiltshire said he believed that the only thing the rural parishes desired was to be let alone. The general feeling, too, in favour of the Church has greatly improved. This is proved by the facts reported from the archdeaconry of Bristol. Of 200 parishes in that archdeaconry only eight have refused a church rate, and in the course of two years five out of the eight have retraced their steps, and repented. This proves what two of the witnesses deposed, that a better feeling is growing up in favour of the Church. Another witness to the same fact is Dr. Lushington, the Dean of the Arches; he stated that during the last seven years there had been only two cases of disputed church rates, and those cases turned on incidental circumstances not connected with the principle of the rate itself. Even Dr. Foster allows that the ill-feeling formerly excited by church rates "is very much diminishing." Let the House, moreover, look at the comparative number of the petitions presented in favour of abolition, and against it. On the previous day there were 700 petitions presented against the abolition, and in the present sitting upwards of 1,000. What have they to show on the other side? Up to the 2nd February one poor miserable petition, that must have occasioned the opposite party much trouble to get up, was the only one presented, and only four since then, up to yesterday, have been obtained. I was glad also to see that so many Members on the other side of the House have had to present so many petitions against the abolition of the rate, although their propensity inclined the other way. Therefore one inducement to vote for abolition has been removed by the evidence which we now possess. Some, again, may have voted thus in the hope of restoring peace; which the evidence of all parties shows to be a most vain and delusive expectation. I might, perhaps, assume that some few Members voted for this Bill last year from hostility to the Church, but let these Members remember that the same party anxiously wish to do away with all grants to all religious denominations, with the Regium Donum, and the grant to Maynooth, and seek to secularize the property of the Scotch Presbyterian Church. Evil results have followed wherever a church rate has been refused: is the House prepared to extend those evil effects over the whole country? Those parishes that have already refused the rate will not thank the House for the Bill abolishing it, and the more numerous parishes that wish still to rate themselves will not thankfully receive such a prohibition and restraint at your hands. Lastly, I ask you who should rather be

They did not acknowledge its sacred character. Again, what would be the effect of the present measure upon the English clergy? Their anxieties and responsibilities, which were already very heavy, would be enormously increased; and a body of men, who were remarkable for their ability and their zeal in the discharge of their duties, would be placed in a position of great embarrassment and difficulty by the adoption of the principle now contended for, and by throwing on them the additional labour requisite to raise funds for the support of their churches. But beyond and above all these reasons there was one argument connected with the church-rate question, which struck him with peculiar force. This Spoliation Bill would be carried, if carried it was to be, by political pressure, not by force of argument. During the agitation of the question for the last thirty years, there was no bolder or more uncompromising opponent to the abolition of church rates than the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Lord John Russell). He regretted not seeing the noble Lord in his place to-day, to defend in person those principles with which he had heretofore identified himself. He wished to speak with all respect of that noble Lord, but he could not help thinking that the character of public men was the possession of the country. Until the last year no hon. Member of that House evinced greater earnestness, zeal, and determination in his opposition to every measure for the abolition of church rates than the noble Lord himself. What had since happened to change the noble Lord's opinions? What had changed his convictions? If he had not changed his convictions, why had he changed his vote? He (Mr. Long) was inclined to believe that it was not by the force of argument the noble Lord's convictions had changed, for they had changed not in the heyday of effervescent youth, but after many years of matured statesmanship,—but his conversion had been effected rather by a certain political pressure that had been put upon him. To anything like political pressure he (Mr. Long) had no answer to give but one of a firm, resolute, though temperate resistance, and a determination never to cease the expression of his convictions whilst he had a voice capable of uttering them. Such pressure, however, sometimes extorted votes; and after the many speeches they had heard made by the noble Lord from week to week and

from year to year upon this subject—after the able statesmanship he had displayed in that House as the leader of the Liberal party, he (Mr. Long) was unwilling to believe that the convictions of the noble Lord were in favour of the passing of this measure at the present moment; and, therefore, if the noble Lord should vote in favour of the abolition of church rates, that vote, he feared, would be given contrary to his convictions. "Oh." He was simply expressing his own opinions upon the subject. He deplored the continuance of the agitation on this question; but would concession on the part of the Conservatives settle it? He believed not. Because he believed this Bill calculated to excite ill-feeling and acrimony, instead of salving sores and creating peace; because he believed it to be anything but a moderate Bill; because he believed it would, if passed, leave a sense of deep injustice rankling in the minds of the clergy and laity of the Church of England; because he believed it would, if carried in this House and thrown out in the House of Lords, generate differences between the two branches of the Legislature at a time when it was essential that those bodies should be in harmony; because he believed it would not be satisfactory to Dissenters any more than to Churchmen; and because he considered it would be a most dangerous precedent to concede to pressure that which could not be got by argument and fair logic, he had great pleasure in seconding the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Huntingdonshire, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question, to add the words "upon this day six months."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: The noble Lord who moved the Amendment laid before the House a full statement of the arguments which it appeared to him it was desirable to submit to our notice before we arrived at a decision on the subject under discussion. He was followed by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and who has spoken in a manner, on this, the first occasion on which he has addressed the House, which unquestionably creates such a presumption as to his knowledge and ability as to induce us to wish that he would on future occasions seize the opportunity of delivering his opinions on some of those various subjects which await our decision. There was, however, in the

speech of the hon. Gentleman one passage of which I feel bound to take notice, and the tone and substance of which I trust he will in any subsequent speech which he may make not deem it expedient to imitate. He thought fit to state to the House that my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs had, in the case of the last vote which he gave with respect to church rates, acted in opposition to the sincere convictions which he entertained on that subject. Now, if the hon. Gentleman had been in the House when the debate to which this charge refers took place, he would recollect that my noble Friend stated at length his views upon this question; that he gave the reasons for that change with respect to it which his opinions had undergone; that those were weighty, although they may not be considered by hon. Gentlemen opposite conclusive reasons, and that there was, therefore, not the slightest ground for that imputation of insincerity which has to-day been made. The hon. Gentleman would do well also to bear in mind that hon. Members on both sides of the House have modified their opinions on many questions of much greater importance and magnitude than that which we are now discussing, without, in consequence, being held to be open to any such imputation of insincerity; and I trust, therefore, he will not, after he has had a more extended experience of our proceedings, seek to obtain an undue advantage for his own opinions by making unfounded charges against those from whom he happens to differ. Having now, as I hope, shown the House that the hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken in the view which he takes of the vote of my noble Friend, I shall proceed briefly to state the reasons why I mean to support the second reading of the Bill under consideration. I may, then, in the first place observe, that I have never been one of those who entertain extreme opinions on the question with which the Bill proposes to deal. I do not regard the maintenance of church rates in any form as necessarily an infringement of religious liberty; while, on the other hand, I am unable to agree with the great majority of hon. Gentlemen opposite in the belief that if church rates were abolished the fabrics of the Church of England would, as the result, fall into decay. I am afraid, therefore, that the opinions to which I am about to give expression are not likely to find favour with any large number of the Members of this

House. The views, however, which I on former occasions enunciated I still retain upon this subject, although I confess I have lost my faith in the probability of any reasonable compromise being effected, by which a satisfactory settlement of the question could be attained. I have therefore come—reluctantly, I must admit—to the conclusion that the best course to pursue is to vote for the second reading of the Bill which the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock has introduced. Now, one of the arguments which was urged by the noble Lord who moved the Amendment against the proposal which the Bill involves was, that in certain parishes in the town of Birmingham where no church rates were levied the fabric of the church had as a consequence fallen into decay, and the noble Lord having mentioned that fact, contended that if such was the state of things in a town such as Birmingham, there was a fortiori reason to suppose matters would assume a still worse aspect in the case of rural parishes. It seems to me, however, that that argument admits of being inverted, if we only for a moment take into account what the real position is of those churches which are situated in towns. The support of the Church of England may be said to be founded on a system of tithes; but that system entirely fails in towns, inasmuch as tithes are paid out of the annual increment of the land. But in those instances in which the land is covered with houses there can be no fund out of which tithes would be payable, and the church under those circumstances relies upon voluntary contributions. There are pew-rents and Easter offerings, and christening, marriage, and burial fees, and I may perhaps take this opportunity of saying that I had recently occasion to regret, in connection with those fees, that in the parishes in London, owing to the prohibition of intramural interments, that source of support is cut off. But, as I was observing, the church, under the circumstances to which I allude, has to be maintained by voluntary contributions, consisting of pew-rents, or other offerings, and it is therefore manifest that there is greater difficulty in collecting subscriptions for the maintenance of the church in towns than in ordinary rural parishes, where the incumbent receives a stipend adequate to his support out of the tithes of his parish, and all that is required in addition is a small sum to keep up the fabric of the church, and to make provision for a services. I cannot under those circumstances, but believe that in the event of church rates being abolished, greater facilities would be found to exist in the majority of rural parishes for procuring at small sum, over and above the larger sum which is required for the maintenance of the clergyman, than could be secured in the poorer class of parishes in towns. Now, dealing with this subject of church rates, cannot refrain from suggesting to the House that it is one which has frequently been discussed with more of sentiment than of reason and solid argument. There has been a great deal of sentiment, for instance, indulged in with reference to the imaginary grievances of Dissenters; but there is also a certain degree of spurious sentiment pervading the views of those who contend that the Church of England is the church of the poor. It is said that if we abolish church rates there will be no free seats for the humbler classes; but now is it that under the existing law free seats are provided for them? Simply by the fact that those who are not poor pay church rates. If, however, an adequate sum for the repair of the church and the maintenance of its services were provided by means of pew-rents, even in rural as well as in the town parishes, the difficulty with which we are now dealing would be at an end. Money would be collected from those who are able to pay pew-rents, and the poor might be provided with free seats, as under the existing system. I am of course aware that there are at present prevalent strong objections to pew-rents; but now, I would ask, can a line be more effectually drawn between Dissenters, whose conscientious scruples we are anxious to respect, and those by whom the church is practically used—in other words, the members of the congregation—than by simply imposing on a portion of the pews a moderate rent? For my own part, I must confess that I see nothing in pew-rents which is at all opposed to the sanctity with which a place of religious worship ought to be surrounded. One of the reasons why they are objected to arises from the feeling that they are in some way connected with dissent; but what, I may ask, is a church rate, but a pew-rent under another name? The only difference between them, practically speaking, is that a church rate is a charge imposed on the inhabitants of a parish, for the most part in respect of their abitations, while, in the case of pew-rents, the churchwarden of a parish simply assigns a pew to the occupiers of each house, as far as the accommodation in the church will allow. I therefore cannot understand the justice of the objection which many persons entertain to resorting to pew-rents for the maintenance of the fabric of the church. If, then, a system were introduced in accordance with which it would be competent for the incumbent of a parish or the Bishop, on the abolition of church rates, to impose on a certain portion of the pews in rural churches a moderate rent, I apprehend an equivalent would be found for the sum—I believe it amounts to £250,000—which is at present raised by means of church rates. The hon. Gentleman who seconded the Amendment, however, contends that we ought not to abolish a tax of this nature without giving compensation; but I do not think he was happy in selecting the case of the practitioners in the Palace Court, or that of the proprietors of slaves in the West Indies, to whom compensation was, in consequence of the passing of measures affecting their interests, accorded, as furnishing an illustration of the justice of the view which he submitted to the House. I would, in dealing with this point, venture to point out to the hon. Gentleman that the principle upon which compensation is granted by Parliament in such cases rests upon the foundation of property. When, therefore, two Sessions ago, we went so far as to grant compensation to the proctors who practised in the Ecclesiastical Courts, we proceeded upon the assumption that they possessed a vested interest in their professional pursuits which it was but reasonable to take into account when those courts were abolished. In the present instance I am at a loss to point to any class of persons who can be said to have a vested interest, and I cannot admit that there is any ground for applying the doctrine of compensation to church rates. What I should wish to provide is, not compensation to any class of persons, but a substitute for the impost to be abolished, some payment which would discharge the same function as is discharged by church rates—at once certain in its collection and just in its incidence. That problem is, I think, solved by reference to pew-rents, and therefore I do not see that the objections to the second reading of this Bill have any force whatever. I have thus indicated, so far as I am able, the views I have formed on this subject. Notwithstanding the supposed light shed upon the subject by the

Report of the Committee of the House of Lords, hon. Gentlemen opposite have no proposition to oppose to the second reading of this Bill; I shall therefore deem it my duty to support the original Motion.

Mr. KER SEYMER said, he was not going to discuss the question of church rates. All that could be said on the general subject had been already said by others better than he could pretend to say it, but he wished to draw the attention of the House to the present position of the church-rate Question, and the steps by which it had reached that position, and he must say the friends of the Church had great reason to complain that noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen who had been in office, with a very short interval, since Sir Robert Peel's Government had left the question of church rates in the hands of independent Members pledged to their total and unconditional abolition. If he had to speak of noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen in their absence it was not his fault. He did not complain of the absence of Ministers on a Wednesday, but he did complain of their leaving questions of vital importance to private Members which thus came to be discussed during the absence of Ministers at a Wednesday morning sitting. Considering the importance of this Question—for, thank God, in spite of Mr. Morley and Mr. Miall, the Church was still a great institution of the country—considering the position of the Question ever since the decision of the House of Lords in the Baintree case, they had a right to complain of the course which had been taken by right hon. Gentlemen opposite in 1856. The predecessor of the hon. Baronet, Sir William Clay, brought forward his usual Motion for the abolition of church rates, and they were all very anxious to know what course would be pursued by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Morpeth, then Home Secretary (Sir George Grey) on that occasion. He voted for the second reading of the Bill for the total abolition of church rates, all though prepared, disposed, and determined to maintain church rates in some 9,000 or 10,000 parishes. A vote more inconsistent with the principles on which they considered the second reading of Bills never was given; and when the present Home Secretary said he would vote for this Bill, because no compromise had been provided, he would ask why did not right hon. Gentlemen opposite propose a compromise? After the decision of the House on that occasion, he got up and asked the Home

Secretary if the Government would take up the Bill. The right hon. Baronet said it remained in private hands, but they would endeavour to give it facilities. Those facilities never were available, and the Bill did not come on during that Session for further discussion. That course was most unfair and unjust to the Church of England, as well as inconsistent with the usual Parliamentary practice. On this subject he would quote the words used by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London (Lord John Russell), who took part in that debate, and said—

“With respect to the proposal which my right hon. Friend the right hon. Baronet (Sir George Grey) has made on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, he has chosen the inconvenient course, as I think, of not bringing into this House a measure founded upon the principles he has indicated, but, while proposing to sanction by his vote and by the votes of his colleagues a Bill framed in a very different spirit, he holds out the hope that he will be able to introduce in Committee, not some simple alterations merely, but material and somewhat complicated provisions.” [3 Hansard, cxi., 1913.] It was but just to the right hon. Baronet to say that he had endeavoured afterwards to retrace his steps, and on a subsequent occasion he voted in favour of church rates; but, having once led his friends into the wrong lobby, he could not get them out again. He went into that lobby accompanied by his right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Sir W. Hayter); the huntmen and whipper-in were together, but the whole pack were running riot. The hon. Member who seconded the Motion spoke of the increasing majorities in favour of the abolition of church rates; but these were to be traced to the conduct of the Government. What said the Prime Minister on the occasion to which he had alluded? That noble Lord generally spoke very plainly, and he did so then. He said—and these were his own sentiments—

“The course we intend to pursue is, to recognise the existing state of things in parishes where church rates are levied, and to provide another arrangement for those parishes in which a different set of circumstances has arisen.” [3 Hansard, cxi., 1920.]

How the noble Lord, entertaining these views, could vote for a Bill proposing the total and unconditional abolition of church rates he had never been able to understand. In 1857 the noble Lord intimated his intention to deal with the question in a manner to please everybody. That was most gratifying to hear, and the hon. Baronet had been induced to proceed no further but no further proceeded the noble Lord. Then came the following Session, when

donshire, who, in his opening speech last Session, gave indication of the talent and ability which he would bring to the consideration of any subject; and, at the same time, he felt sorry that he should be about to renew an opposition which it was impossible could be ultimately successful, and with regard to which he had manifested his unwillingness to accept a compromise. He had only further to say, he most cordially seconded the Motion of the hon. Baronet.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said: The Question has been so frequently debated and all which could be said on both sides has been already heard so often, that I shall to-day not ask the House to give me their attention for many minutes. All those arguments which have long since become trite and worn out need not again be repeated. I shall therefore decline to follow in the course which the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock (Sir J. Trevelwney) has marked out. He has employed arguments which the House must almost know by heart, as well as the answers which have so often refuted the same arguments which he now recalls. He has drawn bills on a bank which was completely broken last August; and therefore he cannot blame me for not answering them. He has spent nearly a quarter of an hour in considering whether church rates are or are not a charge upon land, a point with reference to which I remember to have read page after page last year in Hansard. The hon. Baronet likewise referred to the fact that payments from these rates had sometimes been made to persons for killing sparrows. Had he consulted the same authority he would have found that every parish had a right to rate itself for any object which it might consider beneficial to its interests. Doubtless the hon. Member for Shrewsbury will not attach any weight to such an argument against church rates, when he is introducing a Bill to enable parishes to do this very thing which the hon. Baronet is finding fault with. But I am desirous of laying before the House the evidence which was adduced last Session on the subject of church rates and published in August; and more particularly do I wish to do this, because I find that very few hon. Members are as yet acquainted with it. But it contains facts of the highest importance. The evidence will speak for itself. And it would be seen from it that this question has entered on an entirely new phase, and presented itself under quite a novel aspect. The hon. Member for Tavistock does not appear to be aware of this; he seems to have looked at this evidence from the old point of view; for he has told the House that they were dealing with a religious question. I hope to show that it is by no means a religious, but merely a political question. The hon. Member represented a great authority in the Upper House (the Earl of Derby) as having said at one time that the payment of church rates was a great grievance to Dissenters. So Lord Derby and every one else doubtless thought as long as they were under that erroneous impression which has now been removed. For the most direct evidence would be found in this book that Dissenters do not consider it a grievance; but merely wish to enforce a theory of government. He has likewise said that this is not a question affecting the poor; but even Mr. Morley, one of the chief agitators for the abolition of these rates, admitted that seats are not provided for the poor in Dissenting chapels; and Dr. Foster, the Chairman of the Liberation Committee, said that in those chapels the occupiers of seats are compelled to pay for them. Another witness stated that of the different sects the Established Church alone maintained a missionary character. Dissenting ministers visited those who attended their places of worship and who rented their seats, but the ministers of the Church of England, not content with visiting those who were attendants at church, went among the irreligious poor, of whom there were an enormous number in England, and laboured to bring the Gospel to their hearths and homes. That this is a question affecting the poor is still more strongly shown by the fact, proved over and over again in the Report, that Dissenting chapels spring up, not in humble, but in rich localities; and instances have occurred—as at Liverpool, where, when the neighbourhood became poor, the Dissenting chapels were shut up and sold. A clergyman in Nottingham bought two or three of them for the purposes of his schools. The hon. Baronet referred to the agitation which had taken place at Edinburgh respecting the annuity tax, and, possibly to strike terror into the House, he insinuated that some such excitement would overspread the land if church rates were not speedily abolished. But if he had read the evidence of Mr. Morley, Dr. Foster, and all the witnesses on that side, he would have seen that it is their intention, when the Church-rates Abolition Bill has passed, to continue their agitation as strenuously as ever. Did the House ever know an agitation which grew milder from victory, or which lessened its exertions when stimulated by success? And the Gentlemen to whom I refer have admitted that their views go much further than the mere abolition of church rates. The hon. Baronet has compared the relative number of Dissenters and Churchmen; but from whence he procured his figures I am unable to divine. [Sir JOHN TRELAWNY: From the Census returns.] Well, I have, fortunately, happened to bring with me some which I procured from a later document. Besides, the hon. Baronet unwittingly committed himself to a fallacy in comparing the number of Dissenters with Churchmen; for more than half the Dissenters were in favour of church rates. The fairer way is to compare the number of the opponents of that rate with the number of those who are favourable to its continuance. There are six sects of Baptists, numbering $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the general population, the Independents numbering $7\frac{1}{4}$ per cent, and the Jews, Mormons, and other sects, amounting to $6\frac{3}{4}$ per cent additional, raising the total proportion of those who are opposed to church rates to $16\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Those who are not opposed to church rates are—Roman Catholics $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and seven sects of Wesleyans numbering 13 per cent, making in all a similar proportion of $16\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The church-going members of the Church of England are 42 per cent, and the irreligious poor, whom, likewise, I feel myself entitled to count, are in the ratio of 25 per cent. [Laughter and Opposition cheers.] Yes, these are the poor who are never taught by the Dissenters, and never visited by Dissenters, but are left to the Church of England, whose ministers do visit and read to them, and send Bible-readers among them, and strive to bring the Gospel home to them, both in season and out of season. This calculation then shows a balance of 67 per cent in favour of the maintenance of church rates. The hon. Baronet has alluded to his own borough, where, though every man might be king in his own castle, I greatly fear the hon. Gentleman is not quite supreme. If, as was alleged, the inhabitants were unanimous in their opposition to church rates, how came it that a petition from Tavistock against the abolition of church rates had been laid on the table the previous day, which was not presented by the hon. Baronet himself? The hon. Baronet the Member for Banbury (Sir C. Douglas) had correctly quoted the evidence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt), but had scarcely laid the emphasis on the right word; the quotation runs thus: "whether it be true, or only assumed, at all events the objection which is stated has assumed a question of religious toleration." Moreover in counting up the relative numbers in the divisions on this subject, he has prudently omitted all mention of last year's division, in which there was no increase of the majority previously obtained, and which I hope the division on this day will still further reduce. This House, as the hon. Baronet has said, has, it is true, pronounced in favour of abolition; but then they have done so under a wrong impression. The House was formerly led away by the belief that this was a question of conscience, and by the desire to show consideration to honest objections of this nature; but now, on the contrary, we learn from the evidence of nearly all the witnesses examined last Session that the conscientious objections of Dissenters have nothing to do with the matter, that very few Dissenters have conscientious objections to the payment of church rates; that the majority of Dissenters are not against church rates, but are generally disposed to support the Church, because they feel the necessity of some establishment for the maintenance of religion. Dr. Hume stated that he never met with a Dissenter who objected to the payment of church rates, when the subject was properly explained to him; but, on the contrary, that he had often read able arguments by Dissenters to prove that these rates were right and proper. Mr. Osborne, a Methodist, declared that the Wesleyans do not desire to be absolved from these payments, but, on the contrary, look on the Established Church as an incalculable blessing; and Mr. Gladding, an Independent, testified that it is only some few Dissenters who desire to separate the Church from the State; and that the conscientious objection to church rates is not entertained at all as extensively as is commonly supposed. Three other witnesses, one of whom, Archdeacon Sanford, had been brought up as a Nonconformist, concurred in declaring that the objections were confined to a small class of

Dissenters, and that the opposition was principally based on political grounds. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt) deposed that for the last fifteen years this question had been merely a source of political capital. And Dr. Foster, a prime agitator in the matter, gave evidence which, in fact, amounts to the same; he said (and the hon. Baronet opposite has said the same thing) for he admitted that the doctrines held by 19-20ths of the Dissenters are identical with those of the Church of England—so that the opposition cannot arise out of their belief; or, in other words, it is not conscientious. This point was truthfully and clearly put by one of the witnesses when asked to explain the objections which were entertained to church rates. He was then asked:—

“Do you believe that any strong conscientious objection exists on the part of Dissenters against contributing to a church rate?—I really do not think that it is the Dissenters so much as persons who are of no religion, who do not go to any place of worship, and who object to every rate or tax of every kind; and this is the only one as to which they have any opportunity of exhibiting their opposition or their bad feeling. The poor rate is made without their consent; the health of towns and the highway rates are made without their consent; and the county rate for the police is made without their consent; and this being the only opportunity they have for opposition, all their bad feeling about rates in general comes out upon the church rate.

Opposition, therefore, it is evident, arises not from conscientious objections but from political aims, or, I may be pardoned for saying, from factious agitation. The church-rates question, as I will now show, is merely put forward as a sort of stalking-horse by certain parties who desire in reality the severance of the Church from the State. This is the real point which is aimed at; so great is the extent of the designs which they entertain. According to Archdeacon Sanford, the abolition of church rates is merely the first step towards the entire abolition of the Established Church, which the Dissenters wish to pull down and reduce to the level of the sects. To the level of the sects? The ministers of every sect can have a seat in this House, and I believe certain ministers of Dissenting bodies are at that moment included in the assembly. But ministers of the Established Church are precluded from sitting in this House. If, therefore, the Church is to be reduced to the level of the sects, let it be at liberty to send its ministers likewise to this House; let the antagonists

meet on equal terms; and I venture to say that such an array of talent, such a weight of influence, and such a mass of intelligence would be thus brought to bear as would utterly overwhelm all the opposition which could be mustered against it. Now I must refer the House to the evidence of Mr. Morley, a member of the Liberation Committee, who has been most active in promoting the agitation against church rates. He stated candidly in his evidence before the Committee that their opposition is directed not merely against church rates, but against every connection between religion and the State, and that it was on this ground that the Dissenters objected to accept of any exemption in their own favour. He added, in reply to a further question, that “This opposition was not consequent upon any injury which was done to Dissenters by a payment which they are called upon to make, but arose from their wish to assert a principle which they believed to be a true principle in the theory of government.” He wishes, in fact, to dictate the true principles of legislation. And here, indeed, is the root of the whole matter; this is the underlying principle which causes all the difference in detail—it is a different theory of Government which they sought to force upon the House. In this notion they differed, not only from all the great statesmen of modern days, but from the political philosophers of former times; they do not even rise as high as the theory of the Chinese philosopher: namely, that it is, or it ought to be, the aim of Governments to seek the good of the nations which they govern; but the church-rate abolitionists differ not only from this belief, but from the principle which is almost the only one that pervades the writings of the present Emperor Napoleon—namely, that it is the duty of the Government to be foremost in leading the nation to those ideas which the Government believes to be true and for their good, even though the nation at the time reject them. Assuredly, if the Government were to seek the good of the nation, its first duty would be to maintain the established religion. But according to Mr. Morley, all that is required at the hands of the Government is to insure the security of person and property; he believes that Government is, in fact, nothing but a policeman. What may be his idea of the present Government I do not know; whether he believes that it is their duty to seek the good of the nation—or whether he regards all the occupants of the Treasury Bench as amounting but to one policeman, in the same way that nine tailors are supposed to make one man. And this is the only ground which those can consistently take who oppose church rates on any principle, and desire to overthrow the Established Church; while, on the other hand, all who believe that the office of Government is to seek the good of the governed, must hold it the chief duty of Government to support the Established Church. But even this security, which Mr. Morley desires, is, after all, only to be one-sided; for, that he desires the Government to take away the property of the Church is apparent by the following evidence:—

“You spoke of certain ultimate objects; do you suppose that the efforts which are now making are with the direct view of ultimately bringing about these objects?—I dare say the phrase has met your Lordship, ‘The separation of Church and State;’ I believe that that is an object which numbers of earnest men have set before themselves; and I venture to say, I would take the liberty to repeat it.”

So that, although in his opinion the proper end of Government is to secure property, the first thing which he wishes to accomplish is to take away from the Church the property which she possesses, and to transfer it to the State, to be employed in general purposes. Dr. Foster avowed himself to be the Chairman of the Liberation Society the objects of which are “to separate the Church from the State, to take away all funds and property with which the State had endowed any denomination whatever;” on this ground it objected also to the payment of tithes, and had taken an active part in the anti-church-rate agitation. It has been proved, then, in this blue-book that the church-rate agitation is merely political; and we are also shown the real extent of the designs of the agitators. You know, now, what we are required to give up. What, then, are we to receive in return? Rest and immunity from further vexation? When the Bill has passed, will the agitation be laid to rest? or will its supporters by that victory be rendered only more anxious to achieve their other objects? Mr. Morley, in his evidence, gives a direct answer to this question:—“I believe,” he says, “that the concession of the question of church rates would not satisfy the ultimate expectations—or, I would say, the requirements of Dissenters.” Dr. Foster admitted that if the question of church rates were settled to-morrow there were “ulterior objects which he should also wish to see accomplished.” He was further asked by the Committee, whether it was his opinion that the settlement of this question would tend to produce peace between the Established Church and the members of the Dissenting body; and he replied that such a settlement “could not be regarded as disposing of all the questions in which they had an interest, and that, so long as the Established Church existed, the same differences would, in his opinion, continue to prevail.” It is therefore quite hopeless to look for peace by a settlement of this question. Mr. Morley declared that the “existing organizations would continue as long as any connection is maintained between legislation and Religion,” and hinted that an influence was exercised by these organizations which hon. Members understand very well who have been led to vote in favour of the Bill. The Liberation Society, Mr. Morley stated, had correspondents in every constituency, and received the co-operation of earnest, thoughtful men in every moderately large-sized town; “and there is,” he says, “a course of action which candidates understand perfectly well, and which is found to be operative on this particular question.” It was also stated by Dr. Foster that the society had appointed a Committee solely for the purpose of influencing elections. Now I ask the House whether it is right to give way to such a system of agitation? and whether doing so would not encourage a new and dangerous principle in the State? In Sir John Stephen’s Anti-Slavery Recollections we might see a good instance of the unconstitutional power which may be exercised by only two members of a society organized for ostensibly religious purposes; it shows the kind of agitation which is carried on behind the scenes, and the way in which a few active and unscrupulous men may overbear the Parliament of the nation. I have said enough to show that this agitation for the abolition of church rates is merely a political movement, and that the ultimate aim of that movement is the destruction of the Church Establishment; I have shown, too, how hopeless it is to expect that the question would be set at rest by passing the present Bill. I have not time to go through all the copious evidence of the evil effects that have resulted in all parishes in which church rates has been discontinued. In many cases, the fabric of the churches has gone to decay for want of funds to repair them. "The state of the churches in Birmingham," according to one witness, "is conclusive against the voluntary system, for in that town the clergy were so active and zealous that if any of the body could succeed in obtaining the requisite funds, it would be the clergy of Birmingham." The church of St. Philip's abutted on a street; it was allowed to fall into such a state of disrepair that life was endangered by the risk of the fall of the church. The Corporation sent to the churchwardens a statement of the fact, with a view to that repair of the church. The churchwardens in their reply stated that they had no funds. The consequence was that the Corporation had to stop up the footway on that side of the street. In Nottingham also, the churches were in a similar state; the church of St. Mary's was in such a perilous state that the clergyman, after endeavouring without success to raise the funds to repair it, had to resign the living, and the church was shut up for four years. This is sufficient to show that the voluntary system has not succeeded in providing for the repair of churches. I need not remind the House that even in the matter of education, which is regarded as more worthy of support than the repair of churches, the voluntary system has proved a failure. In Manchester and Salford the attempts to provide the means of education by the voluntary system failed, and the inhabitants have had ultimately to strike a rate for the purpose. So much more then must it fail to provide for the repair of churches; so much more will a rate there be necessary. Public education, it will be admitted, is much more important than the repair of churches, yet the funds for it cannot be obtained on the voluntary principle, a fortiori it will be more difficult to obtain funds for the latter object by the same system. Some hon. Members voted in favour of the Bill last year because they supposed ported from the archdeaconry of Bristol. Of 200 parishes in that archdeaconry only eight have refused a church rate, and in the course of two years five out of the eight have retraced their steps, and repented. This proves what two of the witnesses deposed, that a better feeling is growing up in favour of the Church. Another witness to the same fact is Dr. Lushington, the Dean of the Arches; he stated that during the last seven years there had been only two cases of disputed church rates, and those cases turned on incidental circumstances not connected with the principle of the rate itself. Even Dr. Foster allows that the ill-feeling formerly excited by church rates "is very much diminishing." Let the House, moreover, look at the comparative number of the petitions presented in favour of abolition, and against it. On the previous day there were 700 petitions presented against the abolition, and in the present sitting upwards of 1,000. What have they to show on the other side? Up to the 2nd February one poor miserable petition, that must have occasioned the opposite party much trouble to get up, was the only one presented, and only four since then, up to yesterday, have been obtained. I was glad also to see that so many Members on the other side of the House have had to present so many petitions against the abolition of the rate, although their propensity inclined the other way. Therefore one inducement to vote for abolition has been removed by the evidence which we now possess. Some, again, may have voted thus in the hope of restoring peace; which the evidence of all parties shows to be a most vain and delusive expectation. I might, perhaps, assume that some few Members voted for this Bill last year from hostility to the Church, but let these Members remember that the same party anxiously wish to do away with all grants to all religious denominations, with the Regium Donum, and the grant to Maynooth, and seek to secularize the property of the Scotch Presbyterian Church. Evil results have followed wherever a church rate has been refused: is the House prepared to extend those evil effects over the whole country? Those parishes that have already refused the rate will not thank the House for the Bill abolishing it, and the more numerous parishes that wish still to rate themselves will not thankfully receive such a prohibition and restraint at your hands. Lastly, I ask you who should rather be believed and followed,—those who arrogate the tone of Morley and Foster; or those who say with Gladding, the Independent, that “the present state of the law is satisfactory as well in towns as in the rural parishes.” In conclusion, I beg to move the Amendment of which I have given notice, that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

MR. RICHARD LONG, on rising to second the Amendment of the noble Lord, said it was the first time he had taken the liberty of trespassing upon their attention, and he felt all the difficulty of addressing an assembly so fastidiously critical as the House of Commons. The task would be difficult enough under any circumstances, but it was especially difficult when he had to follow the noble Lord (Lord R. Montagu) over ground so well trodden, and on a question that had been so often discussed. Yet he could not but feel obliged to the noble Lord for the able speech, a speech marked by so much moderation and sound judgment, in which he had moved his Amendment, though he should himself suffer from the disadvantage of having to follow it. The Motion being one for abolition, pure and simple, he should not stay to discuss any of those measures which had been put forward as modes of compromising the question by hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House, but which proved clearly that they were not indifferent to conscientious scruples, nor unwilling to show sympathy for the objections of Nonconformists even though they might deny that such objections were rightly founded. Since the question was last discussed, a Committee had been appointed in “another place” to inquire into this question; it had published the evidence, which he believed had been widely circulated. That report showed clearly what were the real objects of the opposition to church rates. Another and not the least important result of that Committee had been a reaction throughout England and Wales in the minds of independent Churchmen; they were resolved no longer to leave this question “cast upon the waters,” to find friends as it might; they were determined to give this unjust and iniquitous measure every constitutional and legal opposition in their power. The consequence was that in the last week of January alone there were 33 petitions, signed by 700 persons, against the abolition of church rates presented to that House. There were 332 petitions, signed by 7700 persons, against the abolition of church rates without an equivalent, and 99 petitions, with 3,500 signatures, against the particular Bill of the hon. Member for Tavistock, and he believed that the division would show signs of the reaction he referred to. Now what were the objects of the Bill before the House? The Bill proposed to abolish, without providing any substitute, equivalent, or compensation, the fund that had been raised in England for the maintenance of its churches for four or five centuries. The House did not abolish the Ecclesiastical Courts, it did not abolish the most petty office, without giving a compensation to every officer, and recognizing their vested interests. The House of Commons was, however, now asked to consent to the confiscation of nearly £300,000 a year, which sum, if capitalized, as Sir John Coleridge very properly observed the other day, would amount to something like £9,000,000. When Parliament abolished the slave trade, they thought it only just to pay the slave owners £20,000,000. Even when they thought it necessary to abolish some fiscal impost, a drawback was generally allowed to those who would be otherwise pecuniary sufferers by their commercial transactions. Where, then, was the justice or the policy of the measure before the House? He repeated, he believed the opinion of the public had very materially changed since the publication of the evidence given before the Committee of the House of Lords. He particularly referred to the evidence of Dr. Hume, of Liverpool, the Rev. J. C. Miller, of Birmingham, the Rev. R. C. Savage, and the Rev. G. Osborn. The blue-book contained evidence much more important than he could offer, or than had been offered by the hon. Baronet (Sir J. Trelawny), the mover of the Bill. The evidence proved that the abolition of church rates would almost entirely destroy the means of supporting the fabrics of the churches in large towns; he could not help asking what would be the result of this among large masses of the population? It was asserted that the abolition of church rates was required on the principle of religious liberty. But he put this question to conscientious Dissenters—were they, on the same ground, prepared to abolish the compulsory observance of the Sunday by the Jews? (“Oh! oh!”) Let them consider the question; what right had they to demand the abolition of church rates on the principle of religious liberty, and yet to prohibit the Jews from employing the Christian Sunday as they pleased?

They did not acknowledge its sacred character. Again, what would be the effect of the present measure upon the English clergy? Their anxieties and responsibilities, which were already very heavy, would be enormously increased; and a body of men, who were remarkable for their ability and their zeal in the discharge of their duties, would be placed in a position of great embarrassment and difficulty by the adoption of the principle now contended for, and by throwing on them the additional labour requisite to raise funds for the support of their churches. But beyond and above all these reasons there was one argument connected with the church-rate question, which struck him with peculiar force. This Spoliation Bill would be carried, if carried it was to be, by political pressure, not by force of argument. During the agitation of the question for the last thirty years, there was no bolder or more uncompromising opponent to the abolition of church rates than the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Lord John Russell). He regretted not seeing the noble Lord in his place to-day, to defend in person those principles with which he had heretofore identified himself. He wished to speak with all respect of that noble Lord, but he could not help thinking that the character of public men was the possession of the country. Until the last year no hon. Member of that House evinced greater earnestness, zeal, and determination in his opposition to every measure for the abolition of church rates than the noble Lord himself. What had since happened to change the noble Lord's opinions? What had changed his convictions? If he had not changed his convictions, why had he changed his vote? He (Mr. Long) was inclined to believe that it was not by the force of argument the noble Lord's convictions had changed, for they had changed not in the heyday of effervescent youth, but after many years of matured statesmanship,—but his conversion had been effected rather by a certain political pressure that had been put upon him. To anything like political pressure he (Mr. Long) had no answer to give but one of a firm, resolute, though temperate resistance, and a determination never to cease the expression of his convictions whilst he had a voice capable of uttering them. Such pressure, however, sometimes extorted votes; and after the many speeches they had heard made by the noble Lord from week to week and

from year to year upon this subject—after the able statesmanship he had displayed in that House as the leader of the Liberal party, he (Mr. Long) was unwilling to believe that the convictions of the noble Lord were in favour of the passing of this measure at the present moment; and, therefore, if the noble Lord should vote in favour of the abolition of church rates, that vote, he feared, would be given contrary to his convictions. “Oh.” He was simply expressing his own opinions upon the subject. He deplored the continuance of the agitation on this question; but would concession on the part of the Conservatives settle it? He believed not. Because he believed this Bill calculated to excite ill-feeling and acrimony, instead of salving sores and creating peace; because he believed it to be anything but a moderate Bill; because he believed it would, if passed, leave a sense of deep injustice rankling in the minds of the clergy and laity of the Church of England; because he believed it would, if carried in this House and thrown out in the House of Lords, generate differences between the two branches of the Legislature at a time when it was essential that those bodies should be in harmony; because he believed it would not be satisfactory to Dissenters any more than to Churchmen; and because he considered it would be a most dangerous precedent to concede to pressure that which could not be got by argument and fair logic, he had great pleasure in seconding the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Huntingdonshire, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question, to add the words “upon this day six months.”

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: The noble Lord who moved the Amendment laid before the House a full statement of the arguments which it appeared to him it was desirable to submit to our notice before we arrived at a decision on the subject under discussion. He was followed by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and who has spoken in a manner, on this, the first occasion on which he has addressed the House, which unquestionably creates such a presumption as to his knowledge and ability as to induce us to wish that he would on future occasions seize the opportunity of delivering his opinions on some of those various subjects which await our decision. There was, however, in the speech of the hon. Gentleman one passage of which I feel bound to take notice, and the tone and substance of which I trust he will in any subsequent speech which he may make not deem it expedient to imitate. He thought fit to state to the House that my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs had, in the case of the last vote which he gave with respect to church rates, acted in opposition to the sincere convictions which he entertained on that subject. Now, if the hon. Gentleman had been in the House when the debate to which this charge refers took place, he would recollect that my noble Friend stated at length his views upon this question; that he gave the reasons for that change with respect to it which his opinions had undergone; that those were weighty, although they may not be considered by hon. Gentlemen opposite conclusive reasons, and that there was, therefore, not the slightest ground for that imputation of insincerity which has to-day been made. The hon. Gentleman would do well also to bear in mind that hon. Members on both sides of the House have modified their opinions on many questions of much greater importance and magnitude than that which we are now discussing, without, in consequence, being held to be open to any such imputation of insincerity; and I trust, therefore, he will not, after he has had a more extended experience of our proceedings, seek to obtain an undue advantage for his own opinions by making unfounded charges against those from whom he happens to differ. Having now, as I hope, shown the House that the hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken in the view which he takes of the vote of my noble Friend, I shall proceed briefly to state the reasons why I mean to support the second reading of the Bill under consideration. I may, then, in the first place observe, that I have never been one of those who entertain extreme opinions on the question with which the Bill proposes to deal. I do not regard the maintenance of church rates in any form as necessarily an infringement of religious liberty; while, on the other hand, I am unable to agree with the great majority of hon. Gentlemen opposite in the belief that if church rates were abolished the fabrics of the Church of England would, as the result, fall into decay. I am afraid, therefore, that the opinions to which I am about to give expression are not likely to find favour with any large number of the Members of this

House. The views, however, which I on former occasions enunciated I still retain upon this subject, although I confess I have lost my faith in the probability of any reasonable compromise being effected, by which a satisfactory settlement of the question could be attained. I have therefore come—reluctantly, I must admit—to the conclusion that the best course to pursue is to vote for the second reading of the Bill which the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock has introduced. Now, one of the arguments which was urged by the noble Lord who moved the Amendment against the proposal which the Bill involves was, that in certain parishes in the town of Birmingham where no church rates were levied the fabric of the church had as a consequence fallen into decay, and the noble Lord having mentioned that fact, contended that if such was the state of things in a town such as Birmingham, there was a fortiori reason to suppose matters would assume a still worse aspect in the case of rural parishes. It seems to me, however, that that argument admits of being inverted, if we only for a moment take into account what the real position is of those churches which are situated in towns. The support of the Church of England may be said to be founded on a system of tithes; but that system entirely fails in towns, inasmuch as tithes are paid out of the annual increment of the land. But in those instances in which the land is covered with houses there can be no fund out of which tithes would be payable, and the church under those circumstances relies upon voluntary contributions. There are pew-rents and Easter offerings, and christening, marriage, and burial fees, and I may perhaps take this opportunity of saying that I had recently occasion to regret, in connection with those fees, that in the parishes in London, owing to the prohibition of intramural interments, that source of support is cut off. But, as I was observing, the church, under the circumstances to which I allude, has to be maintained by voluntary contributions, consisting of pew-rents, or other offerings, and it is therefore manifest that there is greater difficulty in collecting subscriptions for the maintenance of the church in towns than in ordinary rural parishes, where the incumbent receives a stipend adequate to his support out of the tithes of his parish, and all that is required in addition is a small sum to keep up the fabric of the church, and to make provision for the services. I cannot under those circumstances, but believe that in the event of the church rates being abolished, greater facilities would be found to exist in the majority of rural parishes for procuring that small sum, over and above the larger sum which is required for the maintenance of the clergyman, than could be secured in the poorer class of parishes in towns. Now, in dealing with this subject of church rates, I cannot refrain from suggesting to the House that it is one which has frequently been discussed with more of sentiment than of reason and solid argument. There has been a great deal of sentiment, for instance, indulged in with reference to the imaginary grievances of Dissenters; but there is also a certain degree of spurious sentiment pervading the views of those who contend that the Church of England is the church of the poor. It is said that if we abolish church rates there will be no free seats for the humbler classes; but how is it that under the existing law free seats are provided for them? Simply by the fact that those who are not poor pay church rates. If, however, an adequate sum for the repair of the church and the maintenance of its services were provided by means of pew-rents, even in rural as well as in the town parishes, the difficulty with which we are now dealing would be at an end. Money would be collected from those who are able to pay pew-rents, and the poor might be provided with free seats, as under the existing system. I am of course aware that there are at present prevalent strong objections to pew-rents; but how, I would ask, can a line be more effectually drawn between Dissenters, whose conscientious scruples we are anxious to respect, and those by whom the church is practically used—in other words, the members of the congregation—than by simply imposing on a portion of the pews a moderate rent? For my own part, I must confess that I see nothing in pew-rents which is at all opposed to the sanctity with which a place of religious worship ought to be surrounded. One of the reasons why they are objected to arises from the feeling that they are in some way connected with dissent; but what, I may ask, is a church rate, but a pew-rent under another name? The only difference between them, practically speaking, is that a church rate is a charge imposed on the inhabitants of a parish, for the most part in respect of their habitations, while, in the case of pew-rents, the churchwarden of a parish simply as-

signs a pew to the occupiers of each house, as far as the accommodation in the church will allow. I therefore cannot understand the justice of the objection which many persons entertain to resorting to pew-rents for the maintenance of the fabric of the church. If, then, a system were introduced in accordance with which it would be competent for the incumbent of a parish or the Bishop, on the abolition of church rates, to impose on a certain portion of the pews in rural churches a moderate rent, I apprehend an equivalent would be found for the sum—I believe it amounts to £250,000—which is at present raised by means of church rates. The hon. Gentleman who seconded the Amendment, however, contends that we ought not to abolish a tax of this nature without giving compensation; but I do not think he was happy in selecting the case of the practitioners in the Palace Court, or that of the proprietors of slaves in the West Indies, to whom compensation was, in consequence of the passing of measures affecting their interests, accorded, as furnishing an illustration of the justice of the view which he submitted to the House. I would, in dealing with this point, venture to point out to the hon. Gentleman that the principle upon which compensation is granted by Parliament in such cases rests upon the foundation of property. When, therefore, two Sessions ago, we went so far as to grant compensation to the proctors who practised in the Ecclesiastical Courts, we proceeded upon the assumption that they possessed a vested interest in their professional pursuits which it was but reasonable to take into account when those courts were abolished. In the present instance I am at a loss to point to any class of persons who can be said to have a vested interest, and I cannot admit that there is any ground for applying the doctrine of compensation to church rates. What I should wish to provide is, not compensation to any class of persons, but a substitute for the impost to be abolished, some payment which would discharge the same function as is discharged by church rates—at once certain in its collection and just in its incidence. That problem is, I think, solved by reference to pew-rents, and therefore I do not see that the objections to the second reading of this Bill have any force whatever. I have thus indicated, so far as I am able, the views I have formed on this subject. Notwithstanding the supposed light shed upon the subject by the Report of the Committee of the House of Lords, hon. Gentlemen opposite have no proposition to oppose to the second reading of this Bill; I shall therefore deem it my duty to support the original Motion.

MR. KER SEYMER said, he was not going to discuss the question of church rates. All that could be said on the general subject had been already said by others better than he could pretend to say it, but he wished to draw the attention of the House to the present position of the church-rate Question, and the steps by which it had reached that position, and he must say the friends of the Church had great reason to complain that noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen who had been in office, with a very short interval, since Sir Robert Peel's Government had left the question of church rates in the hands of independent Members pledged to their total and unconditional abolition. If he had to speak of noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen in their absence it was not his fault. He did not complain of the absence of Ministers on a Wednesday, but he did complain of their leaving questions of vital importance to private Members which thus came to be discussed during the absence of Ministers at a Wednesday morning sitting. Considering the importance of this Question—for, thank God, in spite of Mr. Morley and Mr. Miall, the Church was still a great institution of the country—considering the position of the Question ever since the decision of the House of Lords in the Braintree case, they had a right to complain of the course which had been taken by right hon. Gentlemen opposite in 1856. The predecessor of the hon. Baronet, Sir William Clay, brought forward his usual Motion for the abolition of church rates, and they were all very anxious to know what course would be pursued by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Morpeth, then Home Secretary (Sir George Grey) on that occasion. He voted for the second reading of the Bill for the total abolition of church rates, all though prepared, disposed, and determined to maintain church rates in some 9,000 or 10,000 parishes. A vote more inconsistent with the principles on which they considered the second reading of Bills never was given; and when the present Home Secretary said he would vote for this Bill, because no compromise had been provided, he would ask why did not right hon. Gentlemen opposite propose a compromise? After the decision of the House on that occasion, he got up and asked the Home

Secretary if the Government would take up the Bill. The right hon. Baronet said it remained in private hands, but they would endeavour to give it facilities. Those facilities never were available, and the Bill did not come on during that Session for further discussion. That course was most unfair and unjust to the Church of England, as well as inconsistent with the usual Parliamentary practice. On this subject he would quote the words used by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London (Lord John Russell), who took part in that debate, and said—

“With respect to the proposal which my right hon. Friend the right hon. Baronet (Sir George Grey) has made on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, he has chosen the inconvenient course, as I think, of not bringing into this House a measure founded upon the principles he has indicated, but, while proposing to sanction by his vote and by the votes of his colleagues a Bill framed in a very different spirit, he holds out the hope that he will be able to introduce in Committee, not some simple alterations merely, but material and somewhat complicated provisions.” [3 Hansard, cxi., 1913.] It was but just to the right hon. Baronet to say that he had endeavoured afterwards to retrace his steps, and on a subsequent occasion he voted in favour of church rates; but, having once led his friends into the wrong lobby, he could not get them out again. He went into that lobby accompanied by his right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Sir W. Hayter); the huntsmen and whipper-in were together, but the whole pack were running riot. The hon. Member who seconded the Motion spoke of the increasing majorities in favour of the abolition of church rates; but these were to be traced to the conduct of the Government. What said the Prime Minister on the occasion to which he had alluded? That noble Lord generally spoke very plainly, and he did so then. He said—and these were his own sentiments—

“The course we intend to pursue is, to recognise the existing state of things in parishes where church rates are levied, and to provide another arrangement for those parishes in which a different set of circumstances has arisen.” [3 Hansard, cxi., 1920.]

How the noble Lord, entertaining these views, could vote for a Bill proposing the total and unconditional abolition of church rates he had never been able to understand. In 1857 the noble Lord intimated his intention to deal with the question in a manner to please everybody. That was most gratifying to hear, and the hon. Baronet had been induced to proceed no further but no further proceeded the noble Lord. Then came the following Session, when amendments upon this measure, and reported them to the House. But the hon. Member for Swansea refused to proceed with the Bill so amended, and it was consequently allowed to drop. He, therefore, proposed to re-introduce the Bill as sent back from the Select Committee. Leave given.

"Bill to amend the Law relating to Endowed Schools, ordered to be brought in by Sir HUGH CAIRNS, and Mr. ADDERLEY."

Bill presented and read 1°; to be read 2° on Wednesday, 7th March.

THE ARMY ESTIMATES.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to ask the Secretary at War to explain what was the cause of the deficiency in last year's Army Estimates?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, the main cause of the deficiency arose from the East India Company not having repaid within the year the sum of £400,000, which was due from them to the Government. That sum had since been repaid, and would be carried to the expense of the current year. There were, besides, some trifling deficiencies which he would explain when he moved the Army Estimates.

House adjourned at Six Minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, February 9, 1860.

BERWICK-UPON-TWEED.

PETITION.

LORD TEYNHAM presented a Petition from the members of the Northern Reform Union, complaining of Proceedings with respect to the Prosecution of certain Persons for Bribery at the Election of Members for the Borough of Berwick-upon-Tweed, and praying for Relief. The Petitioners stated that the result of certain inquiries they had made into circumstances connected with the last election for Berwick-upon-Tweed, in August last, had induced them, under the Corrupt Practices Act of 1854, to commence actions against a number of persons for being implicated in bribery; that the actions were brought in the name of Mr. Reed, the Secretary to the Union; that application was made to a Judge in chambers (Mr. Baron Bramwell) by the defendants that Mr. Reed should be ordered to find security for costs; that this was objected to by his counsel, on the ground that it was contrary to precedent; and that Mr. Baron Bramwell, notwithstanding, made the order on Mr. Reed, and in the course of the hearing designated the proceedings of the Union as "nasty." The Petitioners complained that the order was contrary to the statute, and that the learned Judge had cast an unmerited slur upon their motives and actions.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR wished to say a few words in reference to this petition. He had always made it a rule himself to present every petition sent to him for the purpose which concluded with a reasonable prayer; but in the case of this prayer the object of the petitioners seemed to be only to throw odium on the Judge. Their Lordships did not meet there as a court of appeal; and if the petitioners were dissatisfied with the decision of the Judge, they might have appealed to the Court of Exchequer. There was no Judge in Westminster Hall entitled to more respect than Mr. Baron Bramwell.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he did not see why the noble and learned Lord should object to the petition. He could not admit that this House was not a proper court of appeal against the misconduct of any Judge.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the noble Earl misapprehended the case. In the event of a Judge doing anything that was supposed to be unworthy of his office, it was proper that his conduct should be brought under the consideration of Parliament; but what he had lamented was that the petitioners, in memorializing their Lordships, who did not sit there as a court of appeal, had controverted the spirit of an Act of Parliament.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he need only remind the noble and learned Lord that not very many years ago a complaint was made to this House against the conduct of a noble Earl then high in official station, and that the petition against him was presented by the noble and learned Lord himself.

system, "the burden was laid on the willing horse," the willingness to contribute would long continue. "The willing horse" would, after a time, refuse to bear the burden; and he thought that rural parishes would be thrown into a condition of much difficulty. He did not say that the churches would go out of repair; but this he did say, that the clergy would have, in many instances, to contribute largely themselves, and in others to go begging all over the country. In the Lords' blue-book on the subject of church rates he found in the evidence of Dr. Foster the following admission. He said, "The Dissenters conscientiously object to allow Churchmen who conscientiously approve of church rates to continue to rate themselves for that purpose." This was fairly elicited from the cross-examination of Dr. Foster. It was rather a roundabout case of conscience as far as the Dissenters were concerned. It manifested a desire on the part of the Dissenters to interfere with the free conscience of the Church, arising simply from a wish to attain ulterior objects, and separate the Church from the State. Dr. Foster was the chairman of the Parliamentary Committee of the Liberation Society—he did not give the full title, for life was not long enough for those long-winded, pompous designations, which this society gave itself; and he said, "With regard to our objections, I should say that I think the objections of the society are merely made in consequence of their being one means of weakening the connection between Church and State. We wish to take away all funds and property with which the State has endowed any religion whatever." "Do you include tithes in that?" "Yes." Now, many hon. Gentlemen saw a great distinction between tithes and church rates; but this far-sighted gentleman, who was at the head of the Liberation Society, did not see the distinction, nor admit it, and by and by this Dr. Foster, being chairman of the Parliamentary Committee of the Liberation Society—whose business, in other words, was to look after the borough Members—would not allow them to see, or if they did, would not allow them to own it. That was the real position of the Society for the Abolition of Church Rates. He only wished that the representatives of the gentleman who spoke out so boldly in the Lords' Committee would speak out as plainly in the House of Commons. If they were opposed to the connection between Church and State let them come forward

like men, raise the question, and show their colours, and the Conservatives would fight it out with them. But, no, they preferred sapping and mining, and, unless prevented, they would go on till they blew up the Established Church. That was just what the Conservatives did not want. The hon. Baronet who opened the debate began by saying that the question was very complicated. It was so. His Bill, however, was delightfully simple, and when we proposed to deal simply with a very complicated question we dealt unjustly. This was exactly what was done by the hon. Baronet. Was he aware that there were many parishes under local Acts in which the stipends of the ministers were made payable out of church rates? This was the fact; and he understood that it was considered doubtful, at all events, whether the Bill before the House would not, if it passed the Legislature, override and abrogate those local Acts. The hon. Baronet said, "I merely abolish church rates. I make no provision for altered circumstances. Dissenters are still to come and vote in Church meetings, and object to rates of Churchmen." He did not wish to deprive Dissenters of the services of the Church, for many prefer being married where their parents were married before them, and to have their remains interred where those of their ancestors had been deposited before." But he (Mr. K. Seymer) said, "Do not interfere with the money, if you are relieved from church rates." The right hon. Baronet who spoke last said he did not take extreme views; still he gave a very extreme vote, and seemed to throw on the Opposition the responsibility of proposing a substitute. But, surely, if there was to be a substitute for church rates, it was for the Government, who supported the abolition, to bring in the substitute. The right hon. Baronet had, however, proposed nothing of the kind, but had sat down rather abruptly when it appeared as if he were only beginning his speech. The right hon. Baronet had, indeed, indicated one resource out of which to replace church rates—namely, pew-rents, which were entirely repudiated in the rural districts. But even that substitute he had not ventured to propose. All he had done was to say that he should vote for the abolition of church rates. A great question had never been left in a more unsatisfactory position by a Member of a Government. The House could not pretend to vote in ignorance of the ulterior objects of the body

tion came before the present Lord Justice Knight Bruce, then a Vice-Chancellor, as to the settlement of a scheme for the application of very large funds, which had not before been devoted to purposes of education, but which had been given to Bury St. Edmunds in the reign of Edward IV., and the foundation in the deed was described to be "for the honour of Almighty God and the Blessed Virgin." In settling the scheme, the Vice-Chancellor was of opinion that education was a legitimate object for the application of the funds, and he also thought that education must include religious education, and the religion must be that which existed at the time of the founder; except that inasmuch as since then we had ceased all connection with the See of Rome, the religious education to be imparted now must be that of the Church of England. His Honour accordingly settled a scheme, according to which religious instruction was to be given in the school according to the doctrines and formularies of the Church of England, but with a special provision securing the benefits of the school to the children of Dissenters, who were not to be obliged to take part in the religious instruction. In 1852 the case of the "Basingstoke School" came before Lord St. Leonards, not as head of the Court of Chancery, but as Visitor on the part of the Crown, the school being a Royal foundation. Not only was the Basingstoke a Church of England school, but it was necessary that the master should be an ordained minister. Under these circumstances the scheme which his noble and learned Friend drew up, set forth that religious instruction should be given by the master at such time as he chose to appoint; but that the Liturgy and Catechism of the Church of England should not be taught to boys, whose parents, on conscientious grounds, objected thereto. Nothing could be more reasonable than these arrangements. So matters remained until 1855, when a scheme for the Foundation Schools at Chelmsford came before the Court of Chancery. The case was heard by Vice-Chancellor Wood, and the Attorney General, in conformity with the usual practice, proposed the introduction of "The conscience clauses." Thus sanctioned by the authority of Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce and Lord St. Leonards, the Vice-Chancellor, however, doubted his authority to make any such exception in favour of Dissenting children; but said, that Chelmsford being a Royal foundation, the matter rested with the Crown in this case, and not with the Court of Chancery. All he did, therefore, was to appoint a master who belonged to the Church of England; and he stated that if any children were improperly excluded complaint should be made to the Lord Chancellor in his capacity of Visitor. This decision gave rise to great dissatisfaction, and ever since that time the Attorney General had not attempted to introduce these conscience clauses. The result was, that the children of Dissenters were practically excluded from the benefits of Endowed Schools. The law regarding the trustees of these schools was in an equally unsatisfactory state. Some years since the case of the Stafford school, where two Dissenters had been appointed trustees, came before the present Master of the Rolls, who decided, most reluctantly, that no Dissenter could be upon the list of trustees, on the ground that as the object of the charity was the teaching of scholars according to the doctrines and formularies of the Church of England, with no right on the part of Dissenters to participate in any part of the teaching without also receiving the religious instruction, therefore the introduction of Dissenters among the trustees was not reasonable. In 1858 the question again came before Sir John Romilly in the case of the Ilminster school. There, besides the trust for the education of children, the surplus funds were to be applied in mending the roads and for other parochial purposes; and Sir John Romilly believing that this presented a point of difference which would enable him to depart from the principle of the Stafford case, decided that the appointment of the Dissenting trustees was a valid appointment. The decision was objected to, and the case was heard upon appeal by the Lords Justices. The Lords Justices overruled the decision of the Master of the Rolls, and declared that the Ilminster trustees must all be Members of the Church of England, on the ground that there was no solid distinction between that case and the Stafford case—the trust as to the surplus for repair of the roads being in truth nearly worthless. But although they so decided on grounds quite intelligible to those who consider the subject, yet in pronouncing judgment Lord Justice Knight Bruce observed that the sons of Dissenters had very properly enjoyed, and he hoped would long continue to enjoy, the advantages of the school, without being compelled to receive education in the tenets of the Church or to attend a Church of England place of worship, and Lord Justice Turner concurred in

gave way):—I will not interpose between my hon. Friend and the House more than a moment; but, before we come to a division, I wish to place before it one view which I think has not been sufficiently, if at all, urged on their attention. And that is, the extremely centralizing character of the measure which the hon. Baronet recommends to our adoption this day. He calls upon the central authority to interfere with our parochial constitution—a constitution, I may say, in passing, not less important than our political constitution. For what are the circumstances of the case? To take the lowest estimate, 80 per cent of those parishes do not wish to be interfered with, and the rest have no grievance in the law and custom of the country at present; because if it be a grievance that they should be followed in those parishes, the majority of the inhabitants have the power to exempt themselves by their own act. Well, Sir, I look with great jealousy, then, on the central authority being called upon to interfere with the will of the great body of the parishes of this country in the exercise of a custom which has existed for centuries and which, in the great majority of the parishes of the country, has been productive of beneficial results. I admit the painful anomaly that on a subject of such general interest as the maintenance of the fabrics of our churches a custom should be prevalent in one part of the country and have fallen into desuetude in another. I think it of great importance that we should arrive, if possible, at some mode by which that anomaly might be arranged and terminated. We have had several schemes brought forward, many suggestions on the subject in the speeches of hon. Gentlemen; we have had the policy of one Government expressed but not proposed; and we have had another instance of the policy of a Government not only recommended, but brought before the consideration of the House in the form of a Bill. I admit that the experience of all these attempts to arrive at a satisfactory settlement of the question is not of an encouraging nature; but it does not follow that because they have not been of a successful character that we should immediately advocate a proceeding like that of the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock. Because if it be a fact—and I have not heard it denied—that the very great proportion of the parishes of the country are satisfied with the present state of the law, and that the minority who are

dissatisfied are not suffering from any practical grievance, then what we have before us in the proposition of the hon. Baronet is not the redress of a practical grievance but the acceptance of a speculative theory. Well now, Sir, what is that theory? That theory has varied in its form and expression in the years during which I have had a seat in the House, and during the time this agitation has existed. It came forward at first in a very plausible form, which recommended it to the consideration of many in this House who are not favourable to the present scheme. We were called on then to recognize a conscientious scruple, and the recognition of a conscientious scruple was a basis for legislation which naturally recommended itself to every generous mind. But, Sir, that is no longer the case. No one seeks redress now for his conscientious scruples; and those who were once willing to listen to such an appeal have, I think, upon a wiser and discreeter reflection, felt that the admission of such a plea would lead to ultimate legislation upon other subjects of a character which few in this House would approve. Well then, Sir, what is the form which the speculative theory—for a speculative theory, and not a practical grievance, it is—what is the form that it now assumes? It takes one much clearer, much more sincere, much more honest, and much more intelligible. It takes the form of a controversy, whether there should be an ecclesiastical establishment in this country; and whether the union between Church and State that has so long prevailed should be acknowledged and supported. I do not mean to say that in this question of church rates, necessarily, that issue is contained. That is a point which—it is not convenient at this time to enter into, and which is not required for my argument;—but what I do say is, that we have it in clear evidence, acknowledged in a manly and straightforward manner, that is the real issue we have to try. Well now, Sir, I think we know where we stand. I have always observed that when the property of the Church is at stake, and when questions affecting it are brought forward in this House, the agitation which takes place is of considerable duration, and during that agitation the form of the question assumes different aspects; but, ultimately the real character comes out, and it is a great error to suppose that in questions of this kind a lengthened agitation is necessarily require to be argued at the present time. The Bill now before their Lordships authorized the election of Dissenters as trustees without any restriction as to usage. Unless some such enactment were passed by the Legislature the consequences might be such as their Lordships hardly anticipated. He had the honour of being a governor of the Charterhouse. Members of the Church of Scotland were as much disqualified as Wesleyans or Independents, and yet Lord Aberdeen and Lord Panmure, who were Presbyterians, were both governors of the Charterhouse. What was to prevent anybody from instituting a suit for the purpose of turning those noble Lords out of the Government of the Charterhouse?

LORD CRANWORTH was certain, at all events, that Lord Panmure was a Presbyterian, and he saw no reason why the decision of the Court of Chancery might not be applied to him. But there was a still stronger case. One of the largest endowed schools in existence was Christ's Hospital. He understood that anybody, whether Dissenter or Churchman, might become a governor of Christ's Hospital by paying £500. No doubt many of the donors of £500 were Dissenters; and they also could be expelled by a quo warranto. Moreover, several of the sub-corporations of the City of London were trustees ex officio of various educational foundations. For instance, the Mercers, the Fishmongers, the Merchant Taylors, and other companies were ex officio trustees and governors of schools at Tunbridge, London, East Retford, and other places. Were the members of those bodies who happened to be Dissenters to be turned out of positions for which they were now eligible? The doctrine of the Court of Chancery might be carried that length, and seeing that it was calculated, at any rate, to excite the feelings of a large and influential part of the community, he thought their Lordships would act wisely if they interfered before any great practical evil had occurred. He had endeavoured, as calmly and dispassionately as he could, to state what the existing grievances were and how he proposed to redress them, and he trusted their Lordships would give their sanction to the Bill of which he now moved the second reading.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

very unpretending form, and had been explained by his noble and learned Friend in a clear and temperate manner; but it appeared to him to be a measure of infinite importance, and to involve principles which, if adopted, might produce the most serious consequences. He wished, in the first place, to add a few details to the history given by his noble and learned Friend of the attempts at legislation upon the subject of endowed schools: it was necessary to a proper understanding of this Bill. It was generally supposed that the case of the Ilminster School first occasioned a desire on the part of Dissenters to obtain some legislative enactment; but prior to the decision in that case, various Bills were introduced into the other House of Parliament, where they met with little encouragement. The Ilminster case unquestionably awakened Dissenters to a sense of the inconvenience of the position in which they were placed, and of the precarious character of the privileges which they had been allowed to enjoy in many endowed schools. He would explain as clearly as he could what was the decision in the Ilminster School case, because it was essential to ascertain the extent of the grievance of which Dissenters had a right to complain, as well as the kind of legislation to which they were fairly entitled. In the reign of Edward VI., certain lands in the parish of Ilminster were given to the inhabitants of the town for the purpose of promoting "Godly learning," and the surplus rents and profits, after the establishment of a school, were to be applied to the repair of public ways and bridges. The trustees were first of all the grantees under the deed of gift, and they were to be succeeded, as the deed expressed it, by other "honest persons of the parish." A grammar school was established, and a number of auxiliary schools for teaching reading, writing, and arithmetic, were founded out of the surplus rents and profits of the land. Some of those auxiliary schools, he believed, had been established more than 200 years, and the children of Dissenters had been admitted from a remote period to both the grammar and the auxiliary schools, without being required to attend the services of the Church or to learn the Church Catechism. Many Dissenters were appointed trustees from 1720 down to the time when the inquiry took place in the Court of Chancery. It was under those circumstances that an application was made to the Master of the Rolls for a scheme for the appointment of new trustees, including some Dissenters. The Master of the Rolls was of opinion that as the charity was not merely for founding a grammar school, but the surplus funds were to be applied to the repair of public roads and bridges, all the inhabitants of the parish were entitled to the benefit of the foundation, and that there was nothing therefore to prevent Dissenters being trustees. The case was then taken by appeal before the Lords Justices, who were of opinion that the primary object of the foundation was the establishment of a grammar school, and that the grammar school being for the promotion of "Godly learning," necessarily was for religious instruction; and looking at the deed itself, not at the usage, for the purpose of ascertaining what were the intentions of the founder, they thought that the religious instruction which the founder required was religious instruction according to the doctrines of the Church of England. They considered that the repair of roads and bridges, to which the surplus rents and profits were to be applied, was a secondary and subordinate object, and that the primary object—the establishment of a grammar school—might, in fact, absorb the whole of the funds; and, inasmuch as the school was for promoting religious instruction, and that instruction, in the view of the founder, was according to the Church of England, they decided that Dissenters could not be trustees. He believed his noble and learned Friend would agree with him that the judgment of the Lords Justices was well founded. It was certainly to be regretted that the question was over agitated in the Courts. There was no necessity for disturbing an arrangement which had existed for so long a period, and he lamented that any one should have been so imprudent—he must add, so intolerant—as to raise a technical objection for the purpose of curtailing privileges which Dissenters had enjoyed for centuries. Undoubtedly we were now reaping the fruits of that intolerance, because the decision in the Ilminster case opened the eyes of the Dissenters to the precarious position in which they were placed; they discovered that even when their children had been admitted to the benefit of these endowed schools their privileges existed only on sufferance, and they naturally determined, if possible, to put an end to a state of things which was so extremely inconvenient. It appeared to him, however, that in endeavouring to do themselves justice they had reached at objects at which they ought not to aim, and had sought to obtain a position the concession of which would violate some of the most sacred principles of the law. Very soon after the decision in the case referred to, an hon. Member (Mr. Dillwyn) introduced into the House of Commons a Bill for redressing the inconvenience under which Dissenters laboured, and he agreed with his noble and learned Friend that nothing could exceed the temperate manner and the fairness with which it was brought before the other House. But however mild and temperate the words of the promoter, the measure he proposed was sufficiently strong, and although his noble and learned Friend said it effected no alteration in the law, and was only declaratory of what the law was, he must differ with him thereon; for the first section provided that no school should be deemed to be a Church of England school, nor should any Dissenter from the Church of England be incompetent as such to be trustee, master, or scholar unless it was so declared by the instrument of foundation.

LORD CRANWORTH inquired to what Bill the noble and learned Lord was now referring?

LORD CHELMSFORD replied that it was to the one ordered by the House of Commons to be printed on the 2nd of March, 1859.

LORD CRANWORTH explained that the Bill which he had described as being declaratory of the law was introduced by the same hon. Member in the following Session of Parliament. That from which his noble Friend had just quoted was never referred to a Select Committee.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that he had been misled by an endorsement upon the Bill, which had been given to him by a noble Friend, that it was "Mr. Dillwyn's Bill, 1859, before it went to the Select Committee." Mr. Dillwyn's second Bill, then, as his noble and learned Friend said, was merely declaratory of the law. It went to a Select Committee, where its provisions were so much changed that it was necessary to alter the preamble, and when it came back from the Committee it bore no resemblance to the Bill which went before the Committee. The Bill so amended was the one which was taken up by his noble and learned Friend at the end of last Session. During the present Session, Mr. Dillwyn had introduced another Bill, which was of a very startling character. By its first clause he proposed to provide that no endowed school or educational charity founded prior to the final establishment by law of the Church of England—that was before the first year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth—should be deemed to have been founded for the purpose of affording religious instruction according to the doctrines of the Church of England, even although it might appear upon the face of the foundation deed that it was established for that purpose; and, by the second clause, that every educational charity founded after the first year of the reign of Elizabeth should not be considered to have been founded for the purpose of religious instruction unless it should appear upon the face of the deed that it was so founded. These were rather startling propositions, and they would show what were the views of Dissenters upon this subject. That Bill was at present before the House of Commons; and on the previous day Sir Hugh Cairns introduced another measure, which was founded on the report of the Select Committee, and was, therefore, similar to that brought in by his noble and learned Friend at the end of the last Session. His noble and learned Friend had now introduced this Bill, in which he had altered an important clause of the measure of last year; and so the matter stood at present. In order to avoid misapprehension, he wished it to be understood that, wherever an endowed school had been used for religious instruction, but that it did not appear distinctly upon the face of the instrument of endowment that it had been founded for that purpose, and where the usage had been uniform for a number of years, and Dissenters had for some time been admitted to its benefits, he should be as anxious as any one that that privilege should not be taken from them. He should be ready to agree to any Bill which should provide that in all cases of endowed schools, where upon the face of the endowment it did not appear that they were endowed for purposes of religious instruction, and where Dissenters had been admitted to such schools, they should be allowed to enjoy that privilege; and for that purpose he should be prepared to assent to the introduction of these “conscience clauses,” as they were called. The Bill of his noble and learned Friend, however, went infinitely further than such a moderate provision as that, and by its fourth clause it struck at the root of all those rules of prescription by which a great part of the property of this country was held. This was

“My noble and learned Friend who sits near me said on a former night, that the principle on which his Bill is built is a principle known to the law, which is, that uniform possession during a long period of years establishes a title. It is a great principle of our law—it is a principle of the law of all civilized States—it is a principle drawn from the wise jurisprudence of ancient Rome—that principle and rule of law which are applied to the estates and civil rights of your Lordships and the people at large. Why then should it not be applied, I beg to ask, in cases of the description which I have mentioned?” [3 Hansard, lxxiv. 582.]

By the fourth clause of this Bill his noble and learned Friend proposed to get rid of the prescriptive rights of centuries. Even if usage and prescription were confirmed by judicial decision or by legislative authority, it was to be of no value if in the instrument regulating the endowment “nothing be contained expressly requiring every child educated under such endowment to learn, or to be instructed, according to the doctrines or formularies of such church, sect, or denomination.” His noble and learned Friend said there were about 690 endowed schools throughout the country. In the case of the great majority of them, however, he would venture to say that there was no express indication in the instrument of endowment that the religious instruction should be of a particular character. Yet there could be no doubt whatever, from the circumstances connected with these foundations, from views the persons endowing, and the continual usage after the endowment, that the object of the founders was that the religious instruction should be according to the doctrines of the Church of England. Let them take as an illustration the grammar schools founded by Edward VI. They were established on one general plan, and were intended for the promotion of sound religious education. Governors were appointed for the regulation and management of the schools and of the masters; but they were to act under the superintendence and sanction of the Bishop. In none of these endowments was there any distinct statement that the religious instruction to be given should be according to the doctrines of the Church of England. But inasmuch as the rules and ordinances for the government of the school and the schoolmaster were to be under the sanction of the questions was church rates, in respect of which he said the society occupied this vantage ground, that all parties admitted that something must be done with them. He then enumerated Mr. Dillwyn's Bill relating to Endowed Schools, the Annuity Tax Bill, Mr. Baines's Motion respecting the Bible Printing Monopoly, Mr. Hadfield's Municipal Corporation Bill, Mr. FitzGerald's Roman Catholic Relief Bill, and a contemplated Bill for enabling Dissenting ministers to officiate in churchyards. Subsequently Mr. Miall proposed a Resolution to the effect that the meeting, had great pleasure in learning that the Executive Committee were determined to press forward, with undiminished energy, these various measures, and more especially that for the abolition of church rates. He believed he had said enough then to show what was the real nature of the agitation which had occasioned the change of policy on the part of the two noble Lords [Oh, oh!] He had no doubt that the relation of these facts was exceedingly unpalatable to hon. Gentlemen opposite. It was not for him to decide for hon. Gentlemen how far they were willing to accept the position of delegates for the society of which Dr. Foster was the chief; but he certainly had a strong opinion of the sense which the House must entertain of those extraneous and most unconstitutional attempts to influence the legislation of this House. There was an Act by which the constitution of the country determined the religion of the Sovereign. The Sovereign was to represent a religion which was neither that of the Baptist nor the Papist, the Calvinist, nor the Lutheran, the Jew nor the Quaker. The religion of the Sovereign must be that of the Church of England. It was not a mere formula; for the Coronation Service itself involves the necessity for Her receiving the communion according to the office of that Church. If, then, the object of hon. Gentlemen was the separation of Church and State, let them propose to cancel and rescind the Act passed in the reign of William the Third for "the limitation of the Crown," and at once decide whether this country should embrace an empty infidelity, or any other religion than that of the Church of England. He was certain, however, that neither this House nor the country would consent to substitute the heartlessness of infidelity or the depressing despotism of sectarian supremacy for the gentle and the elevating influence of the Church of England.

MR. THOMPSON said, that he wished to express a hope that when the Bill came out of Committee it would contain some provision for the repairs of the fabric of the church. In that hope he would support the second reading of the measure. To neglect to ensure the repair of the fabric of the church would be, in his opinion, to afford great reason to the poor man to complain of injustice, because he would say those churches were built by the liberality of our fathers, who never could have contemplated the unconditional abolition of the means of supporting them. He was prepared however, to support the total and unconditional abolition of that portion of the church rate which was appropriated to the celebration of Divine worship. Every Christian congregation worthy of the name ought to defray the cost of its own religious services.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY briefly replied. He denied the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks, that the Bill would revolutionize our parochial institutions. If the measure were passed to-morrow the inhabitants of every parish would be at liberty, as before, to meet and levy a rate. A great deal had been said of the Liberation Society. The truth was, however, that he had advocated the abolition of church rates in that House long before the Liberation Society came into existence. He was not even connected with it, though he entertained a high respect for some of its leading members.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said he rose to move the second reading of this Bill, which was in substance the same as the Bill brought forward last Session on this subject.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. BOVILL observed, that a Bill of this sort had passed through the House of Lords last Session, and he thought that the present measure should be postponed until the profession of solicitors had an opportunity of considering its provisions. The reason he asked for postponement was because in this Bill twenty-three clauses had been struck out of the Bill carried in the Upper House, and some of these twenty-three clauses were looked upon by solicitors as having a very important bearing.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he wished to remind the House that last year the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) introduced a Bill to amend the law relating to Endowed Schools. That Bill was read a second time, and referred to a Select Committee. The Committee, unanimously, or with the exception of the hon. Member for Swansea himself, made large amendments upon this measure, and reported them to the House. But the hon. Member for Swansea refused to proceed with the Bill so amended, and it was consequently allowed to drop. He, therefore, proposed to re-introduce the Bill as sent back from the Select Committee.

Leave given.

" Bill to amend the Law relating to Endowed Schools, ordered to be brought in by Sir HUGH CAIRNS, and Mr. ADDERLEY."

Bill presented and read 1^o; to be read 2^o on Wednesday, 7th March.

THE ARMY ESTIMATES.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to ask the Secretary at War to explain what was the cause of the deficiency in last year's Army Estimates?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, the main cause of the deficiency arose from the East India Company not having repaid within the year the sum of £400,000, which was due from them to the Government. That sum had since been repaid, and would be carried to the expense of the current year. There were, besides, some trifling deficiencies which he would explain when he moved the Army Estimates.

House adjourned at Six Minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, February 9, 1860.

BERWICK-UPON-TWEED.

PETITION.

LORD TEYNHAM presented a Petition from the members of the Northern Reform Union, complaining of Proceedings with respect to the Prosecution of certain Persons for Bribery at the Election of Members for the Borough of Berwick-upon-Tweed, and praying for Relief. The Petitioners stated that the result of certain inquiries they had made into circumstances connected with the last election for Berwick-upon-Tweed, in August last, had induced them, under the Corrupt Practices Act of 1854, to commence actions against a number of persons for being implicated in bribery; that the actions were brought in the name of Mr. Reed, the Secretary to the Union; that application was made to a Judge in chambers (Mr. Baron Bramwell) by the defendants that Mr. Reed should be ordered to find security for costs; that this was objected to by his counsel, on the ground that it was contrary to precedent; and that Mr. Baron Bramwell, notwithstanding, made the order on Mr. Reed, and in the course of the hearing designated the proceedings of the Union as "nasty." The Petitioners complained that the order was contrary to the statute, and that the learned Judge had cast an unmerited slur upon their motives and actions.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR wished to say a few words in reference to this petition. He had always made it a rule himself to present every petition sent to him for the purpose which concluded with a reasonable prayer; but in the case of this prayer the object of the petitioners seemed to be only to throw odium on the Judge. Their Lordships did not meet there as a court of appeal; and if the petitioners were dissatisfied with the decision of the Judge, they might have appealed to the Court of Exchequer. There was no Judge in Westminster Hall entitled to more respect than Mr. Baron Bramwell.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he did not see why the noble and learned Lord should object to the petition. He could not admit that this House was not a proper court of appeal against the misconduct of any Judge.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the noble Earl misapprehended the case. In the event of a Judge doing anything that was supposed to be unworthy of his office, it was proper that his conduct should be brought under the consideration of Parliament; but what he had lamented was that the petitioners, in memorializing their Lordships, who did not sit there as a court of appeal, had controverted the spirit of an Act of Parliament.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, he need only remind the noble and learned Lord that not very many years ago a complaint was made to this House against the conduct of a noble Earl then high in official station, and that the petition against him was presented by the noble and learned Lord himself.

Petition to lie on the Table.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD CRANWORTH, in rising to move the second reading of the Endowed Schools Bill, explained that its object was twofold—first, to enable the children of Dissenters to enjoy the benefits of endowed schools, commonly known as King Edward's Schools; and, next, to enable Dissenters to become trustees of such schools. Before, however, he proceeded to state the details of the present measure, it would be convenient that he should relate the history of the Bill. In the course of the last Session of Parliament an hon. Member of the other House (Mr. Dillwyn) obtained leave to bring in a Bill having the same object in view that he, Lord Cranworth, proposed to effect by this Bill. That Bill was opposed on the second reading; but it was carried by a majority, and referred to a Select Committee. He (Lord Cranworth) had had no communication with that hon. Member upon the subject; but he must do him the justice of saying that the speech he made in moving the second reading, appeared to have been characterized by as much of intelligence, fairness, and zeal, as any speech he had ever read. The hon. Member brought forward his Bill, if not as the organ, yet in the interest of the Dissenters; and he (Lord Cranworth) could say, in all sincerity and truth, that, being himself an attached member of the Church of England, he thought it was for the interest of that Church, quite as much as of the Dissenters, that such a measure as this should pass. He had introduced the Bill without communication with the hon. Member; and it would be for their Lordships to judge how far it was deserving of their support. The Bill of the hon. Member for Swansea came out of the Select Committee in a totally different shape from that in which it entered the Committee; in fact, as originally introduced, it would have effected no object whatever. But the Committee gave very great attention to the subject, and, almost entirely rejecting the original Bill, they framed a new one, consisting of several clauses, upon the subject. That Bill went back to the House of Commons at the close of the Session; but the hon. Member who introduced the measure being dissatisfied with the Bill in its amended shape, it was allowed to drop. He then, at the end of the last Session, asked to introduce a Bill into their Lordships' House, and did so accordingly; but his noble Friend the President of the Council having represented that it would be hopeless to attempt to pass it at that period of the Session, he consented to withdraw it; intimating at the same time that he should re-introduce it early in the present Session. In conformity with that notice, therefore, he had this year laid a Bill upon the table within two or three days of the meeting of Parliament, and that Bill was the same, with one exception, as the measure which had been agreed to by the Select Committee of the House of Commons. That exception, he could not disguise from himself, would be considered by many of their Lordships as an important and undesirable alteration; but if they would give a second reading to the Bill, he should be prepared to vindicate the alteration, and to show that it was better in the shape in which he proposed it, than that in which it came out of the Committee of the House of Commons. Their Lordships could then deal with the subject as they thought proper. In these cases it had become the practice for the Attorney General to appear before the Court of Chancery, and introduce what were called "conscience clauses" into the scheme, exempting the children of Dissenters from the necessity of receiving religious instruction according to the doctrines of the Church of England. It had been contended, however, from time to time in that Court that it had no power of extending the benefits of these schools to any but Church of England children; that the business of the Court was to administer the law as it found it; and that where the trust-deed implied that the school was to be conducted upon Church of England principles the law was to be followed. In order to show the necessity of some legislation upon the subject, he would mention that there were nearly 700 endowed grammar schools in this country—some of them of the highest excellence—nearly all of which were founded prior to or during, or soon after, the reign of King Edward VI., and were, therefore, generally known as King Edward VI.'s Schools. Most of them had been endowed with the spoils of the suppressed monasteries. According to the law at present, any complaint of maladministration in the case of any endowed school must be made to the Court of Chancery, which directed a scheme for the future management of the charity; deciding what instruction was to be given, and how the school was to be managed and governed. In 1842 a question came before the present Lord Justice Knight Bruce, then a Vice-Chancellor, as to the settlement of a scheme for the application of very large funds, which had not before been devoted to purposes of education, but which had been given to Bury St. Edmunds in the reign of Edward IV., and the foundation in the deed was described to be "for the honour of Almighty God and the Blessed Virgin." In settling the scheme, the Vice-Chancellor was of opinion that education was a legitimate object for the application of the funds, and he also thought that education must include religious education, and the religion must be that which existed at the time of the founder; except that inasmuch as since then we had ceased all connection with the See of Rome, the religious education to be imparted now must be that of the Church of England. His Honour accordingly settled a scheme, according to which religious instruction was to be given in the school according to the doctrines and formularies of the Church of England, but with a special provision securing the benefits of the school to the children of Dissenters, who were not to be obliged to take part in the religious instruction. In 1852 the case of the "Basingstoke School" came before Lord St. Leonards, not as head of the Court of Chancery, but as Visitor on the part of the Crown, the school being a Royal foundation. Not only was the Basingstoke a Church of England school, but it was necessary that the master should be an ordained minister. Under these circumstances the scheme which his noble and learned Friend drew up, set forth that religious instruction should be given by the master at such time as he chose to appoint; but that the Liturgy and Catechism of the Church of England should not be taught to boys, whose parents, on conscientious grounds, objected thereto. Nothing could be more reasonable than these arrangements. So matters remained until 1855, when a scheme for the Foundation Schools at Chelmsford came before the Court of Chancery. The case was heard by Vice-Chancellor Wood, and the Attorney General, in conformity with the usual practice, proposed the introduction of "The conscience clauses." Thus sanctioned by the authority of Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce and Lord St. Leonards, the Vice-Chancellor, however, doubted his authority to make any such exception in favour of Dissenting children; but said, that Chelmsford being a Royal foundation, the matter rested with the Crown in this case, and not with the Court of Chancery. All he did, therefore, was to appoint a master who belonged to the Church of England; and he stated that if any children were improperly excluded complaint should be made to the Lord Chancellor in his capacity of Visitor. This decision gave rise to great dissatisfaction, and ever since that time the Attorney General had not attempted to introduce these conscience clauses. The result was, that the children of Dissenters were practically excluded from the benefits of Endowed Schools. The law regarding the trustees of these schools was in an equally unsatisfactory state. Some years since the case of the Stafford school, where two Dissenters had been appointed trustees, came before the present Master of the Rolls, who decided, most reluctantly, that no Dissenter could be upon the list of trustees, on the ground that as the object of the charity was the teaching of scholars according to the doctrines and formularies of the Church of England, with no right on the part of Dissenters to participate in any part of the teaching without also receiving the religious instruction, therefore the introduction of Dissenters among the trustees was not reasonable. In 1858 the question again came before Sir John Romilly in the case of the Ilminster school. There, besides the trust for the education of children, the surplus funds were to be applied in mending the roads and for other parochial purposes; and Sir John Romilly believing that this presented a point of difference which would enable him to depart from the principle of the Stafford case, decided that the appointment of the Dissenting trustees was a valid appointment. The decision was objected to, and the case was heard upon appeal by the Lords Justices. The Lords Justices overruled the decision of the Master of the Rolls, and declared that the Ilminster trustees must all be Members of the Church of England, on the ground that there was no solid distinction between that case and the Stafford case—the trust as to the surplus for repair of the roads being in truth nearly worthless. But although they so decided on grounds quite intelligible to those who consider the subject, yet in pronouncing judgment Lord Justice Knight Bruce observed that the sons of Dissenters had very properly enjoyed, and he hoped would long continue to enjoy, the advantages of the school, without being compelled to receive education in the tenets of the Church or to attend a Church of England place of worship, and Lord Justice Turner concurred in this hope. It was improper to speak of the private feelings and opinions of Judges, yet he must remark, that if there was any person more than another devoted to the Church as against Dissent, it was his very learned Friend Lord Justice Knight Bruce. And, considering that the "conscience clauses" in favour of Dissenters originated with him in the Bury St. Edmund's case, and that the principle of those clauses was re-affirmed by him in the judgment given in the Ilminster case, where it was also sanctioned by Lord Justice Turner, himself a strong Churchman, he thought this afforded a strong argument in favour of the justice of the claims now put forth. From what he (Lord Cranworth) had stated, it would be seen that the law with regard to endowed schools was most unsatisfactory. The first object of his Bill was to make the statute law conform to what had for a long time been the practice of the Court of Chancery. It provided, therefore, that, at whatever time the trust was created, unless it expressly excluded all but Members of the Church, the trustees should be empowered to introduce into any scheme and to act upon "the conscience clause," which was as follows :—

"No Boy shall be required to learn [specify in general Terms the Doctrine of Formularies of the particular Church, Sect, or Denomination referred to in Sect. 4 of this Act, as for example, the Catechism, Articles, or Liturgy of the Church of England,] or to attend the Celebration of Divine Worship according to [specify in general Terms the Form of Worship of the particular Church, Sect, or Denomination, as, for example, the Ritual of the Church of England,] in case his Parents or Parent, or the Persons or Person standing to him in loco parentis, shall express to the Trustees in Writing their or his Objections, on conscientious Grounds, to the Boys' doing so."

That he thought was in precise conformity with what was acted on by the Court of Chancery until within the last four or five years. What were the objections to it? Several petitions had been presented that evening against the proposition; some from parishes, but one or two certainly from clergymen, and he regretted the course taken by them, because he thought it most injurious to the Establishment to which they belonged. What were the objections? Persons, speaking theoretically, said that it was dangerous and improper for the Legislature to interfere with existing vested rights of property. No one would be more unwilling than himself to do anything really in violation of rights existing in such a manner that they ought to be maintained ;

but he never could admit that it could be competent for one age so to legislate with respect to property as to bind subsequent ages to deal with that property inconveniently and contrary to the social wants of the time. Devises and grants of land to charities had in some cases acted injuriously; but this could not be said with regard to property devoted to objects of education. With regard to property devoted to educational purposes their Lordships might go to the extent of placing themselves in the position of the founders, and considering whether, if they were now instituting the charity, they would institute it precisely in the same way as they had done 300 years ago, or whether they would not rather adapt it more to the social wants of the existing time. The founders of the educational charities to which the present Bill applied, did not wish to exclude any one, but there was at that time no other recognized religious body but the Church of England; there could be no legal Dissenters; and it might safely be inferred that if many of the old founders had to establish the foundations now they would make the endowments sufficiently liberal to embrace large classes not belonging to the Church. He did not believe that any of their Lordships could object to such an alteration. If so, the proposition he made in the Bill seemed to him most advisable, and he therefore asked their Lordships to adopt it. The other part of the Bill was likely, he was aware, to meet with more objection. He proposed that Dissenters should, not quod Dissenters, be ineligible to be trustees for an educational charity; and in this respect the present measure differed from the Bill which passed through the Select Committee of the House of Commons. That Committee were fully prepared to sanction the appointment of Dissenting trustees, provided their appointment were confined to cases where there had been a usage for twenty-five years of Dissenters acting as trustees. It struck him that that condition was very objectionable for this among other reasons. He should like to know what was the meaning of a usage of twenty-five years in respect to the appointment of trustees. One might suppose, from such a condition being attached, that trustees were always appointed annually. But that was not the case, and sometimes twenty-five years might elapse before an appointment took place. That was a question, however, which did not require to be argued at the present time. The Bill now before their Lordships authorized the election of Dissenters as trustees without any restriction as to usage. Unless some such enactment were passed by the Legislature the consequences might be such as their Lordships hardly anticipated. He had the honour of being a governor of the Charterhouse. Members of the Church of Scotland were as much disqualified as Wesleyans or Independents, and yet Lord Aberdeen and Lord Panmure, who were Presbyterians, were both governors of the Charterhouse. What was to prevent anybody from instituting a suit for the purpose of turning those noble Lords out of the Government of the Charterhouse?

LORD CRANWORTH was certain, at all events, that Lord Panmure was a Presbyterian, and he saw no reason why the decision of the Court of Chancery might not be applied to him. But there was a still stronger case. One of the largest endowed schools in existence was Christ's Hospital. He understood that anybody, whether Dissenter or Churchman, might become a governor of Christ's Hospital by paying £500. No doubt many of the donors of £500 were Dissenters; and they also could be expelled by a quo warranto. Moreover, several of the sub-corporations of the City of London were trustees ex officio of various educational foundations. For instance, the Mercers, the Fishmongers, the Merchant Taylors, and other companies were ex officio trustees and governors of schools at Tunbridge, London, East Retford, and other places. Were the members of those bodies who happened to be Dissenters to be turned out of positions for which they were now eligible? The doctrine of the Court of Chancery might be carried that length, and seeing that it was calculated, at any rate, to excite the feelings of a large and influential part of the community, he thought their Lordships would act wisely if they interfered before any great practical evil had occurred. He had endeavoured, as calmly and dispassionately as he could, to state what the existing grievances were and how he proposed to redress them, and he trusted their Lordships would give their sanction to the Bill of which he now moved the second reading.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^d.

very unpretending form, and had been explained by his noble and learned Friend in a clear and temperate manner; but it appeared to him to be a measure of infinite importance, and to involve principles which, if adopted, might produce the most serious consequences. He wished, in the first place, to add a few details to the history given by his noble and learned Friend of the attempts at legislation upon the subject of endowed schools: it was necessary to a proper understanding of this Bill. It was generally supposed that the case of the Ilminster School first occasioned a desire on the part of Dissenters to obtain some legislative enactment; but prior to the decision in that case, various Bills were introduced into the other House of Parliament, where they met with little encouragement. The Ilminster case unquestionably awakened Dissenters to a sense of the inconvenience of the position in which they were placed, and of the precarious character of the privileges which they had been allowed to enjoy in many endowed schools. He would explain as clearly as he could what was the decision in the Ilminster School case, because it was essential to ascertain the extent of the grievance of which Dissenters had a right to complain, as well as the kind of legislation to which they were fairly entitled. In the reign of Edward VI., certain lands in the parish of Ilminster were given to the inhabitants of the town for the purpose of promoting "Godly learning," and the surplus rents and profits, after the establishment of a school, were to be applied to the repair of public ways and bridges. The trustees were first of all the grantees under the deed of gift, and they were to be succeeded, as the deed expressed it, by other "honest persons of the parish." A grammar school was established, and a number of auxiliary schools for teaching reading, writing, and arithmetic, were founded out of the surplus rents and profits of the land. Some of those auxiliary schools, he believed, had been established more than 200 years, and the children of Dissenters had been admitted from a remote period to both the grammar and the auxiliary schools, without being required to attend the services of the Church or to learn the Church Catechism. Many Dissenters were appointed trustees from 1720 down to the time when the inquiry took place in the Court of Chancery. It was under those circumstances that an application was made to the Master of the Rolls

for a scheme for the appointment of new trustees, including some Dissenters. The Master of the Rolls was of opinion that as the charity was not merely for founding a grammar school, but the surplus funds were to be applied to the repair of public roads and bridges, all the inhabitants of the parish were entitled to the benefit of the foundation, and that there was nothing therefore to prevent Dissenters being trustees. The case was then taken by appeal before the Lords Justices, who were of opinion that the primary object of the foundation was the establishment of a grammar school, and that the grammar school being for the promotion of "Godly learning," necessarily was for religious instruction; and looking at the deed itself, not at the usage, for the purpose of ascertaining what were the intentions of the founder, they thought that the religious instruction which the founder required was religious instruction according to the doctrines of the Church of England. They considered that the repair of roads and bridges, to which the surplus rents and profits were to be applied, was a secondary and subordinate object, and that the primary object—the establishment of a grammar school—might, in fact, absorb the whole of the funds; and, inasmuch as the school was for promoting religious instruction, and that instruction, in the view of the founder, was according to the Church of England, they decided that Dissenters could not be trustees. He believed his noble and learned Friend would agree with him that the judgment of the Lords Justices was well founded. It was certainly to be regretted that the question was ever agitated in the Courts. There was no necessity for disturbing an arrangement which had existed for so long a period, and he lamented that any one should have been so imprudent—he must add, so intolerant—as to raise a technical objection for the purpose of curtailing privileges which Dissenters had enjoyed for centuries. Undoubtedly we were now reaping the fruits of that intolerance, because the decision in the Ilminster case opened the eyes of the Dissenters to the precarious position in which they were placed; they discovered that even when their children had been admitted to the benefit of these endowed schools their privileges existed only on sufferance, and they naturally determined, if possible, to put an end to a state of things which was so extremely inconvenient. It appeared to him, however, that in endeavouring to do themselves justice they had reached at objects at which they ought not to aim, and had sought to obtain a position the concession of which would violate some of the most sacred principles of the law. Very soon after the decision in the case referred to, an hon. Member (Mr. Dillwyn) introduced into the House of Commons a Bill for redressing the inconvenience under which Dissenters laboured, and he agreed with his noble and learned Friend that nothing could exceed the temperate manner and the fairness with which it was brought before the other House. But however mild and temperate the words of the promoter, the measure he proposed was sufficiently strong, and although his noble and learned Friend said it effected no alteration in the law, and was only declaratory of what the law was, he must differ with him thereon; for the first section provided that no school should be deemed to be a Church of England school, nor should any Dissenter from the Church of England be incompetent as such to be trustee, master, or scholar unless it was so declared by the instrument of foundation.

LORD CRANWORTH inquired to what Bill the noble and learned Lord was now referring?

LORD CRANWORTH explained that the Bill which he had described as being declaratory of the law was introduced by the same hon. Member in the following Session of Parliament. That from which his noble Friend had just quoted was never referred to a Select Committee.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that he had been misled by an endorsement upon the Bill, which had been given to him by a noble Friend, that it was "Mr. Dillwyn's Bill, 1859, before it went to the Select Committee." Mr. Dillwyn's second Bill, then, as his noble and learned Friend said, was merely declaratory of the law. It went to a Select Committee, where its provisions were so much changed that it was necessary to alter the preamble, and when it came back from the Committee it bore no resemblance to the Bill which went before the Committee. The Bill so amended was the one which was taken up by his noble and learned Friend at the end of last Session. During the present Session, Mr. Dillwyn had introduced another Bill, which was of a very startling character. By its first clause he proposed to provide that no endowed school or educational charity founded prior to the final establishment by law of the Church of England—that was before the first year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth—should be deemed to have been founded for the purpose of affording religious instruction according to the doctrines of the Church of England, even although it might appear upon the face of the foundation deed that it was established for that purpose; and, by the second clause, that every educational charity founded after the first year of the reign of Elizabeth should not be considered to have been founded for the purpose of religious instruction unless it should appear upon the face of the deed that it was so founded. These were rather startling propositions, and they would show what were the views of Dissenters upon this subject. That Bill was at present before the House of Commons; and on the previous day Sir Hugh Cairns introduced another measure, which was founded on the report of the Select Committee, and was, therefore, similar to that brought in by his noble and learned Friend at the end of the last Session. His noble and learned Friend had now introduced this Bill, in which he had altered an important clause of the measure of last year; and so the matter stood at present. In order to avoid misapprehension, he wished it to be understood that, wherever an endowed school had been used for religious instruction, but that it did not appear distinctly upon the face of the instrument of endowment that it had been founded for that purpose, and where the usage had been uniform for a number of years, and Dissenters had for some time been admitted to its benefits, he should be as anxious as any one that that privilege should not be taken from them. He should be ready to agree to any Bill which should provide that in all cases of endowed schools, where upon the face of the endowment it did not appear that they were endowed for purposes of religious instruction, and where Dissenters had been admitted to such schools, they should be allowed to enjoy that privilege; and for that purpose he should be prepared to assent to the introduction of these “conscience clauses,” as they were called. The Bill of his noble and learned Friend, however, went infinitely further than such a moderate provision as that, and by its fourth clause it struck at the root of all those rules of prescription by which a great part of the property of this country was held. This was a very dangerous principle. With regard to prescription, Lord Lyndhurst, in introducing the Dissenters Chapels Bill, used this forcible and nervous language:—

“My noble and learned Friend who sits near me said on a former night, that the principle on which his Bill is built is a principle known to the law, which is, that uniform possession during a long period of years establishes a title. It is a great principle of our law—it is a principle of the law of all civilized States—it is a principle drawn from the wise jurisprudence of ancient Rome—that principle and rule of law which are applied to the estates and civil rights of your Lordships and the people at large. Why then should it not be applied, I beg to ask, in cases of the description which I have mentioned?” [3 Hansard, lxxiv. 582.]

By the fourth clause of this Bill his noble and learned Friend proposed to get rid of the prescriptive rights of centuries. Even if usage and prescription were confirmed by judicial decision or by legislative authority, it was to be of no value if in the instrument regulating the endowment “nothing be contained expressly requiring every child educated under such endowment to learn, or to be instructed, according to the doctrines or formularies of such church, sect, or denomination.” His noble and learned Friend said there were about 690 endowed schools throughout the country. In the case of the great majority of them, however, he would venture to say that there was no express indication in the instrument of endowment that the religious instruction should be of a particular character. Yet there could be no doubt whatever, from the circumstances connected with these foundations, from views the persons endowing, and the continual usage after the endowment, that the object of the founders was that the religious instruction should be according to the doctrines of the Church of England. Let them take as an illustration the grammar schools founded by Edward VI. They were established on one general plan, and were intended for the promotion of sound religious education. Governors were appointed for the regulation and management of the schools and of the masters; but they were to act under the superintendence and sanction of the Bishop. In none of these endowments was there any distinct statement that the religious instruction to be given should be according to the doctrines of the Church of England. But inasmuch as the rules and ordinances for the government of the school and the schoolmaster were to be under the sanction of the Bishop, it stood to reason that they could come to no other conclusion than that the religious instruction should be according to the doctrines of the Church to which the Bishop belonged. Such was the principle upon which the decision of the Court of Chancery proceeded in the cases of the Chelmsford, the Stafford, and the Sherborne Grammar Schools. In all these cases the Judges of the Court of Chancery held that they were established for the purpose of giving religious instruction according to the doctrines of the Church of England. In the Sherborne case, however, a petition was presented by the Dissenters, upon which Lord Macclesfield made an order that the children of Dissenters connected with the school should not be compelled to attend the Church, but might go to meeting if their parents desired it. That order appeared never to have been acted upon, and there was very considerable doubt whether Lord Chancellor Macclesfield had jurisdiction to make it. When the case came before the Master of the Rolls that order of Lord Macclesfield was adverted to, and the Master of the Rolls said that all he would do was to suspend the proceedings, and refer the parties to the Lord Chancellor, who might determine whether the order should be enforced. The matter accordingly went before the Lord Chancellor on petition; but the other side contested his jurisdiction, and on the Lord Chancellor's suggestion it was agreed that the governors should pass an ordinance by which Dissenting children should be admitted to the schools without being compelled to attend the Church or to learn the Church catechism. The Sherborne case was just one of those which led him to think that though all the Grammar Schools of Edward VI. were originally intended to impart education according to the doctrines of the Church of England, yet, Dissenters having been admitted, there was a fair ground for legislating so that they should not now be deprived of their privileges. He now came to another class of schools—those which had commenced with insignificant endowments, but the funds of which were gradually increased by the liberality of Churchmen—on the faith of their being Church of England Schools. Nobody could doubt that though the original deed of endowment specified no particular religious instruction, those persons gave their donations in the faith and under the expectation that as these schools were then Church of England Schools they would still continue to be so. This Bill, however, setting aside prescription, would sweep all that class of schools into its net, and entirely alter their constitution, and the very foundation of their institution. The most rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of Canterbury) had that evening presented a petition from the National Society, who were under great apprehension that unless express words of exemption were inserted in this measure their schools would be included within its operation. It was impossible to magnify the importance of this matter as it affected the National Society's Schools; and, if these schools were to be included, they would form a most difficult part of the subject. The Bill professed generally to apply to all charitable endowments for educational purposes. Here they approached an extremely difficult part of the subject. What was the meaning of a charitable endowment? Supposing, in the case of the National Society's Schools, a master's house or a schoolhouse had been given, would that be an endowment within the intention of the Bill? If the measure passed in its present shape, and litigation were to arise under it, what guarantee had they that a Judge might not decide that question in the affirmative? It did not signify whether it was money, or a house, or land, or whether the gift was large or small—it would be equally an endowment. Generally speaking, in regard to the National Schools, there was no deed of endowment—no instrument to which reference could be made to ascertain the terms on which they were instituted. But the schools having originated with the National Society, other schools had from time to time been established, which had associated themselves with that society upon terms of union that clearly provided for education in the doctrines of the Church of England. If his noble and learned Friend meant to include the National Schools within the operation of the Bill, then he would in a most extraordinary manner violate every principle on which property had hitherto been protected in this country, and he would be introducing a measure fraught with the most mischievous consequences, not only in this particular instance, but in every case in which the rights of property were involved. His noble and learned Friend might say that these schools were supported solely by voluntary contributions, but such was not the case. If the children made payments, however small, those went to the support and maintenance of the schools, and therefore it could not be said they were maintained solely by voluntary contributions. He so far agreed with his noble and learned Friend that he would consent to the passing of a measure which would leave persons who had enjoyed all the benefits of these endowed schools before the passing of the measure in full possession of these advantages. He believed their Lordships generally would support that proposition. It was in his opinion infinitely better to have the question settled once for all by legislation; and he most decidedly objected to leaving matters so important to the decision of any Judge whatever. His noble and learned Friend proposed that on the application of the Attorney General, or any person interested in an educational endowment, any Judge of the Court of Chancery, if he thought fit, should have power to order a "conscience clause" to be introduced into the scheme. He objected to any such power being vested in the Judge, because, though he entirely relied on the Judges and law officers of the present day, yet a time might arrive when the law officers of the Crown and Judges of the Court of Chancery would be themselves Dissenters, and in such circumstances the Judge to whom application was made would always think it fit that there should be a "conscience clause." It might be said there would be an appeal against his decision; but what would be the value of an appeal against a decision which was given on the reasonable and just discretion of the Judge? Unless that discretion was exercised in a most unreasonable manner, and the Judge clearly went beyond what was just and reasonable, no appeal would be thought of. It would be infinitely better to give the discretion to no Judge whatever, but to settle the matter once for all by legislation. He would say a word or two only with regard to the constitution of the governing bodies as proposed in the Bill. Reference had been made by his noble and learned Friend to the Dissenters' Chapels Act; but the object of that Act was to protect Dissenters in the possession of property which for a certain time they had enjoyed, not to enable them to become trustees over property with which they had never been connected. The Act secured to them the possession of chapels which they had enjoyed for a period of twenty-five years, having during that time maintained in them the same doctrine. That he took to be as much as the Dissenter had a right to expect. They were protected in the possession of their property, even in cases where the will of the founder had been departed from, if they had enjoyed it for twenty-five years. But if it was proper to act upon the principle of prescription in that case, why should it not be also acted upon in the present instance; and why should Dissenters claim a right to be appointed trustees of schools in which all the trustees had hitherto been members of the Established Church? Were Dissenters to receive the benefit of the principle of prescription wherever it might be for their advantage, and were they to set it aside wherever it might militate against their interests? He had been anxious to point out the difficulties that stood in the way of this measure. He had no wish to reject the Bill on the second reading, though he feared that even in Committee it would be impossible to get his noble and learned Friend to adopt his views. He would not move the rejection of the Bill himself, but if any other noble Lord thought it his duty to do so he would feel himself bound to support him.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the simple question before their Lordships was whether the Bill should or should not be read a second time, and he hoped no serious objection would be taken to the second reading. A bill on this subject was introduced by Mr. Dillwyn last Session in the other House of Parliament, which was considered objectionable in some respects. It was referred to a Select Committee, fairly nominated, and including amongst its members that distinguished ornament of his profession, Sir Hugh Cairns, who eventually, after much discussion, framed and substituted for it an entirely new Bill; which was reported to the House and generally approved, though time did not admit of its being passed into a law. A Bill embodying that compromise was presented to their Lordships at the latter end of the Session which was not persevered with for the same reason. Sir Hugh Cairns had revived the substituted Bill in the other House of Parliament this Session, and the measure of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cranworth) now under discussion was precisely similar to it, with the exception of an alteration in the seventh clause. That being the case, would their Lordships refuse to read the Bill a second time, and so deprive themselves of the opportunity of considering all the details in Committee while they had ample time? He thought his noble and learned Friend (Lord Chelmsford) had treated Sir Hugh Cairns and others concerned in framing the Bill in the Commons, of which the one under discussion was almost a counterpart, in rather a cavalier manner. He had much respect for his noble and learned Friend (Lord Chelmsford), but without meaning any disparagement of his noble and learned Friend's abilities, he regarded Sir Hugh Cairns as just as well calculated to prepare a measure for the settlement of this important Question. The principle of the Bill was to allow the children of Dissenters to have a reasonable use of the endowed schools of the country (which in many cases would be otherwise wholly useless) and in certain cases, to admit Dissenters themselves, under the sanction of the Court of Chancery, to a share in the management of those schools. When these endowments were established, the whole population was supposed to be attached to the Church of England, and the children of all classes equally participated in the advantages they conferred; but in the present day, great numbers of the people all over the country, to whose children admission to the schools in question would be an inestimable boon, were Protestant Nonconformists; and he believed the donors of the endowments, had they foreseen this different state of things, would have made provision for the admission of the children of that class of the people. He thought their Lordships were much indebted to his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cranworth) for bringing forward the Bill. Those who disliked the alterations his noble and learned Friend had made in it would have ample opportunities of improving it in Committee; and he trusted their Lordships would give it a second reading.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he must protest against the issue on which the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had put this question. The noble and learned Lord had treated the objections made to the Bill in the course of the discussion as objections which arose not on the principle of the measure, but on its details. But he (the Earl of Carnarvon) contended they were objections of principle and not of detail. He admitted the Bill as it stood was a compromise. He could not say he altogether approved it in that light; but still, believing it a compromise in reference to a vexed question, he was willing in the main to accept it in the shape in which it came from the Committee of the other House of Parliament. But he could not accept the insertion of a clause which was not only foreign to but repugnant to its whole sense. The seventh clause in the present Bill provided, that unless otherwise expressed in the will or deed of endowment, no person was to be ineligible on account of his religion. But the seventh clause, as originally drawn by the Committee of the other House of Parliament, provided that, unless there was any express provision to the contrary in the will or deed of endowment in favour of any particular creed, and provided there was usage of appointing trustees indiscriminately for twenty-five years, Dissenters would be eligible. The Select Committee of the other House of Parliament framed their Bill on the Dissenters' Chapel Act, which was entirely founded on the principle of usage or prescription for twenty-five years; but the Bill under discussion ignored the very principle of the Act on which it professed to be framed. And therefore, to assert that the omission of this safeguard was an accident and detail which could best be dealt with in Committee, was inconsistent with the known intentions of the framers of the compromise which this Bill purported to reflect. As regarded the application of the measure, if passed into law, he entertained grave apprehensions that it would not only affect injuriously many thousands of schools in which Church of England education was now given, but would operate injuriously towards both religious and secular education. It would evidently deal a blow to religious education, for the moment a Dissenter was appointed a trustee and acted, the elements of dissensions would be introduced into the management of the school, which could only be removed by the removal of the cause—a religious education. That again would act upon the secular education; for the moment that the parents of the children who were in the habit of attending school became aware that the course of education was changed, they would not allow their children to remain. Under different circumstances he should have asked their Lordships to divide upon this question, but in the present state of the House he could only repeat the objections he entertained to the Bill.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, before their Lordships agreed to the second reading it was necessary that they should understand the principle of the Bill; because on that principle depended the number of schools to which it might apply. The most rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of Canterbury) had presented a petition to-night from the National Society, in which it was stated that there were 5,000 schools not commonly called endowed schools, in which Church of England education was now given, which would be affected by this measure if it passed in its present shape. These schools might, in one sense, be called endowed schools, because they had endowments—very small, it was true, varying from £5 to £10—and which were, therefore, hardly to be called endowments. If the noble and learned Lord would state distinctly that he did not mean to include these schools in the operation of his present Bill, but that he meant to confine it to those schools where some alleged injury to Dissenters had already arisen, he should himself be satisfied to allow the Bill to pass. But it made a great difference whether it applied to those comparatively few schools, or whether it was to apply to the great body of the Church of England schools in the country. The noble and learned Lord seemed to intimate that the Charterhouse might be affected by this Bill.

LORD CRANWORTH: No, no!

THE BISHOP OF LONDON had understood the noble and learned Lord to say that unless this Bill were passed certain noble Lords who were Governors of the Charterhouse might be objected to as Dissenters. Now, seeing that the Charterhouse was specially excepted in one clause, he conceived he was justified in believing that the noble and learned Lord had not very clearly settled in his own mind what schools would and what would not be affected by his Bill. In fact he felt convinced that in the present state of matters there was a great amount of indefiniteness as to the number of schools to which the Bill was to be applied. Viewed in one aspect it would affect nearly all the Church schools in the country; viewed in another, it would apply only to a few or a limited number; and, therefore, it became a matter of some importance to know in which aspect they were to view it.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he agreed with the right rev. Prelate that the Bill, as it at present stood, was involved in a good deal of doubt and difficulty, and he should be sorry if their Lordships came to any hasty decision with regard to it. A certain amount of grievance had been complained of by the Dissenters to have arisen from an unexpected interpretation of the law, which deserved the consideration of Parliament. The attention of the
